HISTORY
John Heygate 1720 OF THE CHURCH,

FROM

Our LORD'S Incarnation, to the Twelfth Year of the Emperor
MAURICIUS TIBERIUS, or the YEAR OF CHRIST 524.

As it was written in GREEK by

K EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS,

Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine;

SOCRATES SCHOLASTICUS,

Native of Constantinople;

AND

EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS,

Born at Epiphania in Syria Secunda.

Made English from that Edition of these HISTORIANS, which VALESIIUS published at Paris in the Years 1659, 1668, and 1673.

Also, the LIFE of CONSTANTINE in Four Books, Written by EUSEBIUS
PAMPHILUS; with CONSTANTINE'S ORATION to the CONVENTION OF THE SAINTS, and EUSEBIUS'S SPEECH in Praise of CONSTANTINE, spoken at his TRICENNALIA.

VALESIIUS'S ANNOTATIONS on these Authors are done into English, and set at their proper Places in the Margin; as likewise a Translation of His Account of their LIVES and WRITINGS.

With Two INDEXES; the One, of the Principal Matters that occur in the TEXT; the Other, of those contained in the NOTES.

In this Second Edition are added,

- I. TWO MAPPS, containing all the Places mention'd in these Ecclesiastical Histories.
  - II. Some OBSERVATIONS in reference to the Geographical Part of these Ecclesiastical Histories, and to the aforesaid Mapps: Both by ED. WELLS, D. D.
  - III. The Order of the Presidency of the Patriarchs, taken from Bishop Beveridge's Pandects.
  - IV. A CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX of the Popes and Emperors, taken from Cassiodorus.

THE PUBLISHER

OF THIS

ENGLISH Translation

READER.

VALESIUS has spoken so fully and satisfactorily concerning what He has done in His Edition of these following Ecclesiastick Historians, as to His Amendments of the Greek Text, as to His Latin Version of them, and as to His Explanation of the obscurer passages that occur in them; and besides, has added such compleat Accounts concerning the Lives and Histories of these Authors: (All which particulars, because they were judged necessary to be made known to the English Reader, are done into His own Language, and prefix'd before each Writer whom they concern:) That 'tis needless to give the Reader any farther trouble here, than barely to acquaint him, for what reason this English Translation was at first attempted, and by what Helps and Assistances this Attempt has at length been finished.

It cannot be supposed a thing unknown to any Person, though He may have been but meanly conversant amongst Books, that this is not the first time wherein these Church-Historians have appeared in English. For 'tis now almost a Compleat (a) Century, since Meredith Hanmer Doctor of Divinity, first published His Translation of them all; excepting only Eusebius's Four Books concerning the Life of the Emperor Constantine, and the Two Orations subjoined thereto: Which, by a Dedication to Sir John Lambe Knight, Doctor of Laws, and Dean of the Archbis of Canterbury, seem to have been made English several years after Doctor (b) Hanmer's death, by one Mr. Wye Saltonstall.

After Four Editions of Doctor Hanmer's Translation, a fifth, whereto was added Mr. Saltonstall's Version of the Life of Constantine and the Two Orations, was published in the Year 1650. Which Impression being sold off, and the Book become Scarce; the Person whose Propriety Dr. Hanmer's Translation was, some few Years since resolved to reprint it. This Resolution he communicated to some Friends, whom He knew to be able Advisers and Directors in an Affair of that nature. From them He received answer to this effect: That in Doctor Hanmer's Translation they saw many things that wanted Correction, which they supposed were not so much to be attributed to the Doctor, as to the Imperfection and Mistakes of the Greek Text and those Latin Translators, which the Doctor had made use of: That now there was a fair way opened, whereby the Errors in the Doctor's Translation might be corrected, in regard the Original Text of these Historians, after it had been compared with several Ancient Manuscripts of the best Note, (whereby the imperfections in it were supplied, and the faults committed in other Editions amended;) was, together with an excellent Latin Version thereof, published at Paris by Henricus Valesius, a Person of such eminent Learning, that by the unanimous consent of the Arch-Bishops and Bishops of the Gallican Church; He had been pitcht upon and employed as the fittest Man to undertake a work of this Nature: And therefore their advice was, that the Doctor's Translation should be compared with that Edition of these Historians which Valesius had published, and that, where-ever it differed, it should be made to agree with the Greek Text thereof.

After receipt of this advice, 'twas resolv'd it should be followed. And accordingly a Reverend and Learned Divine was prevail'd with to undertake this Work. Who, after He had done some few Chapters only of the First Book of Eusebius's History, for reasons best known to Himself, desist'd. But by this Tryal of His it plainly appear'd, that (besides its being an invidious attempt to go about to interpolate what another Person had long since put his last Hand to;) it was a work of far greater labour to bring Doctor Hammer's Translation to an agreement with the Greek Text of Valesius's Edition, than to make a New One. On which account this latter was resolv'd upon; and by Divine assistance being now finished, is here presented to the Reader's view.

The Reader having been acquainted with the Reason why this New Translation was at first attempted, 'tis fit He should know farther, by what Helps and Assistances this attempt has at length been finished.

This Version, as has been intimated, was taken immediately from the Greek, according to that Edition which Henricus Valesius set forth at Paris: Whence this advantage will accrue, that whatever Errors are found in it, will be Errors but of one descent. Besides Valesius's Edition, That which Robert Stephens Printed at Paris in the year 1544. was likewise all along consulted. Nor were the Latin Translators of these Historians refused or neglected: Namely these four; Musculus's Version Dedicated to Edward the Sixth, King of England, and Printed at Basil in the Year 1549; the Translation of John Christopherson (heretofore (a) Master of Trinity College in Cambridge, afterwards Bishop of Chichester;) Printed at Cologne, in the Year 1570; John Curterius's Version, or rather his Emendation of Christopherson's, Printed at Paris in the Year 1571; And lastly Grinaeus's Translation, set forth at Basil in the Year 1591. All which Versions were all along inspect'd; and in all places that required it, their Disagreements or Consents are (as the Reader will find,) taken notice of; unless the Learned Valesius's diligence had made those Remarks needless.

As for the Notes they are in a manner all Valesius's: nor is any Remark of his left untranslated (though perhaps some times made shorter;) that was judg'd of use to an English Reader, and becoming an English Translation. If the Reader does, as now and then He will, meet with a Note that has not Valesius's name set at the bottom; He may conclude that not to be Valesius's; however, He generally meets with some intimation or other, whereby notice is given him, on what authority such a Remark is grounded. But whereas in Valesius's Edition, His Notes on all these Historians are placed together in a Body by themselves, at the latter end of each Author whereto they belong: Here the Reader has them embodied with the Text, and by the Letters of the Alphabet He is shown the passages in the History, whereof they treat treat. In which method the Reader's ease was consulted; that He might not have the trouble and interruption given Him, of turning forward and backward, from the Matter to the Notes, and from thence to the Matter.

How far this Translation is beholden to That done by Doctor Hammer, will quickly be discovered by any, that shall take the pains to compare them. It need not be dissembled, that the Doctor's Version has been seen; and 'tis as needless to detain the Reader in shewing Him by tedious instances, that He has not been, nor could have been followed, without a departure from the Original Greek as published by Valesius.

It only remains, that the Reader be entreated, as He peruses this Translation, to excuse and amend what Errors may have escaped the Press; which that He may the easier be perswaded to, He is desir'd to be mindful of this Excellent Saying :

Μὴδὲν ἀγνοεῖν ἐστὶ Θεῷ, καὶ πάντα ἁρμόζειν.

'Tis God's property to mistake in nothing, and to correct all things.

Chap. 51.	That he likewise gave order for the building of a Church in the place called Mamre.	594	Chap. 16.	That He issued forth a Law, forbidding his own Statues to be placed in the Idol-Temples.	ibid.
Chap. 52.	Constantine's Letter to Eusebius concerning Mamre.	ibid.	Chap. 17.	His praying in the Palace, and his reading of the Divine Scriptures.	ibid.
Chap. 53.	That our Saviour appear'd there to Abraham.	595	Chap. 18.	That by a Law he commanded Sunday and Friday to be honoured.	ibid.
Chap. 54.	The Demolishment of the Idol-Temples and Images in all places.	596	Chap. 19.	How he ordered the Ethnick-Soldiers to pray on Sundays.	612
Chap. 55.	The Demolishment of the Idol-Temple at Aphaca in Phenice, and the disannulling those Acts of Uncleaness committed there.	597	Chap. 20.	The Form of Prayer which Constantine gave to his Soldiers.	ibid.
Chap. 56.	The Demolishment of Æsculapius's Temple at Ægæ.	ibid.	Chap. 21.	He orders the Representation of our Saviour's Cross to be drawn upon the Arms of his Soldiers.	ibid.
Chap. 57.	How the Heathens, having rejected their Idols, returned to the knowledge of God.	598	Chap. 22.	His Fervey and Earnestness in Praying, and his religious Observation of the Festival of Easter.	613
Chap. 58.	That having demolished Venus's Temple at Heliopolis, He was the first who built a Church there.	ibid.	Chap. 23.	How He prohibited the Worship of Idols; but honoured the Feasts of the Martyrs.	ibid.
Chap. 59.	Concerning the Disturbance raised at Antioch on Eustathius's account.	599	Chap. 24.	That He affirmed himself to be as true a Bishop of External Affairs.	614
Chap. 60.	Constantine's Letter to the Antiochians, that they should not draw away Eusebius from Cæsarea; but should seek another Bishop.	600	Chap. 25.	Concerning his prohibiting of Sacrifices, and Initiations, and concerning His abolishing the Gladiators, and the heretofore impure Priests of the Nile.	ibid.
Chap. 61.	Constantine's Letter to Eusebius, wherein he commends him for his refusal of the See of Antioch.	602	Chap. 26.	The Amendment of that Law made against the Childless, as also the Alteration of that Law concerning Wills and Testaments.	ibid.
Chap. 62.	Constantine's Letter to the Synod, that Eusebius should not be drawn away from Cæsarea.	ibid.	Chap. 27.	That he made a Law, that a Christian should not be Slave to a Jew, and that the Decrees of Synods should be firm and authentick, and so forth.	615
Chap. 63.	In what manner he endeavour'd to destroy Heresies.	603	Chap. 28.	His Gifts bestowed on the Churches; and his Distributions of Money to Virgins, and to the Poor.	ibid.
Chap. 64.	Constantine's Constitution against the Hereticks.	ibid.	Chap. 29.	Speeches and Discourses written by Constantine.	616
Chap. 65.	Concerning the taking away the Meeting-places of Hereticks.	604	Chap. 30.	That he shew'd a certain covetous Person the measure of a Grave, to the end he might flume him.	ibid.
Chap. 66.	That Impious and Prohibited Books having been found amongst the Hereticks, very many of them returned to the Catholick Church.	ibid.	Chap. 31.	That He was taught at because of his too great Clemency.	617

- Chap. 8. That God does plentifully supply men with those things that are useful ; but, with such as are for delight, he furnishes them in an indifferent manner only ; bestowing both sorts, so as may be agreeable to their profit and advantage. p.641
- *Chap. 9. Concerning the Philosophers, who, because they desired to know all things, erred as to their Opinions ; and some of them were exposed to Danger. Also, concerning the Opinions of Plato. 642
- Chap. 10. Concerning those men, who do not only reject the Dogmata of the Sacred Scriptures, but them of the Philosophers also ; and, that we either ought to give the Poets credit in all things, or in nothing. 643
- Chap. 11. Concerning our Lord's coming in the Flesh, what it was, and for what reasons it has hapned. ibid.
- Chap. 12. Concerning those who knew not this Mystery ; and, that their ignorance is voluntary ; and, what great Blessings await those who know it, and especially them who have died in that Confession. 647
- Chap. 13. That a Difference of the Parts of the Creation is necessary ; and that a propensity to Good and Evil, springs from the Will of Men ; and therefore, that the Judgment of God is necessary and agreeable to Reason. 648
- Chap. 14. That a created nature is at a vast distance from an Essence which is uncreated : and, that Man approaches nearest to God by a virtuous life. ibid.
- Chap. 15. That Precepts our Saviour delivered, and what Miracles he wrought ; and how beneficial he hath been to those who own a Subjection to Him. 649
- Chap. 16. That the Coming of Christ is foretold by the Prophets ; and, that he was appointed for the destruction of Idols, and idolatrous Cities. 650
- Chap. 17. Concerning the Wisdom of Moses, which was commended by the Wise-men amongst the Heathens ; also concerning Daniel, and the Three Children. 651
- Chap. 18. Concerning Sibylla Erythraea, who prefigured in an Acrostick of Verses, manifesting our Lord and his Passion. The Acrostick is this ;

- G O D, S A V I O U R, C R O S S. p.652
- Chap. 19. That this Prophecy concerning our Saviour, was not forged by any of the Christians ; but was written by Sibylla Erythraea, whose Books Cicero rendered into Latin Verse, before the coming of Christ. And, that Virgil makes mention of this Sibyl, as also of a Virgin delivered of a Child : but he sang of this Mystery obscurely, out of a fear of those then in power. 654
- Chap. 20. Other Verses of Virgilius Maro's concerning Christ, and the Interpretation of them ; in which 'tis shown, but obscurely, as the usage of Poets is, that the Mystery is disclosed. 655
- Chap. 21. That 'tis impossible for these things to be spoken concerning a meer Man : and, that Unbelievers, by reason of their ignorance of the Divine Worship, know not even whence they have their Being. 657
- Chap. 22. The Emperor's Thanksgiving, wherein he ascribes Victories, and all his other Blessings, to Christ ; also a Reproof of Maximinus the Tyrant of those Times, who by the Severity of his persecution had increased the Glory of the Christian Religion. 658
- Chap. 23. Concerning the Polity of the Christians ; and, that the Deity rejoices in those who lead virtuous lives : and, that we ought to expect a Judgment and a Retribution. 659
- Chap. 24. Concerning Decius, Valerianus, and Aurelianus, who ended their lives miserably, because of their persecution of the Church. 660
- Chap. 25. Concerning Diocletian, who with infamy resigned the Empire ; and, by reason of his persecuting the Church, was stricken with Thunder. ibid.
- Chap. 26. That God is the Cause of the Emperor's Piety ; and, that we ought to seek prosperous Events from God, and to impute them to him ; but must ascribe faults to our own Sloth and Negligence. 661

Eusebius Pamphilus's Oration in praise of the Emperor Constantine, spoken at his Tricennalia, is divided into XVIII. Chapters, without Contents.

28 SE. 60

ANCIENT Writers were wont, before their Books, to set an Index [or, Contents] of the Chapters ; to the end, the Readers might know, at first sight as 'twere, what was treated of in each Book. Now this was usually done by them two ways. For they either prefixed the Contents of all the Books together, before their whole Work ; as Plinius Secundus has done in his Books of Natural History. Or else their usage was, to set the Contents of the Chapters before each Book ; as Our Eusebius has done in his Ecclesiastick History. For 'tis not to be doubted, but Eusebius did himself make these Contents or Titles of the Chapters, and set them before his Books of History, as they now occur. We may indeed observe, that in these Contents Eusebius does always speak of himself in the first Person. For instance, after the Contents of the Chapters of the Second Book, these words occur : Σὺν τῷ ἐκείνῳ ἔτι ἐστὶν αἱ ἐκείναι, αἱ αὖ καλεῖται, Τετραβιβλίου, Ἰουστὴ καὶ φίλου. That is, Note, that this Book was collected by me, out of the Writings of Clemens, Tertullian, Josephus, and Philo. Besides, in his Seventh Book, these are the Contents of the Last Chapter ; Περὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ ἡλικίου αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀποθανόντος αὐτοῦ, &c. That is, Concerning those Ecclesiastick Persons who were famous in our own Age, &c. Whence it may plainly be observed, that Eusebius the Compiler of this History, was the Author of the Contents of the Chapters also. Besides, Rufinus, who rendered the Books of Ecclesiastick History into Latin, about six hundred years after Eusebius's death, has observed, that Eusebius had the Contents of his Copies. And this is apparent from Rufinus's Manuscript Copies, one of which, written out above seven hundred years since, I have in my custody. For in them the Contents of the Chapters are always set before every Book, in the same order wherein they are now placed in our Greek Manuscript Copies. And Rufinus calls them Capitula. But Cassiodorus in his Preface to the Thieritic History, terms them righter Tituli ; as does likewise St. Cyrillus, in his Exhortation to Martyrdom, [written] to Fortunatus. Conpendium feci, fias he, ut propositis titulis, quos quis noscere debeat & tenere ; Capitula Dominica subnectere. Where you see that Tituli are distinguished from Capitula. Moreover, Sozias, in the word καταλόγος, and in the word ἱστορία, remarks, that Tituli differ from Capitula. For instance, St. Matthew [he says] contains sixty eight Tituli, but three hundred fifty five Capitula ; and so concerning the other Gospels. Capitulum is properly a Part of a Book, which contains the entire Narrative of some one thing. But Titulus is an Index set above the Capitulum ; and sometimes one Titulus or Title contains many Capita or Chapters, as may be seen in the Pandects of the Civil Law. The same thing was heretofore visible in St. Matthew's Gospel, which had more Chapters than Titles, as Suidas does attest. So also in the other Gospels. For, that Passage which occurs in Suidas, namely, that St. Mark had forty eight Tituli, and but thirty six Capita, is faulty, and instead of thirty six, it must be mended thus, two hundred thirty three, as may be plainly gathered from the Canons of the Gospels which Our Eusebius composed. But sometimes each Titulus does answer each Capitulum, as 'tis in these Books of Ecclesiastick History. And in the Margarine and Medicanean Copies, the Tituli or Contents of each Book are prefixed, together with the Numeral Notes or Figures. But in the Hebraick Manuscript, after the Titulus, αριθμοὶ is added, together with the Numeral Note. But this term never occurs in those Excellent Copies which I have mentioned : Yea, instead thereof, I found the word αριθμοὶ placed in the Beginning of the Fourth Book, over the very Contents of the Chapters ; Αριθμοὶ τετραβιβλίου αὐτοῦ. That is, The Contents of the Fourth Book. Vale.

V A L E S I U S S P R E F A C E, To his Edition of E U S E B I U S S H I S T O R Y.

HAVING performed the Office of a Solemn (a) Dedication, 'tis now time, Most Illustrious Prelates! That I should give You a particular Account of my Work. For, whereas this Labour was undertaken by me, on Your Account chiefly, and by Your Command; I do both wish, and also hope, that before all others, You will be the Readers and Judges of my Work. There are three things therefore, which I have endeavoured to perform in this Edition. The first is, an Amendment of the Greek Text: The second, a Latin Version of it. The third is, an Explanation of the obscurer places. As touching the Latin Version, after three Translators of Eusebius's History, I have made a fourth. But no person before us, had attempted an Amendment and Explanation of the Eusebian Work. But, that I may speak more distinctly concerning each particular in its Place and Order, I will begin first from the Emendation. Whoever attempt a new Edition of old Writers, those Persons must of necessity begin their Labour from an Emendation. So Origen, after he had undertaken a New Edition of the Seventy Interpreters, and had found many passages in them that were doubtful and disagreeable by reason of the diversity of Copies, in the first place Laboured in an Emendation of them. And having compared the Copies of the Seventy Seniors, partly with the Hebrew Text, partly with three other Editions, namely Aquila's, Theodotion's, and Symmachus's; He took out all those Errors which had crept into the Edition of the Seventy Seniors. For this He himself intimates, in His Eighth Treatise on St. Mattbew, in these Words. (b) In Exemplaribus quidem Veteris Testamenti, quaecunque fuerunt inconsonantia, Deo prestante coaptare potuimus; utentes judicio ceterarum Editionum. Ea enim quae videbantur apud Septuaginta dubia esse propter Consonantiarum Exemplariorum, facientes judicium ex Editionibus reliquis, convenientia servavimus. Inde, in the Copies of the Old Testament, whatever [passages] were disagreeable, by God's assistance we have been able to make fit; using the judgment of the rest of the Editions. For those [passages] which seemed in the Seventy to be doubtful by reason of the agreement of Copies, making a judgment from the other Editions, we have preserved agreeable.

(a) Valesius dedicated his first Volume, (which contains Eusebius's Ten Books of History, His life of Constantine, Constantine's Oration, and His own) to the Arch-Bishops, Bishops, and the whole Clergy of the Gallican Church. (b) See Origen's Works, second part, pag. 46. Edit. Paris 1619.

Origen's Example was afterwards followed by St. Jerome, who bestowed a new Edition of the Seventy Translators mended by Himself, and distinguished by Asterisks and Obelisks, on the Men of His own Language, as He Himself attests in several places. And that I may speak also concerning profane Writers, Crates and Aristarchus, Grammarians, who set forth most accurate Editions of Homer's Poem, have done nothing else in a manner, but mended and distinguished that Work. In like manner therefore, when I had resolved to publish a New Edition of the Eusebian History, I used my utmost Industry and diligence in its Emendation. Two Editions only of Eusebius's History have hitherto come forth in Greek. The one is the Paris-Edition, which Robert Stephens Printed; a Person who on this very account has deserved highly of Learning, because He was the first that published the Body of Ecclesiastick History in a most Excellent Letter. The other is the Geneva-Edition. But this has in the Greek Text every where express that Edition of Robert Stephens: save only, that it has various Readings and Emendations set at the Margin, [taken] out of the Copies of Learned Men; and, that out of those Copies it has supplied some imperfections which occur in the Books concerning the Life of Constantine. Therefore, my pains was to be bestowed upon that one Edition only of Robert Stephens. Which, with as much diligence as I could, I have compared with Four Manuscript Copies of the best Note, and have restored it in many places. Two of these Four Copies, the King's Library furnish'd us with. The former bears the Arms of Francis the First; written on Silken Paper, about four hundred years since; and it does sometimes exhibit singular Readings, and very different from the other Copies. This is that, which in my Notes I have named The King's Copy. The other is out of the Medicean Library, which being now removed into the King's, is called by one and the same name of the King's Library. This, to distinguish it from that former Copy, is in Our Notes termed the Medicean Copy. Which, though it be something less ancient, is nevertheless transcribed from an excellent Copy, and by a Learned hand. Robert Stephens had made use of Both these Copies, in His Edition of the Eusebian History. And in His Printing of the Text it self, He has almost every where followed the King's Copy, and very seldom departs from its footsteps, as I have remark'd in my Notes. But in the distinction of the Chapters, He has express'd the Medicean Copy, wherein the Contents are set before each Chapter, and are written in Red-Letters. There is, besides those, a third Copy, belonging to the most Eminent Cardinal Julius Mazzarinus. Before I speak concerning the Goodness and Excellency of which Copy, it is requisite, and You (Most illustrious Prelates!) with importunity seem to crave this very thing of me, that a few words should be said concerning the Most Eminent Cardinal, by whom that Copy was lent me. For, whereas this Most Eminent Prince, born to every thing that is Great, does embrace Learning with a singular affection and benevolence; We, who from our infancy have applied our Minds to the Studies of Learning, should doubtless be ungrateful, should we not, both in our own, and in the name of all Learned Men in general, study to render Him all possible Thanks, as well in Words, as in our Writings. Farther, with what favour and how great a benevolence He does honour and respect Learning, His bounteous Liberality and Munificence towards Learned Men does attest; which, to speak nothing concerning other Persons, (a) He was lately willing should be extended even to me also, when I neither hop'd for, nor thought of any such thing. The same thing is declar'd by His most completely-furnish'd Library. Which having stor'd with innumerable Copies of the Best Writers, partly Printed, and partly in Manuscript; He does not keep it perpetually shut like some Sepulchre, as those old Senators of the City Rome did, whom (b) Ammianus Marcellinus doth sharply reprove on that very account; but opens it, as 'twere some publick House, to all the Learned; and voluntarily invites each Person to it; and freely imparts the use of His Manuscript Books to the Studious, as often as they shall have need. What shall I say concerning His other Virtues and eximious Accomplishments of Mind? What concerning His wonderful Moderation and Lenity, whereby He hath allay'd intestine Commotions and Tumults without the blood of any Citizen? But, these things will be spoken by me more fully at another time, or more Rhetorically by others. For at present I have resolv'd, to pursue those Praises of His only, which do apart belong to the Studies of Literature. Nevertheless, I can't possibly refrain my self, but must speak something here concerning that Peace, which the most Eminent Cardinal, with all imaginable earnestness and industry, does now chiefly urge and promote, and which we hope will in a short time be made publick by His Majesties (c) Proclamation. For, this thing is of great concern to the advantage of Learning; which every one knows to be the Child of Peace, and to repose it self under its Umbrage and Defence. Whereas therefore the most Eminent Cardinal, when first placed at the Helm of State, had not Himself rais'd a dismal War with the Spaniards, but had found it already rais'd: by various Councils (as [tis requisite] in so Great an Affair,) long and accurately weigh'd, at length He hath resolv'd upon this; that the Spaniards are to be broken by a lasting War, and must really be made to know how powerful the French are in Arms, Riches, Valour, Constancy, and the other necessary Provisions and Helps for a War: that the Enemy, made sensible of their own weakness and the power of the French, might be slower in future to provoke Our Nation, either by Arms or Injuries. For [twas His Sentiment,] that a firm and secure Peace could no otherwise be made with the Enemy, than till such time as by their frequent Overthrows and Losses they had perceived, that they were inferior to the French in waging War. Therefore, when the Spaniards, no otherwise than the Phrygians, had at length understood that; then the most Eminent Cardinal, perceiving a fit opportunity of entering into a Peace presented it self, refus'd not to make it with the Enemy, and to recede something from Our Right, from the chief point of the whole War; lastly from that Hope and Victory which we had now almost in our Hands; that thereby He might [promote] the Good of the People, [answer] the wishes of all good Men, and gratifie the desire of the whole Christian World. In which Affair I can't indeed enough admire His singular Prudence, and His Wisdom that was salutary to the State. For the Peace was for no other reason deferred so long, than that in future it might be lasting and more firm. And let thus much be said by the by, concerning the praises of the most Eminent Cardinal. Who having, during the War, never desisted from cherishing Learning and Learned Men in a most gracious manner; 'tis much more to be hop'd, that in the time of His Own Peace, He will embrace the same Arts with a choice Affection and Care: and will bring it to effect, that Our French, who for the Glory of Arms have been always eminent above other Nations, may now excel for the praise of Learning,

(a) He allowed Valesius a yearly Pension of 1500 Livres; which sum the Cardinal sent him yearly, as long as he lived; and by his Will continued it still Valesius's dearth: See Valesius's Life, written by his brother Eudrian. Learning, and in Studies of the best Arts. But, 'tis now time, that we should return thither, whence we have digress'd. That third Copy therefore, which the Library of the Most Eminent Cardinal hath furnish'd us with, is far the best and ancientest of all those Copies of Eusebius which I have seen. For, whatever Emendations we found in other Copies, are all shewn us by that Manuscript: And many other Amendments occur in it, which I found not in other Copies, as the Studious Readers will be able to perceive from my Annotations. It is written in Parchment, [transcrib'd] about seven hundred years since, most neatly and also most correctly. It has likewise (a) Short Expositions now and then set at the side, sometimes in an ancient, sometimes in a more modern hand; which Expositions we have set down in Our Notes, at their due places. Many other things also are to be taken notice of in that Excellent Manuscript, partly in the Accents, partly in the (b) Distinction or Punctuation. For, as to the Accents, in that Manuscript Words are often accented, which in other Copies have a Circumflex Accent. For instance, *π*ο-τα in that Copy are always accented. But on the contrary, *ο*ψι*ο*n, which in other Manu-scriptes is marked with an acute Accent, is Circumflexed in that Copy. And this in my judgment is righter. But, as to the Distinction, which we vulgarly term the Punctuation, this Copy is so accurately pointed, that from this very one Manuscript you may understand the whole manner and knowledge of pointing, which is a thing of no small moment. Indeed, before I had procured this Copy, I was not thoroughly acquainted with the usefulness and necessity of the Middle distinction; with which, that very one Book, diligently inspected and examined, hath at length made me acquainted. But, we shall speak more hereafter, concerning the Distinction. This moreover, I have observed in that most ancient Manuscript, as often as a (c) full distinction, or *π*α*ρ*α *ε*ξ*α*μ*η*ν is set in any Line, the first Letter of the following Line appears without the order of the rest, and touches upon the very outward Margin. And this is a sign, that a new Chapter, or a new Period is begun after that final distinction. I have observed the same in the other Manuscript Copies also. Indeed, in the Old Sheets of the King's Library, which contain Eusebius's Books concerning the Life of Constantine, I have found that 'tis always so, as often as a new Chapter is begun. We had, besides, a fourth Copy out of the Library of that most illustrious Personage Nicholas Fuke, who bears the Office of Procurator General in the Senate of Paris, and at the same time manages the Præfecture of the Royal Treasury, with the highest commendation. And these four Manuscript Copies we have made use of, in order to our amendment of the Books of Ecclesiastick History. But, we have compared the Books concerning the Life of the Emperor Constantine, with three ancient Copies. The first is that Copy of the King's, concerning which I have spoken above, in which Manuscript, before the Books of Ecclesiastick History, occur the four Books concerning the Life of the Emperor Constantine, written, though not in the same, nevertheless in an ancient hand. The second place belongs to the Old Sheets of the King's Library. So I call certain Papers, which are digested into Quaternions; but they are loose, and are not made up into the form of a Book. In these Sheets, besides Eusebius's Books concerning the Life of Constantine, and the Oration of the same Emperor to the Saints, occurs the first Quaternion of the Ecclesiastick History; whereof I have likewise made frequent mention in my Notes. All the rest of it, by what accident I know not, is lost. The Fuketian Library furnished us with the third Copy. Wherein, before the four Books concerning the Life of the Emperor Constantine, is prefixt Eusebius's Panegy-rick, spoken to the same Constantine, in the thirtieth year of His Empire. This Copy, tho' of the meanest Antiquity, is nevertheless of the best Note, and in many places more correct and larger than those two former, which Robert Stephens made use of in his Edition. Besides these Manuscript Copies, we were assisted by those various Readings and Emendations, which learned Men had with their own Hands noted at the Margin of Robert Stephens's Edition. Of which sort many Books are now to be found. But we made use more especially of three, which are likewise often mentioned in our Notes. The first was Hadrian Turnebus's, which with great exactness He had compared with The King's, and The Medicean Copy. But the Books concerning the Life of the Emperor Constantine, had been compared with an English Copy, either by the Hand of Hadrian Turnebus Himself, or that of Odo Turnebus. The second Copy was Vulcobius's; which, because Renatus Moreus a Physician of Paris had lent me, I am wont in my Notes to term Moreus's Copy. This Book contains some few other Emendations, besides those which occur in Turnebus's Copy. The third was Sir Henry Savil's Book, a Person of incomparable Learning; it was sent me out of England by James Usber Arch-Bishop of Armagh. For, whereas I had perceived, that in Usber's Notes on the Martyrdom of the B. Polycarp, a Manuscript Copy of Eusebius's History out of Sir Henry Savil's Library was quoted; and had found, that, by some passages produced by Usber, that Copy was of the best Note; I made my request to Him by Letter, that he would transmit to me the various Readings of that Copy; for I did suppose, that the whole Copy had been compared by him. But he wrote back to me, that the Copy it self, written in silken Paper, had been given by Sir Henry Savil to the Oxford Library. But he presently sent me Robert Stephens's Edition, in the Margin whereof Sir Henry Savil had noted the Emendations taken out of that his own Manuscript Copy. Nevertheless, as far as I have been able to conjecture, Sir Henry Savil hath not set all the Readings of the Manuscript Copy at the side of that Edition; but those only, which he thought to be good and undoubted. For some Readings are produced by Usher out of that Manuscript Copy, which I afterwards perceived were omitted by Sir Henry Savil. Farther, the same Sir Henry Savil, at the Margin of that Edition, hath written many Amendments, out of a Book of John Christophorson's; which Book Christophorson had compared with some Manuscript Copies. These are the Helps from Books, wherewith we were furnished, when we undertook to mend the Books of Eusebius's History. But lest any one should perhaps think, that any thing hath been altered by us rashly and at pleasure, we do before all things desire the Readers should know, that we have done nothing without the consent and authority of the best Copies. And so scrupulous were we, of making any Alteration in these Books, that when it appear'd most evidently, that the place was corrupted, we refused even then to favour and follow our own Conjecture. For proof hereof may be [produced] a place in the Close of the Tenth Book of the Ecclesiastick History, pag. 399 [of Our Edition:] which runs thus: ὁ δ' ἀπερὶ τὴν πόλιν θεοσεβείας ἐκπρεπῶς μέγα ὁ κληρικός κωλύσας τὴν. We could very easily have restored the true Reading here, and instead of ἐκπρεπῶς, mended it in this manner, ἐκπρεπῶτα. For so Gelasius Cyzicenus, in (a) his Second Book, cites this place of Eusebius: nor is it otherwise written in Eusebius's Second Book concerning the Life of Constantine, Chap. 19; where this Passage is repeated almost in the very same words. Lastly, no place is mended in this our Edition, concerning which I have not advertised the Reader in my Notes, and have not given an Account of mine Amendment.

Distinction, or Punctuation, is not the least part of Emendation; concerning which I must say something, lest peradventure the Readers should be confounded by a new kind of Pointing, which was first brought into this Edition by me. Although, if we would speak properly, this is not a new sort of Distinction, but the oldest, and made use of by all the Ancients, as well Greek as Latin Writers: Which being wholly disused and lost by the negligence of more modern Authors, I have, at least in part, endeavour'd to restore in this Edition. Those Ancients indeed (the Figures of Letters being then newly invented,) wrote in one continued form, without any distinctions. Whose thing contained much of difficulty both in reading and pronouncing, the ancient Grammarians found out three Positives or Distinctions, whereby, as 'twere by certain Stations and Runs, the continued Journey of Speech might be distinguished and divided. The first they termed ὑποσημία, that is a Sub-distinction: The Second μέση, that is a middle Distinction: The Third πλεον σημία, that is a final or full Distinction. Now they noted them by three Points placed in a different site. For a Point set at the bottom of a Letter, denotes a Sub-distinction: a middle Distinction, which the Latines have termed (b) Moran, is shown by a Point placed at the middle of a Letter. But that Point which is set at the head of a Letter, denotes a final Distinction. What the Import and Design of these Distinctions is, the Grammarians do inform us; Donatus, and Marinus Victorinus, and Diomedes in his Second Book. Which Author last named, at this place shall be to us instead of all. Lectioni, says he, Posituras accedere vel Distinctiones oportet, &c. To Reading must be added the Positives or Distinctions, by Grecians termed σημαί which, during our reading, give a liberty of recovering Breath, lest it should fail by a Continuation. These are three, a Distinction, a Sub-distinction, a middle Distinction or Pause, or, as some will have it, a Sub-middle: The Diversity of which [three] is shown by three Points set in a different place. And after some few words: A Distinction is a token of silence, when, the Sense being ended, there is a liberty of resting longer. The Mark hereof, is a Point set above the Verse, at the head of the Letter. A Sub-distinction is a Sign of a meet and convenient Silence, whereby the Course of Pronunciation (the Sense remaining) is so stop'd, that what follows, ought to succeed immediately. The Note hereof, is a Point placed under the Verse. A Pause is a small Separation, interposed in the Continuation of Senses, and possesses the middle place of a meet Distinction and Sub-distinction, in such manner that it may seem neither perfect in the whole, nor omitted, but by a Signification of Staying, may want the beginning of another Sense. And it attends this Office only, that by the shortest Respiration it may recover and nourish the Reader's Breath. For, in pronouncing every one ought in such wise to be silent, that, because the Breath it self is changed by a kind of decay, it may afterwards be recovered. As thus;

Ut belli signum Laurenti Turmus ab arce Extulit, & rancio strepuerunt cornua Cantu.
Utque acres concussit equos, utque impulit arma, Extemplo turbati animi.

For, there are many middle Clauses of this Reading. First, lest those be confounded, which are put as double-membred and treble-membred [Clauses,] and the like. Then, that the (c) Emphasis of the Words may be more eminently apparent and conspicuous, which may be moved by some Affection, either by Indignation, or Commiseration compared, &c. Such Marks therefore of Distinctions and Punctuations as these, all the Ancients, as well Greeks as Latines, made use of in their Books: which also, as 'tis manifest, were still in use, in the Age of Isidorus Hispalensis. For this we learn learn from His Origines, Book 1. Chap. 19. In Manuscript Copies likewise, which are somewhat ancienter, the same way of distinguishing is always observed. But more modern Writers, whether by Unskilfulness, or a kind of Sloth and Negligence, have changed them all. And instead of a Sub-distinction, they have put (d) little Rods; for the mark of a middle Distinction, (d) Comma's. But they have cast the Note of a final Distinction from the Head to the Feet of a Letter. Which ill way of Pointing almost all Printers have follow'd, except Aldus Manucius. For he in his Edition of Greek Books, whereof he printed almost an innumerable company, hath always retained that Punctuation, which he had found in Manuscript Copies. As to the Little Rods, I would not condemn them: For 'tis of very small moment what Mark we should make use of, to denote a Sub-distinction, provided that Mark be placed at the Feet of a Letter. Indeed, in that excellent and most ancient Manuscript belonging to the Mazarine Library, whereof I have made mention before, I found a little Rod placed sometimes for a middle, sometimes for a final Distinction; that is, sometimes at the middle of a Letter, sometimes at the top. And not only by a little Rod, but also by a Scilicet or εὐλαῖα, turned backwards, a middle Distinction, was sometimes denoted, as Victorinus informs us in his First Book of the Art of Grammar. But, whereas we now-a-days put a Point at the Feet of a Letter for a final Distinction, in my judgment that can in no wise be born with. For it does not only contradict Antiquity, but Reason also. For Reason requires, that a Mark placed in the same site, should denote the same Distinction. A Point therefore placed in the bottom ought to signify the same that a little Rod does, which is set at the bottom of a Letter. For, not the Mark it self, but the Site of the Mark alters the Distinction. Whence 'tis made evident, that a final Distinction is not rightly shown by us, by our setting a Point at the foot of a Letter. Wherefore, 'tis not without reason that I have endeavour'd to restore the old way of Punctuation in this Edition. I have indeed retained the Little Rod it self, in regard it denoting a Sub-distinction it serves for the same purpose with a Point: but from the Authority of the Manuscript Copies, I have, by way of Recovery as 'twere, put the middle Distinction into possession of its own places. The Advantage and Necessity whereof, the Studious, I hope, will soon acknowledge. For, that middle Distinction does not only serve for this purpose, that breath may be taken in order to the continuing the beginning of another Sense, and that the Emphasis may be more eminently apparent and conspicuous, as Diomedes writes; but also, to denote the difference of Persons and Dignities. So somewhere in these Books, where the reading is ἐπισκοπῶν πρεσβυτέρων καὶ διακόνων, the Most Eminent Cardinal's Manuscript, after the word ἐπισκοπῶν, adds a middle Distinction. Besides, in many places I have set a Point at the head of the Letter, to denote a final Distinction: and would have done that every where, had not the force of old custom diverted me from my Attempt. But, what I have in part only performed in this Edition, that (I hope) will at length be perfected by others endued with greater Learning and Authority, who shall in future publish the Books of the Ancients. And thus much may suffice to have been spoken briefly concerning Our Emendation and Punctuation. Come we now to the Latin Translation.

I doubt not but there will be many who will admire, why, after three Latin Translators of Eusebius, and those not meanly vers'd in the Greek Tongue, I should have made a fourth Version. To whom in the first place I answer thus: If after Rufinus, who first turned the Books of Ecclesiastick History into Latin, Misculus might have leave to make a new Translation; if again, after Misculus, Christophorus might have leave to do the same, why should not I also have the like liberty with others? Amongst the Jews, after the Edition of the seventy Seniors, confirmed by the Religion of so many Oaths, by the Authority of so many Ages; first Aquila, then Theodotion and Symmachus, did each of them publish new Versions of the Old Testament. Also, some Persons are found to be the Authors of a fifth, sixth, and seventh Edition, whose names are unknown: and all these Translations Origen hath placed in his Hexapla, that they might be read by Catholics. That therefore which the Jews were free to do in the Old Testament, why may not I have leave to do in Eusebius? Especially, in regard 'tis less dangerous to attempt that in Eusebius, than in the sacred Books of the Divine Scriptures. Indeed, many and those cogent Reasons enforce'd me even against my will, to undergo the burthen of this new Translation. For, whereas by (e) Your Command and with Your Advice I had undertaken a new Edition of the Ecclesiastick History, and perceived, that the Versions of former Translators, by reason of their frequent Mistakes and ill Renditions, did in no wise satisfy the Desire of Learned Men; as it has been (f) already declared by the Testimony of J. Curterius and Peter Hallixius: One of these two things was of necessity to be performed by me, that I should either correct the old Translation, or else make a new one. Farther, to correct the Translation of others, as it is in it self a thing troublesome and difficult, so also it seem'd invidious. For, His own Praise and His own Honour, is from us due to each Person. They have done as much as in them lay, and by their own Pains have endeavour'd to lighten and lessen our Labour. Therefore, the Work of each Translator ought to be commended by us, rather than interpolated. Rufinus, altho' he follows the Sense of Eusebius rather than his Words, is nevertheless neat and clean, and not unpleasant to the Readers: And even on this very account highly to be commended, because he was the first that bestow'd the Ecclesiastick History on Men of the Latin Tongue; whose Translation the Western Church has made use of till our own Age. Misculus keeps closer to the words, and in translating is short and clear, and in many places more happy than Christophorson. Christophorson, as He is more diligent and learner than Musculus, so also is more verbose, and has something of the Style of Cicero. Besides, He used Manuscript Copies in the making his Translation; and was the first that published Eusebius's Panegyrick spoken at Constantine's Tricennalia, in Latin. Which the Geneva-Printers afterwards printed in Greek. Some body will be ready to say here; What need then was there of a new Version? whereas those Translators abound with so many and such high Commendations. I rehearse their Praises, but do not detect their Errors; which I had rather should be discovered by the Testimony of others, than mine own. But, if any one will read my Notes, or shall have a mind to compare my Translation with their Version, He will doubtless understand, with how many and how gross Mistakes their Translations are stult; and that 'twas not without reason, that you had ordered me to make a new Version of Eusebius. But, because I am slain upon this Discourse, not willingly but by necessity, I will say something briefly concerning the Errors of former Translators. For, should I have a mind to reckon up all their Mistakes one by one, my Discourse would be stretch'd to a vast length. To begin therefore with Rufinus: Who knows not, that, at his pleasure, he has added many Passages to Eusebius, has taken away many Passages from him, has changed many; and in most places is rather a Paraphrast than a Translator? For instance; In the Seventh Book he has inserted a tedious Narrative concerning the Miracles of Gregory Thaumaturgus, which occurs not in the Copies of our Eusebius. The same Person, in the Ninth Book, rehearſes a Speech of Lucian the Martyr, spoken before the Judge in defence of our Faith: Which Speech the Copies of Eusebius do not acknowledge. He has omitted almost the whole Tenth Book of the Ecclesiastick History, in his Version. I say nothing here concerning the Chapters altered by him in the Sixth and Seventh Book, in as much as I have given the Reader notice of this thing, in my Notes. How many places of Eusebius are misunderstood and ill rendred by him? This is he, who of Zacharias the Priest, of whom mention is made in St Luke's Gospel, has made us a Martyr of Lyons. This is he who hath confounded Biblias with Blandina. This is he who has made the most Noble Martyr Philoromus a Tribune of Soldiers, from his being a Rationalist. To what purpose is it to speak concerning Musculus, whose Versions (for he has translated other Writers also into Latin,) are not extraordinarily approved of by the Learned? I could, if I had a mind, expose his innumerable Mistakes: Amongst which this is a notorious one. Dionysius Alexandrinus, in his Epistle to Germanus, which Eusebius records in his Sixth (g) Book, says, that he was taken by the Soldiers et in iduibus, and was brought to Taposiris. But Musculus believed Heliodysnas to be a Town. For thus he renders it: Ego namque cum Heliodysnas, una cum illis qui mecum erant, venissem, Taposirim a militibus ductus sum. For I, after I was come to Heliodysnas, together with them that were with me, was brought by the Soldiers to Taposiris. Farther, the same Musculus in his Translation has wholly omitted Eusebius's Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, which is subjoynd to the Eighth Book of his Ecclesiastick History; for what reason I know not. For that Book of Eusebius's, is a most elegant one. The Translation of John Christophorson remains [to be spoken of,] which very Version wants not its Bleisings. For to omit the Barbarisms which do frequently occur in it, his Translation is too prolix and intricate, whilst he either adds some Words to fill up the Period, or annexes his own Explanations in order to the clearing of an obscure place. Sometimes also, of two Periods he makes but one, and puts two Chapters into one: In so much that the Division of the Latin Chapters in his Translation differs much from the Greek. Which thing, how much Trouble and Vexation it breeds in citing places out of Eusebius, all the Studious know. The same Translator was indeed sufficiently well vers'd in Divinity; but he was meanly furnished with the Skill of (b) a Critick, and with the Knowledge of Roman Antiquity. Wherefore, in the proper Names of Roman Magistrates, and in those Matters which appertain to the Civil Administration, he is always out: For instance, in rendring the words ἡγεμον, ἐπαρχος, ἐπαρχικὸς ταξείως, and in other such like terms. Lastly, Christophorson has embodied Eusebius's Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, (which in Robert Stephens's Edition, and in the Manuscript Copies, is subjoynd to the Eighth Book of his Ecclesiastick History,) with his eighth Book, because he believed it to be a part thereof. Which Mistake of Christophorson's, the Geneva-Printers having afterwards followed, that they might make the Greek agree with the Latin; of two Books of Eusebius's, have made but one. And let thus much be briefly spoken concerning the Errors of former Translations, not with any design to disparage or lessen the Glory of any Translator; but, that all the Studious may understand, that we had good reason for our undertaking a new Translation. Which as I dare not warrant to be perfect and every way compleat, (for that would be too much confidence;) so I do boldly affirm, that it wants very many Faults, wherewith former Translations do abound. Further, whereas three things are required in a Version; namely, that it be faithful, elegant and clear; I have made it my business, that no one of these should be wanting in our Translation.

(e) He mean the French Clergy.
(f) In his Epistle Dedicatory.

VALESIUS'S PREFACE.

The Translation is followed by the Annotations. Wherein I had an Eye chiefly to two things: First, that I might give an account of my Emendations, and might propose to the Studious the various Readings of Manuscript Copies: Secondly, that I might clear the obscurer passages in Eusebius, and might explain the ancient Usages and Rites of the Church, by producing and comparing the passages of other Writers. To my Annotations I have subjoined (a) four Dissertations. The first whereof is, Concerning the Beginning and Progress of the Schism of the Donatists. The Second, Concerning the Anastasis and the Jerusalem-Martyrium. This is followed by a disputation about the Version of the Seventy Translators against James Usher Arch-Bishop of Armagh. The Fourth is, Concerning the Roman Martyrology which Rosweyde published. And these are the things which with care and diligence I have performed in this Edition, in order to the illustration of Eusebius's History. Which if to any one they shall peradventure seem slight and of little worth, let him think, that all things which are published in this kind of Learning, are in a manner of this nature, and are either valued or contemned according to the Affection and Stomach of the Readers. For, if they find a candid and studious Reader, they are highly esteemed: But if they shall happen to fall into disdainful Ears, they are look't upon as nothing. Besides, what but that which is very ordinary and mean can be expected, from me especially, who by reason of my weakness of sight am forc'd both to read and write by other Men's Eyes and Hands: And who, whilst by reason of the greatness of the Labour I do always hasten forwards, have so hastily dictated this whole work, such as it is, that I have scarce had leisure to read it over again. On which account I am the more to be pardoned, if perhaps in any place of my Notes I have not so fully satisfied the Reader's desire.

VALESIUS'S ACCOUNT Concerning the LIFE AND WRITINGS OF EUSEBIUS CÆSARIENSIS.

C Concerning the Life of Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea, Acacius, his Scholar and Successor in the See of Cæsarea, had heretofore written a Book, as (a) Socrates does attest. But in regard this Book, together with very many others, is lost by the carelessness of Antiquity, we, by gathering together from this place and other the Testimonies of Ancient Writers who have spoken concerning Eusebius, to the utmost of our ability will endeavour to repair that Loss. Eusebius therefore was born in Palestine, about the Close (as 'tis likely) of Gallienus's Reign. That he was a Native of Palestine, is hence prov'd, because by the Ancients he is commonly called a Palestinian. So, 'tis certain, Basilus, Theodoret, and others do term him. And although he might have been thus Sur-nam'd from his being Bishop of the City Cæsarea, yet it seems to me truer, that he drew that Sur-name from his Country. Indeed, he himself does attest, in his First (b) Book concerning the Life of Constantine, that during his being a youth he was educated and conversant in Palestine, and that Constantine was first seen by him there, whilst he made a journey thither from Palestine in the Court of Diocletianus Augustus.

Before, in the Second (c) Book of the same work (where he records a Law of Constantine's, which he wrote to the Palestinians in favour of the Christians,) he does plainly shew himself to have been a Palestinian. For, after he has recited the Contents of that Law transmitted to the Palestinians, he adds these words. Τὸ μὲν δὲ παρ' αὐτῶν οὕτως ἡγήσασθαι μετέδωκε βασιλεὺς γεγνημῶς, ταῦτα διετίθετο. These were the Constitutions contained in the Emperor's first Edict sent to Us. But whereas I have plac'd his Birth upon the Latter end of Gallienus's Reign; of this thing I have Eusebius himself for my Author. For speaking (in his Books of Ecclesiastick History,) concerning Dionysius Bishop of the Alexandrians, he does attest that He had lived in his own Age, as may be seen in Book 3. Chap. 28. Wherefore, in regard 'tis manifest that Dionysius Alexandrinus departed this life on the twelfth year of Gallienus's

Empire, Eusebius must of necessity have been born then, if his age fell on those times wherein Dionysius lived. The same may likewise be gathered from the Fifth (d) Book of his Ecclesiastick History, about the end of it, where speaking concerning Arctemon's Heresie, he writes that Paul of Samosata had revived that Heresie in (e) his age. Lastly, relating (in his Seventh Book,) those things which hapned during the Reign of Gallienus, before he begins his Discourse concerning the Error and Condemnation of Paul of Samosata, he has these Words. (f) Ἀλλὰ δὲ πᾶν μὲν τῶν αὐτοῦ τῶν ἰσορῶν; φέρε ὃ τῶν κατ' ἡμᾶς τοῖς μετὰ ταῦτα γνωσθέντων γεγονέναι οὐκ ἔστιν ὀρθῶς. But now, after an Historical relation of these things, we will deliver to the knowledge of posterity an account of our own age. Whom he had for his Parents, is unknown to us, excepting that Nicephorus Callistus, following I know not what Authors, does tell us that he was begotten of the Sister of Pamphilus the Martyr. But in Arius's (g) Letter to Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia, he is termed the Brother of Eusebius Nicomedensis. And although by reason of his friendship he might be called the Brother, yet it seems truer to me, that he was either the near Kinsman or Cousin-germane of Eusebius Nicomedensis, especially in regard Arius, although many other Persons are there mentioned, yet terms only Eusebius of Cæsarea Brother to him of Nicomedia. Besides, Eusebius of Nicomedia was a Native of Syria. For he was at first Bishop of Berytus. Nor was it the usage then, that Strangers and Persons unknown should be preferred to govern Churches. What Masters he had in secular Learning, is in like manner unknown to us. But in sacred Literature he had Dorotheus the Eunuch, a Presbyter of the Antiochian Church, for his Master: of whom also he makes an honourable mention in his Seventh (h) Book. Although Eusebius at that place says only, that he had heard Dorotheus, whilst he expounded the Holy Scriptures in the Church not unjustly. Nevertheless, if any one has a mind (with Trithemius) to conclude from those those words of Eusebius, that Eusebius was Doctheus's Disciple, truly I shall not very much oppose him. Theotecnus being at that time dead, the Bishoprick of the Church of Cæsarea was administered by Agapius, a person of eminent piety and large bounty towards the Poor. By him Eusebius was admitted into the Clergy, and entered into the strictest and most intimate friendship with Pamphilus, who at that time was eminent amongst the Presbyters of the Church of Cæsarea. Pamphilus was by Nation a Phœnician, born at Berytus, Scholar to Pierius a Presbyter of the Alexandrian Church, as Photius relates. Who (in regard he was inflamed with a singular love of sacred Learning, and with the greatest diligence imaginable, made a Collection of all the Books of Ecclesiastick Writers, and especially of Origen's;) founded a most famous School and Library at Cæsarea. Of which School Eusebius seems to have been the first Master. Indeed Eusebius, in his (a) Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, writes in express words, that Apphianus, who completed his Martyrdom on the third year of the Persecution, had been instructed in the sacred Scriptures by him in the City Cæsarea. From that time Eusebius always lived with Pamphilus in the closest intimacy, and continued his inseparable Companion till his death: So dear to him, that from his Friendship he got the surname of Pamphilus. Nor did Eusebius love him whilst he lived only, but had a singular affection for him when dead also: in so much that after Pamphilus's death, he always made a most honourable, and likewise a most loving mention of him. This is attested by those Three Books which he wrote concerning the Life of Pamphilus the Martyr, which Books St. Jerome terms most elegant ones. The same is likewise gathered from many Passages which occur in his Ecclesiastick History, and in his Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine. Lastly, in his Second Book against Sabellius, which was written by Eusebius after the Nicene Council, he frequently commends Pamphilus the Martyr, altho' he suppresses his name. For even in the very beginning of his Discourse he says thus. Puto adhuc aures obstrepi meas a memoria beati illius viri, &c. I think my Ears are as yet struck by the memory of that blessed Man, who frequently made use of that devout word. For even your Ears do as yet retain the sound of that word. For I think I hear him saying, The only begotten Son of God. For this Religious word was always uttered by his Mouth. For it was the remembrance of the Only begotten, to the Glory of the unborn Father. Now, we have heard the Apostle commanding, that Presbyters ought to be honoured with a double Honour; those especially who labour in the Word and Doctrine. And at pag. 29. he speaks of him again in this manner. Hæc non nos extollunt, &c. These things do not puff us up, (b) remembering that Blessed Man. Now I wish I could so speak, as together with you I did always hear from him. But these words which are now said, seem to have been pleasing to him. For 'tis the glory of good Servants, to speak truth concerning the Lord; and 'tis the honour of those Fathers who have taught well, if their Doctrines be repeated. And again in the same Book, pag. 37. Hæc audiebamus semper a beato illo viro, &c. These words we always heard from the Blessed Man. For they were often spoken in this manner by him: Altho' some suspected, that he uttered these words with his mouth, but that in his Heart he thought otherwise. And indeed I remember with you, that I have heard from him, that he hath satisfied us with an holy Oath, that there was not one thing in his Tongue, and another in his Heart. And a little after. Sed nunc quidem paucis, &c. But now, let thus much be said by us in short, in memory and honour of that our Father, so good, so laborious, and every where vigilant for the Churches. For we have not made mention of his Stock, nor of his Education, or Learning, or of (c) the rest of his Life and (c) His Resolution. Which Passages in Eusebius (that I ther Life. may not defraud any one of his Commendation,) were shown me by the most Learned Franciscus Ogerius. Now, from what I have said it may be evidently enough gathered, that Eusebius was joined to Pamphilus by no (d) Tie of kindred, but by the (d) Or, Bond of friendship only. 'Tis certain, Eusebius, altho' he names Pamphilus in so many places, and boasts so highly of his friendship, yet never terms him his Kinsman or Relation. Yea, from Eusebius's own testimony 'tis plainly made out, that Pamphilus the Martyr was not Eusebius's Kinsman. For in the Close of his Seventh (e) Book of Ecclesiastick History, where he makes mention of Agapius Bishop of the Church of Cæsarea; his words are these. Κατὰ τὸν ἑλλογισμὸν αὐτοῦ πρὸς φίλον ἀγαπῶν, προσβέβηκε τῆς αὐτοῦ πατρίας ἐξουσίας, &c. In this Man's time we knew Pamphilus (a most eloquent Man; and a true Philosopher in the practices of his Life) honoured with a Presbytership of that Church. Whereas therefore Eusebius himself does attest, that Pamphilus was first known by him, then, it is sufficiently apparent, that they were not joined together by any kindred or affinity. In these times hapned that most severe Persecution of the Christians; which being first begun by Diocletian, was by the following Emperors continued to the tenth year. In the time of this Persecution, Eusebius, in regard he was then a Presbyter of the Church of Cæsarea, resided almost constantly in that City, and by continual exhortations instructed many persons in order to Martyrdom. Amongst whom was Apphianus, a noble Youth, whose illustrious Combat our Eusebius does relate in his (f) Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine. In the same Persecution Pamphilus was taken, and cast into Prison, where he spent two whole years in Bonds. During which time Eusebius in no wise deserted his Friend and Companion: but visited him continually, and in the Prison wrote together with him Five Books in defence of Origen. The Sixth and last Book of that Work he at length finished after Pamphilus was dead. That whole Work was by Eusebius and Pamphilus dedicated to the Confessors living in the Mines of Palestine, as Photius relates in his Bibliotheca, Chap. 118. In the time of the same Persecution, on account of some urgent Business of the Church, as 'tis probable, Eusebius went to Tyre. During his residence in that City, he attests (Book 8. Chap. 7.) that he himself was eye-witness of the glorious Combats of five Egyptian Martyrs. And in the Ninth Chapter of the same Book, he writes that he came into Egypt and Thebais, whilst the fury of the Persecution as yet raged; and that there he beheld with his own eyes, the admirable Constancy of many Martyrs of both Sexes. There are those who relate, that Eusebius in this Persecution, to free himself from the Troubles of a Prison, sacrificed to Idols: and that that was objected against him by the Egyptian Bishops and Confessors in the Synod at Tyre, as we will hereafter relate. But I doubt not but this is false, and a Calumny forged by

by the Enemies of Eusebius. For, had so great a Crime been really committed by Eusebius, how could he have been afterwards made Bishop of the Church of Cæsarea? How is it likely that he should have been invited by the Antiochians, to undertake the Episcopate of that City? And yet Cardinal Baronius has catch'd up that as certain and undoubted, which was objected against Eusebius by the way of Contention and Wrangling, by his Enemies, nor was ever confirmed by any one's Testimony. At the same time, a Book was written by Eusebius against Hierocles. And the occasion of writing it was given by Hierocles of Nicomedia, who about the beginning of this Persecution, when the Churches of the Christians were every where demolished, insulting as it were over the disquieted Religion, in the City Nicomedia published two Books against the Faith of Christ, which he entitled, ΜΑΛΑΚΙΩΣ. In which Books amongst other things he asserted this, that Apollonius Tyaneus performed far more and greater Miracles than Christ; as Lactantius does attest in his

(a) Seventh Book. But Eusebius contemned the Man, rested satisfied in confuting him in a very short Book. Agapius Bishop of Cæsarea being dead during this interval, and the Persecution being now abated, and Peace restored to the Church; by the general consent of all Persons Eusebius was put into his (a) Episcopate. Others make Agricola (who was present at, and subscribed to the Synod of Ancyra, on the Year of Christ 314, Successor to Agapius. So Baronius in his Annals, at the Year of Christ 314; and Blondell in his Apology pro sententia B. Hieronymi, Chap. 19. where he writes, That Eusebius undertook the Administration of the Church of Cæsarea after Agricola's death, about the Year of Christ 315. But those Subscriptions of the Bishops which are extant in the Latin Collections of the Canons, in my judgment seem to have little of certainty and validity in them. For they occur not either in the Greek Copies, or in the Latin Version of Dionysius Exiguus. Besides, Eusebius reckoning up (in the Seventh

(b) Book of his Ecclesiastick History,) the Bishops of the chief Seat, under whom the Persecution began and raged, ends in Agapius Bishop of Cæsarea, who (says he) took a great deal of pains in that Persecution for the good of his own Church. He therefore must of necessity have sat Bishop until the end of the Persecution. But Eusebius was made Bishop immediately after the Persecution was ended. For when Paulinus Bishop of Tyre dedicated a Cathedral, some time after Peace and Repose was restored to the Church; He, together with other Bishops, was invited by Paulinus to its Dedication, and made a most elegant Oration before him, as we are informed from the Tenth (c) Book of his Ecclesiastick History. Now, this hapned before Licinius rebelled against Constantine, which fell on the Year of our Lord 315. About these Times Eusebius wrote those famous Books concerning Evangelick Demonstration and Preparation. Which Books, 'tis plain, were written before the Nicene Council, in regard they are by name cited in his Ecclesiastick History, which was written by Eusebius before that Council, as we have shewn in Our Annotations. In the interim Licinius, who managed the Government in the Eastern Parts, incited by a sudden rage, began to persecute the Christians; especially those that were Prelates, of whom he had a Suspicion that they shewed more of favour to Constantine, and put up Prayers for him. But Constantine undertook an Expedition against Licinius, and in a short time compell'd him, after he had been vanquished in two Fights by Land and Sea, to a Surrendry. And thus Peace was again by Constantine restored to the Christians, who inhabited the East. But a far more vehement Disturbance was at that time raised amongst the Christians themselves. For Arius a Presbyter of the City Alexandria, in regard he would publicly in the Church preach up some new and impious Opinions concerning the Son of God, and having been frequently admonished by Alexander the Bishop, would nevertheless persist in those Assertions, was at length condemned together with the Associates of his own Error, and was expelled out of the Church. Highly resenting this his Condemnation, he sent Letters, with a Draught of his own Faith, to all the Bishops of the neighbouring Cities: Wherein he complained, that he had been undeserv'dly deposed by Alexander, in regard he asserted the same Points that the rest of the Eastern Prelates maintained. Many Bishops imposed upon by these Artifices, and powerfully incited by Eusebius of Nicomedia, who was an open Favourer of Arius's Party, wrote Letters in defence of Arius, to Alexander Bishop of the City Alexandria, entreating him to restore Arius to his former Place. Our Eusebius was one of their number, whose Letter, written to Alexander, is extant in the Acts of the Seventh Oecumenical Synod, and is by us put amongst the (d) Testimonies of the Ancients. Eusebius Cæsariensis's Example being presently followed by Theodotus and Paulinus, the one Bishop of Laodicea, the other of Tyre; they interceded with Alexander for Arius's Restoration. Whose Letters, as patronizing his own Opinions, in regard Arius boasted adds a of in all places, and by the authority of such Great Men, drew many Persons into a Society of his own Error; on this account Alexander himself also was forced to write Letters to the other Bishops of the East, whereby it might be made publicly known, that Arius, together with his Associates, had been justly condemned and deposed. Two Letters of Alexander at this present extant: the one to Alexander Bishop of Constantinople, in which Alexander complains of three Bishops of Syria, who agreeing in Opinion with Arius had inflamed the Quarrel, which they ought rather to have extinguished, and had rendered it fiercer than it was before. These three are Eusebius, Theodotus, and Paulinus, as may be collected from Arius's Letter written to Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia. The other Letter of Alexander's, written to all the Bishops throughout the World, Socrates records it in his First (e) Book. To these Letters of Alexander almost all the Eastern Bishops subscribed: Amongst whom the Prelates of chiefest note were, Philogonius Bishop of Antioch, Eustathius of Berea, and Macarius of Jerusalem. Now, these Bishops who seem'd to be of Arius's side, in regard they saw themselves severely touch'd in Alexander's Letters, made it their business to defend Arius with far more of fierceness and vehemency: but most especially Eusebius Nicomedienfis. For our Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea, together with Patrophilus and Paulinus, and other Bishops of Syria, concluded upon this only, that Arius the Presbyter should have a liberty of holding Assemblies in his own Church; nevertheless, that he should be subject to Alexander the Bishop, and should earnestly request of him that he might be admitted to Peace and Communion. The Bishops in this manner disagreeing amongst themselves, and some favouring Alexander's, others Arius's side; the Contention was incredibly heighten'd. To cure which mischief, Constantine assembled a General Synod of Bishops (such one as no Age had ever seen,) from all Parts of the Roman World, in Nicæa a City of Bithynia. Of this Greatest and most Celebrated Council, Our Eusebius was not the least part. For he had both the first place in the Right-Hand (a) Side, and also in the name of the whole Synod made a Speech to the Emperor Constantine, who sat on a Golden Chair in the midst between the two Rows of those who sat together [in the Council:] as he himself attests in the Preface to his First (b) Book concerning the Life of Constantine, and in his (c) Third Book of the same Work. The same is likewise confirmed by Sozomen, in the First (d) Book of his Ecclesiastick History. Farther, when there was a great contest amongst the Bishops concerning a (e) Draught of the Creed, Our Eusebius proposed a Draught that was exactly true and plain, and which was commended by the consent of all the Bishops, and of the Emperor himself. But, in regard something seem'd to be wanting in that Draught, in order to confuting the Impiety of the new Opinion; the Fathers of the Nicene Synod judg'd these words as necessary to be further added, Very God of very God; begotten not made, being of one Substance with the Father. They likewise annex'd Anathematisms, against those who should assert that the Son of God was made of things which are not, and that there was a time when He was not. And at first indeed Our Eusebius refused to admit of the term Consubstantial. But afterwards, informed by the other Bishops what the Import and Meaning of that word was, he at length consented and subscribed to this Creed, as he himself relates in his (f) Letter to his Diocess of Caesarea. Some affirm, that Eusebius, forced by necessity, and out of a fear of the Emperor, rather than from the Sentiment of his own Mind, had subscribed to the Nicene Creed. I might indeed be easily induced to believe that, concerning others who were present at this Synod. But, I can't think so of Eusebius Bishop of Caesarea. For after the Nicene Synod, Eusebius always condemn'd those who would assert that the Son of God was made of Nothing, as 'tis plain from his Books against Marcellus, and expressly from the Ninth and Tenth Chapter of his First Book De Ecclesiastica Theologia. Athanasius does likewise attest the same concerning him. Who (though he has often related that Eusebius Caesariensis had subscribed to the Nicene Synod, yet) does never declare, that he did that dissemblingly and in pretence only. Had Eusebius subscribed to the Nicene Council, not heartily, but by fraud and under a colour; why did he afterwards send that Letter I have mentioned, to his Diocess of Caesarea, wherein he profess'd ingenuously, that he had embrac'd that Faith, which had been published in the Nicene Council? After the Nicene Synod, the Arians out of a fear of the Emperor, were for some little time quiet. Resuming their boldness presently, after they had by subtilty crept into the Prince's favour; by all ways and arts they began to persecute the Catholick Prelates. Their first assault was made against Eustathius Bishop of the City Antioch, who was eminent both for the Glory of Confession, and was also accounted the Chief amongst the Assertors of the Nicene Faith. Him therefore they accus'd before the Emperor, because he maintained Sabellius's Impiety, and because he had reproach'd Helena Augusta the Emperor's Mother. A numerous Assembly of Bishops is convened in the City of Antioch, in which presided Eusebius of Nicomedia, the Chief and Ring-leader of the whole Faction. Eusebius of Caesarea was likewise present at this Synod. Eustathius therefore having been accus'd by Cyrus Bishop of the Beroëans, because he held the impious Doctrine of Sabellius, and moreover an Accusation of (g) Incontinency having been framed against him, is thrust out of his own See. On which account a most impetuous Tumult is rais'd at Antioch; the People being divided into two Parties, some requesting Eusebius Bishop of Caesarea might be put into Eustathius's place; others desiring Eustathius into Bishops might be restored to them. And it had come to blows, had not a fear of the Emperor, and the Judges authority repress'd them. The Sedition being at length quieted, and Eustathius banish'd, Our Eusebius (although entreated both by the People, and by the Bishops also that were present, to undertake the Administration of the Antiochian Church, yet) refused to do that. And when the Bishops by Letters written to Constantine, had acquainted him both with their own [Vote,] and with the Suffrage of all the People; Eusebius wrote his Letters also to Constantine. Whereunto the Emperor Constantine gave answer, and highly commended Eusebius's Resolution. Eustathius having in this manner been deposed, which was done on the Year of Christ 330, as I have remark'd in my (h) Annotations; the Arians turn the violence of their Fury upon Athanasius. And in the first place they complain of his Ordination in the Prince's presence: then, that (i) he exacted an Imposit of a Linen Garment from the Provincials: that he had broken a sacred Cup: lastly, that he had murder'd one Arsenius a Bishop. Therefore Constantine, wearied with their most troublesome Complaints, indic'd a Council in the City of Tyre, and commanded Athanasius the med, in-Bishop to repair thither, to make his defence. In that Synod Eusebius Bishop of Caesarea amongst others, sat as Judge; whom Constantine had a mind should be present at that Council. Potamo Bishop of Heracleopolis (who had come thither with Athanasius the Bishop, and some Prelates of Egypt;) seeing him sitting in the Council, is said to have accus'd him in these words: [Is it fit,] Eusebius, that You should sit, and that the Innocent Athanasius should stand to be judg'd by You? Who can bear such things as these? Tell me, were not you in Custody with me during the time of the Persecution? And I lost an Eye in defence of the Truth; but you appear'd main'd in no part of your Body, nor did you undergo Martyrdom, but are alive and whole. By what means did you escape out of Prison? unless you promised our Persecutors that you would do the (k) detestable thing, and perhaps you have done it. These things are in this manner related by Epiphanius in the Heresie of the Meletians. From which words by the it appears, that they are mistaken who relate, that Our Eusebius had some time sacrific'd to Idols, and that that was openly objected against him in the Tyrian Synod. For Potamo accus'd not Eusebius, as if he had sacrific'd to Idols; but only his Dismissal out of Prison safe and whole, had given Potamo an occasion of suspecting that concerning him. Nevertheless 'tis possible that Eusebius might have been dismiss'd out of Prison by some other way, than that which Potamo has related. Farther, from Epiphanius's words it may, I think, be gather'd, that Eusebius Bishop of Caesarea presided at this Synod. For he adds, that Eusebius being sore vex'd at the bearing of these words, dismiss'd the Council. Yet from other Writers we have it for certain, that not Eusebius Bishop of Caesarea, but Eusebius of Nicomedia presided at the Tyrian Synod. After the Council held at Tyre, all the Bishops who had sat together there, by the Emperor's order betook themselves to Jerusalem, to celebrate the Consecration of that Great Church, which Constantine had erected in that place, in Honour of Christ. There Our Eusebius graced the Solemnity, by several Sermons which he made in the Church. And when the Emperor by most sharp Letters had summon'd the Bishops to his own Court, that in his presence they might give an account of those things, which by fraud and out of hatred they had transacted against Athanasius; Our Eusebius together with five others came to Constantinople, and certified the Prince concerning all Transactions. Then also he recited his Tricennal Oration in the Emperor's own presence, in the Palace. Wherein the Emperor hearken'd with the greatest joy imaginable, not so much in respect of his own, as God's Praises, whom Eusebius has magnified throughout that whole Oration. This was the Second Oration that Eusebius spoke in the Palace, as he himself attests in his Fourth

Bishops who had consecrated Constantine's Church at Jerusalem, that is on the Year of Christ 335, or else 336, as Baronius will have it. Indeed (e) Socrates acknowledges but Three Books of Eusebius against Marcellus; those namely which are entitled De Ecclesiastica Theologia: whereas nevertheless, the whole Work against Marcellus, was by Eusebius comprized in Five Books. Farther, of all Eusebius's Books, the last seem to be those Four concerning the Life of Constantine. For they were written after the Death of that Emperor, whom Eusebius did not long survive. For he died about the beginning of Constantius Augustus's Reign, a little before the Death of Constantine Junior, which hapned when Acindynus and Proculus were Consuls, on the Year of Christ 340; as may be gathered from Socrates's Second (f) Book. Now, what Scaliger says, in his Animadversions upon Eusebius, pag. 250. of the last Edition, that Eusebius's Books against Porphyrius were written under Constantius Son to Constantine the Great, cannot so easily be admitted of by us, in regard 'tis confirmed by the Testimony of our ancient Writer. But what the same Scaliger adds in that very place, that the Three last Books of the Evangelick Demonstration, the Eighteenth namely, Nineteenth, and Twentieth, were written by Eusebius against Porphyrius; therein he does manifestly blunder. St. Jerome (g) writes indeed, that Eusebius answered Porphyrius in Three Volumes, that is, in the Eighteenth, Nineteenth, and Twentieth; who in the Twelfth and Thirteenth of those Books which he published against the Christians, had attempted to confute the Book of the Prophet Daniel. But St. Jerome does not mean Eusebius's Books concerning Evangelick Demonstration, as Scaliger thought, but the Books he wrote against Porphyrius, which had this Title, 'Εὐσεβίου ἀποκρίσεις, [Books] of Confutation and Apology, as may be gather'd from Photius's Bibliotheca. Farther, I am of opinion, that these Books were written by Eusebius after his Ecclesiastick History: And this I conjecture from hence, because Our Eusebius in the Sixth (h) Book of his Ecclesiastick History, where he produces a famous Passage out of Porphyrius's Third Book against the Christians, makes no mention of those Books wherein he had answered Porphyrius: Whereas nevertheless, he is wont to be a diligent Quoter of his own Works, and does frequently refer the Studios to the reading of them. But because a fit opportunity presents it self, I have a mind to make some few Remarks here concerning his Books of Ecclesiastick History. For on their Account chiefly, all this Labour has been undertaken by us. Indeed, much hath been written by Our Eusebius for the profit and advantage of the Catholick Church, and in confirmation of the Truth of the Christian Faith; partly against the Jews, and partly against the Heathens. Nevertheless amongst all his Books, his Ecclesiastick History does deservedly bear away the Bell. For, before Eusebius, many Persons had written Books in defence of the Christian Faith, and by most cogent Reasons had confuted the Jews Contumacy, and the Error of the Heathens. But there was no person before Eusebius, who could deliver to Posterity an History of Ecclesiastick Affairs. On which account Our Eusebius is the more to be commended, who was both the first that found out this Subject; and also, after he had attempted it, left it entire and perfect in every respect. 'Tis certain, although many have been found after him, who, incited by his example, have undertaken to commit to writing Ecclesiastick Matter; (a) Chap. 16. For he had before made an Oration in the Palace concerning the Sepulchre of Our Lord: which the Emperor heard standing, nor could he ever be persuaded, though he was once and again entreated by Eusebius, to sit down in the Seats for him; saying, twas fit, that Discourses concerning God be heard by persons standing; as Eusebius relates in the thirty third Chapter of the same Book. Farther, how dear and acceptable Our Eusebius was to Constantine, may be known both from these Matters I have mentioned, and also from many other Circumstances: For he both frequently received Letters from him, which occur inserted in the forsaide Books. Nor was it seldom that he was sent for to the Palace, and entertained at Table, and honoured with private Discourse. Moreover, Constantine related that Vision of the Cross, which he saw in the Heaven at such time as he was making his Expedition against Maxentius, to Our Eusebius; and shew'd him the Labarum, which he had [order'd to be] made, to express the likeness of that Cross, as Eusebius himself does (b) attest. And when he wanted (c) Copies of the Sacred Scriptures for the use of these Churches which he had built at Constantinople, he committed the Care and Over-sight of transcribing them to Eusebius; in regard he well knew him to be most skillful in these matters. Lastly, when Our Eusebius had dedicated a (d) Book concerning the Feast of Easter to him, that Present was so acceptable to Constantine, that he ordered that Book to be forthwith translated into Latin; and by a Letter written to Eusebius entreated him, that he would as soon as possible communicate the Works of this nature which he was upon, to the Studios in Sacred Matters. About the same time Eusebius comprized a Description of the Jerusalem Church, and of the Sacred Gifts which had been consecrated there, in a final Book, and dedicated it to the Emperor Constantine. Which Book, together with his Tricennal Oration, he had placed at the Close of his Books concerning the Life of Constantine. But this Book is not now extant. At the same time also Five Books were written by Eusebius against Marcellus: The last three whereof De Ecclesiastica Theologia, he dedicated to Flaccillus Bishop of Antioch. Now Flaccillus entred upon that Bishoprick a little before the Synod of Tyre, which was convened in the Consulate of Constantius and Albinus, on the Year of Our Lord's Nativity 335. 'Tis certain, Eusebius (in his first Book against Marcellus De Ecclesiastica Theologia, Chap. 14.) writes in express words, that Marcellus had been deservedly condemned by the Church. Now Marcellus was first condemned in the Constantinopolitan Synod, by those very

ters; yet they have all begun their History from those times wherein our Eusebius had closed his Work: but the History of the foregoing times, which he had set forth in Ten Books, they have left to him entire and untouched. Wherefore, should any one have a mind to term him the Father and Founder of Ecclesiastick History, truly that person would seem to give him this surname not absurdly nor without cause. Now, what way Eusebius applied himself to this Subject, 'tis not hard to conjecture. For, whereas in the Last Part of his Chronical Canons, he had accurately noted the Time of Our Lord's Coming, and of his Passion; the Names also of the Bishops who had sat in the four chief Churches, and of the famous Men who had flourished in the Church; and lastly, in their own Time and Order had digested the Heresies and Persecutions wherewith the Church had been disquieted; He was led by the hand as 'twere, by little and little to the writing an Ecclesiastick History; that he might handle those matters more largely and copiously in his Ecclesiastick History, which in his Chronical Canons he had comprized in a Summary as 'twere. Indeed he had comprized in the (a) Preface to his Ecclesiastick History, does plainly shew that which I have said.

(a) Book 1. Chap. 1.

Where also he requests, that Pardon may be granted him by candid Readers, if peradventure he shall not so largely and copiously pursue and finish this Subject: For [ he says, ] that he was the first person who applied himself to this sort of Writing, and first began to walk in a way which had not before been worn by any one's Footsteps. But this may seem to some persons, not so much an Excuse and desire of Pardon, as an Endeavour to procure Praise and Glory. Further, notwithstanding it appears evident from Eusebius's own Testimony, that he wrote his Ecclesiastick History after his Chronological Canons; yet 'tis strange that Both those Works proceed to one and the same Limit, namely, to Constantine's Twentieth Year, which was the Year of Christ 325. That moreover may deservedly be wondered at, that although the Nicene Synod was celebrated on Constantine's (b) Vicennalia, yet no mention is made of it, either in his Chronicon, or Ecclesiastick History. For, whereas in his Latin Chronicon, at the Fifteenth Year of Constantine, these words occur; Alexandrinæ Ecclesiæ 19. ordinatur Episcopus Alexander, &c. Alexander is ordained the nineteenth Bishop of the Alexandrian Church; by whom Arius the Presbyter being ejected out of that Church, joyns many to his own Impiety. To confute the Perfidiousness of which persons, a Synod of 318 Bishops being convened at Nicæa a City of Bithynia, ruin'd all the subtil Devices of the Hereticks by the opposition of [the term] HOMŌOUSIOS: 'Tis plain enough, that those words were not written by Eusebius, but were added by St. Jerome, who interpolated Eusebius's Chronicon, by inserting many Passages on his own head. For, to omit that, namely, that the mention of the Nicene Synod is here set in a foreign and disagreeable place; who can ever believe, that Eusebius would have spoken in this manner concerning Arius, or would have inserted the term HOMŌOUSIOS into his own Chronicon? Which word always displeased him, as we shall see afterwards. How should Eusebius say, that there were three hundred and eighteen Bishops present at the Nicene Synod? when in his Third (c) Book concerning the Life of Constantine, he writes in most express words, that something more than two hundred and fifty sat in that Synod. Yet I don't doubt, but the Ecclesiastick History was finish'd by Eusebius some years after the Nicene Synod. But whereas Eusebius had resolv'd to close his History with that Peace which after Diocletian's Persecution shone from Heaven upon the Church, as he himself attests in the beginning of his Work; he designdly avoided mentioning the Nicene Synod, lest he should be compelled to set forth the Strifes and Brouils of the Bishops quarrelling one with another. For Writers of Histories ought chiefly to take care of and provide for this; that they may conclude their Work with an illustrious and glorious Close, as Dionysius Halicarnassensis has long since told us in his Comparison of Herodotus and Thucydides. Now, what more illustrious Event could be wish'd for by Eusebius, than that Peace which by Constantine had been restored to the Christians, after a most bloody Persecution; when the Persecutors being every where extinct, and last of all Licinius taken off, no fear of past Mischiefs was now left remaining? With this Peace therefore Eusebius chose to close his History, rather than with the mention of the Nicene Synod. For in that Synod the Divisions seem'd not so much compos'd, as renewed: And that, not by the fault of the Synod it self; but by their pertinacious Obstinacy who refus'd to acquiesce in the most wholesome Determinations of the Sacred Council. And let thus much suffice to have been said by us in reference to the Life and Writings of Eusebius.

It remains, that we speak something concerning his Faith and Orthodoxy. And in the first place, I would have the Readers know, that they are not to expect here from us a Defence of Eusebius. For it belongs not to us to (d) pronounce concerning matters of this nature, in regard in these things we ought rather to follow the Judgment of the Church and the Opinion of the Ancient Fathers. Wherefore we will set down some Heads only here, whereon relying as on some firm foundations, we may be able to determine with more of certainty concerning Eusebius's Faith. Whereas therefore the Opinions of the Ancient in reference to Our Eusebius are various; and some have thought, that he was a Catholic; others, an Heretick; others (e) Διπλωτωρ, that is a person of a doubtful and wavering Faith; we must enquire, to which Opinion chiefly we ought to assent. 'Tis a constant Rule of the Law, in doubtful matters the more favourable and milder Opinion ought to be embraced. Residet, whereas all the Westerns, St. Jerome only excepted, have entertain'd honourable Sentiments concerning Our Eusebius; and whereas the Gallican Church hath enrolled him amongst the number of Saints, as may be gathered from Victorinus Aquitanus, (f) Ufuardus, and others; without question 'tis better, that we should subscribe to the Judgment of our Fathers, than to that of the Eastern Schismatics. Lastly, Whose Authority ought to be greater in this matter, then that of the Bishops of Rome? But Geladius, in his Book De Dubus Naturis, has recounted Our Eusebius amongst the Catholic Writers, and has recited two Authorities out of his Books. Moreover, Pope Pelagius (g) terms him the most honourable amongst Historians, and pronounces him free from all spot of Heresy, notwithstanding he had highly commended heretical Origen. But some body will say, that the Judgment of the Easterns is rather to be followed, in regard the Easterns were better able to know Eusebius, as being a Man of their own language. But it may be answered, that there are not wanting some amongst the Easterns, who have thought well

(d) Judge, or give Sentence.

(e) Double tongue'd, or equivocal.

(f) In his Country.

(g) In Eastern, and in Western.

(c) See his Defence of him, in Book 2. Chap. 21. of Our Eusebius. Amongst whom is (c) Socrates and (d) Gelafius Cyzicenus. But, if the Judgment of the Seventh Oecumenical Synod be oppos'd against us, Our Answer is in readiness. For, Eusebius's Faith was not the Subject of that Synod's Debate, but the Worship of Images. In order to the overthrowing whereof, when the Adversaries a little before convened in the Imperial City, had produced an Evidence out of Eusebius's Letter to Constantia, and laid the greatest stress thereon; the Fathers of the Seventh Synod, that they might lessen the Authority of this Evidence, cry'd out, that Eusebius was an Arian. But they did this by the only, from the Occasion and Harred of that Letter; not designedly, or after a Cognizance of the Cause. They do indeed produce some Passages out of Eusebius, whereby they would prove, that he adhered to the Arian Opinion. But they make no difference between Eusebius's Books before the Nicene Council, and those he wrote after that Council; which nevertheless ought by all means to be done, to the end a certain and just Sentence might be pronounced concerning Eusebius's Faith. For, whatever he wrote before the Nicene Synod, ought not to be objected and charged as a Fault upon Eusebius. Further, Eusebius's Letter to Alexander, wherein he intercedes with him for Arius, was doubtless written before the Nicene Synod. Therefore, that Testimony of the Fathers of the Seventh Synod against Eusebius, although it has the greatest Authority, yet seems to us a rash Judgment, before the Matter was heard, rather than a Synodal Sentence. But the Greeks may have leave to think thus concerning Our Eusebius, and to call him a Borderer upon the Arian Heresie, or even an Arian. But who can with patience bear St. Jerome, who not content to term him Heretic and Arian, does frequently stile him a Ring-leader of the Arians? Can he be justly termed a Ring-leader of the Arians, who after the Nicene Synod always condemn'd the Opinion of the Arians? Let his Books De Ecclesiastica Theologia be perus'd, which he wrote against Marcellus long after the Nicene Council. We shall find what I have said, that they were condemn'd by him, who would affirm, that the Son of God was made of things which are not, and that there was a time when He was not. Athanasius does likewise attest the same thing concerning Eusebius, in his Letter about the Decrees of the Nicene Synod, in these words: Καὶ πρὸ τοῦ τῆς θεοῦ οὐκ ἀπολοῦντο, &c. And truly he was unhappy in that: For, to the end he might clear himself, he in future accus'd the Arians, because when they would maintain that the Son [of God] exist'd not before He was begotten, by this means they might deny Him to have exist'd before His Incarnation. And this is the Testimony which Athanasius gives Eusebius, who bore Eusebius a private Grudge. But St. Jerome, who had no Reasons of Harred against Eusebius, yea, who had profited so much from his Writings; who had rendred his Chronical Canon, and his Book De Locis Hebraicis into Latin; yet brands Eusebius with this Reproach, which even his most malicious Enemies never fasten'd on him. The Reason of which thing I am not able to find out, unless it be, that St. Jerome, having conceived an Hatred against Origen, beyond measure persecut'd

all the Defenders of his Opinions, and especially Our Eusebius. It must indeed be confess'd, that Our Eusebius (altho' he can't deservedly be term'd a Ring-leader of the Arians, yet) after the Nicene Synod was perpetually conversant with the Chiefs of the Arians, and together with them oppos'd the Catholic Bishops, Eustathius namely, and Athanasius, the principal Maintainers of HOMO OUSIOS. That also seems worthy of Reprehension in Eusebius, that altho' he always asserted the Eternity of the Son of God against the Arians, yet never heartily approv'd of the word HOMO OUSIOS. 'Tis certain, he has never made use of that Term, either in his Books against Marcellus, or in his Orations concerning the Faith against Sabellius: Yea, in his Second Book against Sabellius, he does plainly intimate, that that Word, in regard it occurs not in the Scriptures, is displeasing to him. For thus he says: Sic ut ergo de his quæ possunt quæri, incertum est non quærere, &c. As therefore concerning those Matters which may be search'd into, 'tis Sluggishness not to enquire: So, in reference to them which there is no necessity of searching into, 'tis boldness to enquire. What things then ought to be search'd into? Those which we find recorded in the Scriptures. But, what we don't find in the Scriptures, let us not search after. For, were it behoveable that they should be known to us, doubtless the Holy Spirit would have plac'd them in the Scriptures. And a little after he has these words: Let us not in such a manner expose our selves to danger, but let us speak safely. But if any thing be written, let it not be blotted out. And in the end of his Oration he expresses himself in this manner: Speak what is written, and the Controversie will be ended. In which words Eusebius, no doubt, touches upon the term HOMO OUSIOS. But now, if you please, let us hear the Testimonies of the Ancients concerning Eusebius: Wherein this is chiefly to be remark'd, altho' the Judgments of Aduersaries concerning Our Eusebius have been various, in reference to the Purity of the Ecclesiastick Opinions; yet all do unanimously give him the Commendation of most profound Learning. One only Person, Joseph Scaliger, has liv'd in our Father's Memory; who, hurried on with a rash Boldness and Lust of Reproaching, has endeavour'd to deprive Eusebius of this Glory of his Learning, which even his Adversaries never envied him. His (d) Words, if (d) See any one be desirous of knowing them, we have Scaliger's placed amongst the Testimonies of the Ancients. Elench. Tribes. not that we have any great value for his Judgment, in this Particular especially; but with this and Book Design rather, that his unreasonable Detraction might be exposed to publick view. Who having resolv'd me to write Comments on Eusebius's Chronical Canon, in the very Entrance of that Work re- about the proves St. Jerome, because he hath term'd Eusebius a most Learned Man. And at first I had in- his Avowed determin'd, to have reason'd at large against his asser- Scaliger, and to have confuted his Opinion by a more copious Answer. But in regard that Matter niceon, pag. requires a greater Leisure, and would peradventure be tedious to the Readers, it will be more opportunely deferr'd to another time.

SOME OBSERVATIONS

in Reference to the

GEOGRAPHICAL PART

Ecclesiastical Histories

EUSEBIUS, SOCRATES, and EVAGRIUS,

And to the M A P S thereunto adjoin'd.

FOR the better understanding the Geographical Part of the Ecclesiastical Histories herewith publish'd, it may be of use, at least to such as have but little insight into Geography, to make the following Observations.

I. That it is very usual to have the Names of Places somewhat varied by various Authors, and that especially as to their Termination. Hence we find the same Place by some termed Cyzicus, by others Cyzicum; so Astacus and Astacum; Mopsucrene and Mopsucrena; Arca or Arce, and Arcaæ. And so in other Syllables besides the last, Sardica and Serdica; Emesa and Emisa; Cyrrus, Cyrrus, and Cyrrhus, &c. And hither may be refer'd the different rend'ring of the same Word: For instance, the City, where the first General Council was held, is sometimes render'd in English (literally agreeable to the Greek) Nicea, sometimes more short Nice; so Antiochia and Antioch, Thracia and Thrace, &c. The same Greek Word is also differently render'd as to 'spelling, viz. Sardes and Sardis; Laodicea and Laodices; Apamea, Apamea, and Apamia, &c. From this Observation the Reader may easily infer, that he is not to look on Words, that are thus a little varied, to denote presently so many various Places; and consequently is not to expect all these Variations in the Mapps hereunto belonging.

II. Names of Places are frequently corrupted, or falsly written, through the Ignorance, or at least Heedlessness of Transcribers. Here are not wanting Footsteps of it in these Histories. To instance but in one place, Chap. 25. B. 3. of Socrates's History, where we find mention made of the Bishop of Zene, corruptly for Zede; of the Bishop of Sippi, corruptly for Hippi, as Valesius has observ'd; and of the Bishop of Antros for Adra, as Valesius conjectures; and of Εὐαγρίου Σικελῆς, or as some Copies have it, Σικελῶν, which Reading Valesius prefers, and saith, that Siculi is the name of a City in the East, Concerning which (adds he) I have yet met with nothing. Now if it seems not so probable, that Ἀντρίου (as it is in the Greek) should be writ for Ἀδραν or Ἀδρανδῆς, as Valesius conjectures; what if it should be supposed to be rather written for Ἀναγρίου, the Mistake being but little, and so easie; and we have not only such a Town as Ἀναγρίον mention'd by Ptolemy in Galatia, but we there find it also writ Andrus, or Antrus; and placed not far from Ancyra, the Bishop whereof is mention'd in the same place, and on the same account by Socrates. And as to Εὐαγρίου Σικελῆς, 'tis certain, that sometimes the Western Bishops were upon some occasion or other in the Eastern Parts, and therefore Σικελῆς may possibly be not only the common, but truest Reading, and denote that the said Evagrius was a Sicilian Bishop. And supposing Σικελῶν to be the true Reading, the same Interpretation may hold, as may be prov'd. But if we will with Valesius rather suppose Σικελῆς or Σικελῶν, to denote here some City in the East; then perhaps we may meet with something concerning it, when we find in Ptolemy, a City on the Euphrates, call'd Κικυλία; and we may suppose the Original Reading in Socrates, to have been Κικλῆς or Κικλῆς, or Κικλῶν or Κικλῶν from which Σικελῆς or Σικελῶν (or Σικελῶν or Σικελῶν) is an easie change. And this Conjecture is made the more probable, because there are here mention'd by Sacerates the Bishops of Samofata and Urima, both which lay likewise on the same River, somewhat above Cecilia or Cicelia. To this corruption of Names, or else to the variation of Names observed under the first Head, ought to be refer'd (as I am inclin'd to think) the words Avares, or Abares, or Abari, or Abasgi; which may not improbably have been the same People; and I find others of this Opinion. For which reason Abasgi is not mention'd in the Maps, but only Abares.

III. The Names of Countries are, many or most of them, taken in different Senses, according to the several Divisions made at several times. Thus Illyricum, which once denoted only a Province lying on the East of the Adriatick Gulf, came in time to denote many and large Provinces. Hence the Reader is not to wonder, if he finds Sirmium sometimes reckon'd a City of Pannonia, sometimes of Illyricum; Sardica or Serdica, sometimes fill'd a City of Thrace, sometimes also of Illyricum; namely, because Illyricum in its largest acceptation included all Pannonia, and that part of Thrace, wherein Sardica stood. On the contrary Syria, which most anciently denoted all that Tract, which lay from the River Euphrates to Egypt, between Arabia Deserta Eastward, and the Mediterranean Sea Westward, came afterwards to be restrain'd simply and properly only to a small part of it, namely about Antioch. Hence what is stiled by one Writer simply Palestine, by another is stiled Syria-Palestine; and the same City is reckon'd by one, as appertaining to Phoenicia-Libanensis, by another to Calestria, or as it is sometimes plac'd Syria-Cele, by a third, a City of Syria in general, &c. Now to have taken notice of all this variety of Divisions in the Maps, would only have perplexed them, and so render'd them less useful. Therefore in them I have set down only such Divisions, as are generally made use of by the Ecclesiastical Writers. The others may be best learnt from the Notitia, which is (I think) intended to be publish'd with these Histories; and also from the Division of the Roman Empire, made by Constantine the Great; part whereof is to be seen in Valesius's Notes, p. 332. 2. But because the Knowledge of that Division is of good use to the understanding Ecclesiastical Affairs, therefore I shall here give it the Reader all together in one view, so far forth as seems requisite for him to know.

The Roman Empire was divided by Constantine the Great into Four General Parts, two whereof made up afterwards the Western Empire, the other two, the Eastern, viz.

The WESTERN Empire.
(1.) The Prefecture or Government of the Praefectus Praetorio Italiae , distinguished into three Dioceses, viz.	The Diocese of Italy, or All Italy, the Isles Sicily, Sardinia, & Italian Diocese, comprehending The Diocese of Illyricum , comprehending The Diocese of Africa , including
(2.) The Prefecture of the Praefectus Praetorio Galliarum , distinguished into three Dioceses, viz.	All Old Gaul, with the Alpes Graiae &amp; Maritimae . All Old Spain, with the Insulae Baleares , i. e. Majorca , Minorca , & Mauritania Tingitana . All Britain, that was under the Roman Government.
The EASTERN Empire.
(3.) The Prefecture of the Praefectus Praetorio Orientis , distinguished into five Dioceses, viz.	Africa Proper, the Hellestianick Province with the Isles, Phrygia Pacatiniana & Salutaris , Lydia , Caria , Lycia , Pamphylia , Pisidia , Lycania . Bithynia , Honorias , Pontagonia , * Galatia , Galatia Salutaris , Helenepontrus , Pontus Polemoniacus , Cappadocia Prima &amp; Secunda , Armenia Prima &amp; Secunda . Cilicia Prima &amp; Secunda , Isauria , Syria Proper , Comagena or Euphratensis ; Syria Salutaris ; Phoenice Maritima , & Libanensis ; Palestina Prima , Secunda , & Salutaris ; Osrhoene , or Osdracae , Mesopotamia , Arabia Petraea , the Isle Cyprus . Egypt Proper, Augustamnica , Arcadia , Thebais , Libya Superior & Inferior . Europa , Thracia Proper , Hæmimons , Rhodia , Mesia Secunda , Scythia Proper .

(4.) The Prefecture of the Præfectus Prætorio Illyrici , distinguish'd into two Dioceses, viz.	 The Dacian Diocese, containing The Diocese of Macedonia, including 	  Mæsia Prima, Dacia Ripensis &amp; Mediterranea, Dardania, Prævalitana, and Part of Macedonia Salutaris.   Achaia, Macedonia Parva or Proper, Thesaly, Crete Isle, Epirus Vetus or Inferior, Epirus Nova or Superior, and the other part of Macedonia Salutaris.

It is to be observ'd, that before the Division of the Roman Empire between Honorius and Arcadius, to the Government of the Præfectus Prætorio Illyrici did also belong the Illyrican Diocese, which was afterwards taken from this Præfect, and added to the Government of the Præfectus Prætorio Italiae, as is above-mention'd.

IV. From the foregoing Division may be easily learn'd the Reason, why in the Ecclesiastical Histories, mention is sometimes made of Mauritania, Libya, Africa, and so of Britannia, Gallia, and Spania, &c. in the singular; sometimes of the Mauritania's, Libya's, Africa's, and so of the Britannia's, Gallia's, Hispania's, &c. in the Plural. Namely, Both ways of speaking amount to the same, the former having a respect to the whole Countries consider'd together, as denoted by their general Names; the latter having respect to the said Countries, as distinguished into several Divisions or Parts, by some Epithet added to the general Name for distinction-sake; thus we find in the foregoing Division of the Empire, three Mauritania's, viz. Tingitana, Cæsariensis, and Stifensis; two Libya's, viz. Superior, and Inferior, &c. And so Britain was divided into Britannia Prima, Secunda, Flavia Cæsariensis, Maxima Cæsariensis, and Vakmia: Gallia into (G) Lugdunensis Prima, Secunda, Tertia, and Quarta; Aquitania Prima, and Secunda mention'd by Socrates, &c. And here it may be of use to note, that altho' Gallia be sometimes translated France, and Hispania sometimes Spain; yet neither does Present France include all Gallia or Old Gaul; nor Present Spain include all Hispania or Old Spain.

V. It is to be observed, that the same Division has sometimes several Names, whereof one is used by one Writer, another by Another, accordingly as the use of this or that Name prevail'd in the time wherein that Writer liv'd. Thus Libya Superior and Inferior, mention'd above in the Egyptian Diocese, are sometimes stiled Cyrenæica, and Marmarica; and Cyrenæica again is otherwise stiled Pentapolis or Libya Pentapolitana. And hence it is, that in reckoning up the Parts of a Country, we often find them differently expressed.

VI. I am inclin'd to think, that the Title of the 12th Chapter of Eusebius's Second Book is somewhat corrupted. It stands at present thus, περί ἑκλυσῆς τῆς τῶν Ὀρεινῶν βασιλείας, whereas I am apt to think, that either Ὀρεινῶν is a corrupt reading for Ἀσιαβωνῶν; or else that the Original reading was only περί ἑκλυσῆς τῆς βασιλείας, and that τῶν Ὀρεινῶν being added (as was intended, though erroneously) by way of Explication in some Copy, crept at length into the Body of the Title. We find this same Person in the beginning of the Chapter stiled simply ἡ βασιλισσα Ἑκλυσῆς; and at the very close of the Chapter we are told, that τῇ Ἀδιὰβην-τῶν ἐδ' ὅς ἐστι βασιλεύουσα ἐκλυσῆς. And so she is all along stiled Queen of Adiabene by Josephus the Historian. But Adiabene, or Osroene were not the same Countries, but different.

VII. Whereas, on that Passage of Socrates B. 7. Chap. 22.—When the Bishop of Chebron had ended his Life,—Valesius makes this Remark, This City, and the Name of this Bishop, are equally unknown to me: I am not aware at present of any thing, that hinders us from taking this City to be no other, than the City Hebron in Palestine, or the Holy Land, so famous in the History of the Old Testament. Sure I am, that this City is writ both by the LXX Interpreters, and by Josephus ἡβὲρ, just as it is here in the Greek of Socrates, excepting that the Accent is different, which is of no great moment, since a Mistake therein is so very easie. To confirm this Opinion, several Considerations might be offer'd, was it needful.

VIII. Whereas Socrates, B. 2. Chap. 37. relates, that the Ursacians left Italy, went into the Eastern Parts, and arrived at a City of Thrace, the Name whereof was Nice, where they published a Creed;—their Design being to impose on the simpler sort of People by the likeness of the Cities name, namely to Nice in Bitlynia: Neither Ptolemy, nor any of the Notitia's, or other Geographical Books by me, mention any such City in Thrace. In the Pentingerian Tables, there is indeed a Nicea or Nice, placed between Larissa and Thessalonica, and so in the Road from Italy to Thrace, but then 'tis an Error in Socrates to place it in Thrace, when it lay in Macedonia, West of Thessalonica. If the City meant was not this, but did lie in Thrace, then perhaps it was no other than Nicopolis, surnam'd ad Nesum, which lay much in the same Road, and which is a Compound, denoting much the same as Nicæa means or the City Nicæa or Nice distinctly. And such Persons, as would go about to impose on the simpler sort of People, by the likeness of Names, would not stick at making use of such a Quibble, as to denote Nicopolis by the City Nice.

And

And thus I have made such Observations, as occur'd to me, whilst I was drawing up the Maps, and seem useful to such Readers, as are less vers'd in the Study of Geography. I shall conclude, by taking this Opportunity to offer to the Judicious one Consideration, viz. Whether since Geography does so much depend on the Revolutions of Governments, and the several Divisions of Countries, that have been made thereupon, through the several Ages of the World; the most proper way to bring Geography to such Perfection, as it is capable of, would not be this; namely, To begin with the most Ancient Authors or Writers, and from them to gather (as far forth as may be) the State of Geography in their times, then to descend to the Writers of the next Age or Ages, and by comparing these with the other, to learn what Changes had been made in Geography, during that Interval; and so to compile a Body of Geography, the several Sections whereof should treat of, and by proper Maps represent the several Faces of Geography, according to the several succeeding Ages of the World. This, I conceive, to be as proper a Method as any can be taken, not only to perfect Geography, as far as may be; but also to convey to the Studious an easie, and withal distinct and clear Notion of it. Besides which, there will also arise another very considerable Advantage from such a Work, when drawn up; I mean this, That whatever Historian a Man shall take in hand, he need but be inform'd, in what Age, or of what Age the Historian wrote, and then by having recourse to that Section of the foremention'd Body or System of Geography, which appertains to that Time, he may thereby be presently taught to understand the Geographical Part of the History he is reading. 'Tis obvious, that such a Work would require not only a great deal of Pains and Time, but also a great deal of Somewhat Else, absolutely necessary to furnish the Compiler with those many and chargeable Materials, that are requisite for him to have. And 'tis as obvious, that the Considerations to be expected from a Bookseller, will not amount to a sufficient Encouragement for such an Undertaking. And hence it comes to pass, that as History is esteem'd a most useful part of Learning, and Geography one of the Eyes of History, without which he that reads any History, must be necessarily much in the Dark; so any King that has been so happy as to consult both his own Glory, and his Peoples Good, by becoming a Promoter of Learning, hath hereupon judg'd it requisite, among his other Pensioners of Learning, to have also a Regius Geographus. And I need not stand to acquaint the Learned, what Service has been done by such to Geography, and so to Learning in general.

CHAPTER I.

The Subject of this Work.

THE Successions of the Holy Apostles, together with the Series of times continued from our Saviour to our age, and how many and great things are said to have been done, agreeable to the Subject of an Ecclesiastical History, and who have eminently governed and presided over the Church, especially in the most famous

(a) I cannot approve of Christophorus's translation, who renders the word [παροικία] Provinces. Neither am I pleased with the amendment of Carterius, or whoever it was that translated it [Churches.] Indeed παροικία signifies a Church amongst Christian Writers, and particularly in our Eusebius, not in one place. The original of which signification came from hence, as I judge; because the Church is as it were, παροικία, a Stranger or Sojourner in the earth; but its country and freedom is in heaven. Hence we often meet with this phrase in our Eusebius, ἐκκλησία παροικῶν ἐν ἐσσηνῶν, Book 4. and B. 4. Chap. 23. And Clement, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, writes thus; ἡ ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν παροικίᾳ ὡς ἡμεῖς. But in this place of Eusebius we must not translate this word [παροικία] Churches. For then the same word must be repeated twice in the same clause, thus — We have governed and presided over the Church especially in the most famous Churches. I should rather translate it [Cities or Seats] or, with Rufinus, in celebrated localities, in the most famous places. Sometimes this word is taken for the whole Diocese, as it occurs in Eusebius in very many places; and in several other Authors: sometimes it is taken in a more strict sense, not for the whole Diocese, but for one particular Church: So Apolonius in his Book against the Catapbrygians, whose Words Eusebius quotes Chap. 18. B. 5. In both these senses the word is used amongst the Latins. See Jac. Sermonius in his notes on the last Epistle of Sedonius. Valef. See J. G's Notes on Ridley's view of the Civil Law. p. 152. Edit. Oxford, 1634.

besides all this, the Martyrdoms that have happened in our own times, together with the merciful and benign assistance of our Saviour graciously exhibited towards every one: These things, I say, I determining to publish in writings, will not take my entrance from any other place, than from the very (b) Incarnation of our Lord and Saviour Jesus, who is the Christ of God. But truly even in the beginning we must modestly crave pardon; for we confess ingenuously, it is far beyond our strength to finish what we design and promise perfectly and completely, so as to omit nothing. For we taking this argument in hand first, adventure to tread a solitary and untrodden way, praying that God may be our guide, and the power of our Lord our present help and aid; but we can no where find so much as the bare steps of any men who have passed the same path before us: excepting only some small shews and tokens divers here and there have left us, particular declarations of the times they lived in, holding forth as it were Torches a far off, and lifting up their voices from on high, and calling as out of a Watch-tower to direct us what way we ought to go, and how without error or danger to order our discourse. Whatsoever things therefore we think will be expedient for this present argument, these we carefully chusing, as they are here and there by them mentioned, and culling and gathering the commodious and fit are sentences of former Writers, as it were flowers out of Wisdoms Meadows, we will endeavour by an Historical narration to compact the same into one body, resting well contented to preserve from oblivion the Successions, although not of all, yet of the most famous Apostles of our Saviour in those Churches which is taken in a larger sense, and comprehends the whole Life of Christ among Men. Nicephorus therefore (B. 1. Chap. 2.) has rightly used, instead of this phrase here in Eusebius, this [τοῦ ἐν σαρκὶ κατεσθαι] word, in his dissertation adversus Tryphon. p. 331. Clement in the 6. of his Stromata. And Irenaeus, Lib. 1. Cap. 10. calls the passion of Christ, ἡ ἐν σαρκὶ. So Chrysostom in his second Homily on Matt. and Gryll, in his 6. B. against Julian, pag. 213. and Origen, in the beginning of his 11. Tome of his Commentaries on John. Valef.

(f) Valefius, that either the unbegotten and immutable (f) person or nature of God Almighty should transform himself into the likeness of man, and so by an appearance in a bodily shape deceive the eyes of the beholders; or that the Scripture should feign such things falsely; then that God and Lord, who judgeth the whole earth, and executeth judgment, appearing in the shape of man, who else can

he be call'd, (for it is not lawful to say it of the first Author of all things) but only his pre-existent Word? Of whom also it is said in the Psalms, Hesent forth his Word and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions. The same Moses plainly calleth Lord, next after the Father, saying, The Lord rained brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven upon Sodom and Gomorrah. The same doth the Divine Scripture call God, appearing again unto Jacob in the figure of a man, and saying unto Jacob, Thy name shall be no more called Jacob, but Israel shall be thy name, because thou hast prevailed with God. At which time Jacob named that place the Vision of God, saying, For I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved. Moreover, neither is it lawful once to furnish that the apparitions of God in the Scripture may be attributed to the inferior Angels and Ministers of God: for neither doth the Scripture, if at any time any of them appeared unto men, conceal the same; expressly saying, not that God, or the Lord, but that Angels spake; which may easily be confirm'd by innumerable testimonies. This same also doth Jesús the Successor of Moses term Chief Captain of the great power of the Lord, as Prince of Celestial Angels, and Arch-Angels, and all supernatural Powers, and as being the Power and Wisdom of the Father, and to whom the second place in the rule and government of all things is committed, when as he beheld them in no other form or figure than of Man. For thus it is written; *And it hapned when Joshua was in Jericho, he lifted up his eyes, and beheld a man standing over against him, having a naked sword in his hand. And Joshua coming unto him said, Art thou on our side, or on our adversaries? And he said unto him, As Chief Captain of the Hosts of the Lord I am now come hither. And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and said unto him, Lord, what commandest thou thy servant? And the Captain of the Lords host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place where thou standest is an holy place. By these words thou may'st by an attentive consideration perceive, that this person did not differ (g) from him who deliver'd his Oracles* as Eusebius would here prove, that he who appeared to Joshua the Son of Nun, and called himself the Captain of the Hosts of the Lord, was the same that appeared to Moses in the Bush. Now he concludes this from hence, because this Captain of the Lord's Host used the same Words to Joshua, that God did to Moses in the Bush. So, before Eusebius, supposed Justin Martyr, in his Disputat. adversus Tryphon, and others, as Theodoret witnesseth, in his questions on the Book of Joshua. But the rest of the Fathers thought this Captain of the Hosts of the Lord was not the Son of God, but rather Michael the Arch-Angel. In the most ancient Mar. M. S. there is at these words, a Scholion put, which I thought good here to translate. But the Church, O holy Eusebius, thinks otherwise concerning this, and not as thou dost. For him that appeared to Moses in the Bush, the Church concludes to be God; but him that appeared to Moses's successor in Jericho, to whom the presidency over the Hebrews was allotted, who had his sword drawn, and commanded Joshua to put off his shoe, him, I say, the Church supposeth to be Michael the Arch-Angel: And it's manifest that it thinks righter than thou. Whence is this gathered? God, that appeared in the Bush in the form of Fire, being asked by his servant Moses, who he was, most evidently declared this unto him, That he was God. But he that appeared to Joshua, in no wise styles himself God, but calls himself God's chief Captain. But this Dignity being inferior to the supreme Power and Divinity, and being not Regal, but belonging to a General, as one would say ..... The rest, by reason of the great age of the M. S. could not be read, which indeed is great pity. For it is both amply elegant Scholion, and also written by the hand of that very Antiquary who wrote out the M. S. that is, by a most learned and ancient hand. Valef.

to Moses. For of him also the Scripture speaketh the same words; *When the Lord saw that that he Exod. 3. came for to see, God called to him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses; and he answered, what is it? And he said, come not nigh hither; put thy shoes off thy feet for the place where thou standest is holy ground. And he said unto him, I am the God of thy fathers; the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.* Now that there is a certain Essence living and subsisting before the foundations of the world were laid, which ministered unto the Father and the God of all the creation of all creatures, termed the Word, and the Wisdom of God; beside the before produc'd demonstrations, Wisdom herself, in her proper person by Solomon plainly speaking and delivering her mysteries after this manner, is to be heard: *I Will Prov. 8. have fix'd a Tabernacle: Council, Knowledge and Understanding I have by calling allured unto me. Through me Kings do reign, and Princes decree justice. Through me Princes bear rule on earth. To this she addeth, The Lord himself solemnized me the beginning of his 22, 23, &c. ways, for the accomplishing of his works; I have been ordained before the foundations of the world were laid, and from the beginning; or ever the earth was made, before the well-springs flowed out, before the foundations of the mountains were firmly set, and before all hills, began to be me. When he spread and prepared the heavens, I was present with him; and when he bound in due order the depths under heaven I was by, composing all things; I was she in whom he duly delighted; rejoicing continually before his face, when he rejoiced at the perfect finishing of the world. That therefore the Word of God subsisted before all things, and that to some he appear'd, tho' not to all men; let thus much suffice at this time to have been by us briefly deliver'd. (b) (b) The Mar. Med. and Frib. MSS. begin the third Chapter at these words, to which agrees the Edit. of Robert Stephens. But in that I saw the title of the third Chapter did not agree with this place. I judg'd it should be placed lower; which also Christophorus did. *Valef.

Now for what cause he was not preach'd of old unto all men, and unto all nations as now he is, thus it shall evidently appear: That ancient Generation of men was not able to receive the most wise and most excellent Doctrine of Christ. For immediately in the very beginning, after that primitive happy state of life, the first man, being careless of the commandment of God, fell into this mortal and frail life, and chang'd this cursed earth for those heavenly delights and pleasures of old. And his posterity, when they had replenish'd this world, appear'd far worse, one or two excepted; they gave admision to certain savage and brutish manners, and led a life not worthy to be call'd life: And moreover they busied not their minds to erect either City or Common-wealth, nor to profit in Arts or Sciences. They had not amongst them so much as the name either of Laws or Statutes, or moreover of Virtue, or Philosophy; but wandering in deserts, they lived like wild and fierce Savages: they corrupted their natural understanding, and the seeds of reason and gentleness fowle in man's mind, with their excessive wilful malice, yielding up themselves wholly to all abominable wickedness: sometimes they defiled one anothers bodies, sometimes they shed one anothers blood, and sometimes they spared not to devour one anothers flesh, yea they audaciously undertook to wage war with God, and attempted those Gigantick combats so much talk'd of, determining in their ruined and tainted with old customs, figures, and signs of a kind of mystical Sabbath, and Circumcision, and Introductions unto other intelligible contemplations, but not the perfect and plain initiation into the sacred Doctrines. But when the Law, famous among them, was publish'd abroad, and diffused, like a most sweet odour amongst all men, and thereby many of the

Gentiles then had their (n) minds and manners civiliz'd by Law-makers and Philosophers every where, and their rude and brutish savageness chang'd into a meek and mild temper and behaviour, so that there ensued perfect peace and friendship and mutual commerce amongst them; then at the last to all men, and to the Gentiles throughout all the world, as it were now prepared and fitted to receive the knowledge of the Father, the same person again, the Schoolmaster of Virtue, his Father's Minister in all goodness, the Divine and Celestial Word of God manifested himself about the beginning of the Roman Empire, in human shape, for bodily substance nothing differing from our nature, and therein wrought and suffer'd such things as were consonant with the Oracles of the Prophets, who foresaw'd there should come into the world such a one as should be both Man and God, a mighty Worker of miracles, an Instructor of the Gentiles in the worship of his Father; and withal they foretold his Miraculous Birth, his New Doctrine, his wonderful Works, more over the manner also of his death, his resurrection from the dead, and last of all, his glorious and divine return into Heaven. The Prophet Daniel therefore by the Divine Spirit beholding his Kingdom that shall be in the latter age of the world, having been mov'd by the power of that Divine Spirit, hath thus more after the manner of man, and to man's capacity describ'd the vision of God.

For I beheld (saith he) until the Thrones were placed, Dan. 7. 9. and the Ancient of days sat therein: his garments were as the white snow, the hairs of his head as pure wool; his throne a flame of fire, his wheels burning fire. A fiery stream issued before his face. Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: The judgement was set, and the Books were opened. And afterwards, I beheld, (saith he) and behold, one coming in the clouds like the Son of Man; and he came unto the Ancient of days, and he was brought before him: and to him was given Principality and Honour, and Rule; and all People, Tribes, and Tongues shall serve him: his

Power

(i) It's strange, that in the Translation of this place both Masculus and Christophorus occurred. Εσχαριζεν (which is the term here us'd) in Greek signifies, to make a Fortification, or to build against a place; See Harpocration, in the word εσχαριζεν. But it's ridiculous to believe, that Men arriv'd to that degree of madness, as by building Rampires to attempt to scale Heaven, and to turn out God from thence; which yet Eusebius seems by this place to have believed. There are the letters of the Poets, who by this title would set forth the pride of Men of that Age, and their contempt of God. Indeed Holy Writ mentions the Giants, but it says nothing of this sort concerning them; and it testifies that that Tower was built, not by the Giants, but by the Sons and Posterity of Noah, after the Flood. Vale!

(k) The term in the Original is [εσχαριζεν] and it signifies Fortification; it is the same in Robert Stephens Edit. But Eusebius says it should be [εσχαριζεν] which he translates (topos) i. e. a foolish heaviness, for he says he, it is written in the Euk, and Savil, M. SS.

(l) I doubt not but Eusebius wrote it thus [εσχαριζεν & οὐκ εστιν, i. e. the Pre-existent Wisdom of God] as it is in our four M. SS. Maz, Med, Euk, and Savil, and not [εσχαριζεν], i. e. the first produced, &c. for this term agrees better with Eusebius's meaning, seeing that he had a little above quoted that place out of the Proverbs (Chap. 8. v. 22.) The Lord himself [said] I was, &c. Indeed, the Ancient Divines, and especially those who wrote before the times of the Nicene Council, by the word [εσχαριζεν] understood, not only a Creation which is made of nothing, but, all Production in general, as well that which was from all eternity, as that which is produced in time. Hence it is, that Helio wrote a Book οὐκ εστιν εἰς γενεαν γενεας [as we shall see at the 4th Book of this History. But if we should here read [εσχαριζεν], there would be an unmet repetition, which is called a Tautology, thus [οὐκ εστιν εἰς γενεαν γενεας], &c. Besides, [εσχαριζεν] is an unmet term to express the Divine Generation. Vale!

(m) Nice the Hebrews had now added themselves to the worship of God, He, by the Prophet Moses, deliv'ring this place ver'd unto them, as unto a multitude, yet (n) confirmed, as if it had been spoken by Eusebius in praise of the Jews: But the words of Eusebius have a clean contrary meaning. For he says, that the Jews being corrupted by the contagion of their former life, God thought it best to prescribe them legal Ceremonies, and to deliver them as it were certain Signs and Symbols of more secret Mysteries, as being yet ignorant, and accustomed to the Superstition of the Aethiops. Chrysostome, on Matthew, says the same 'Εδιδασκην, from whence the Discipline here used comes, signifies in Greek, to be corrected, and from a military discipline to fall into a luxurious and dissolute course of life. From whence [εσχαριζεν & οὐκ εστιν εἰς γενεαν γενεας] is a phrase taken from intemperate Men, who observe no rule in meat and drink, nor in their whole course of life. This word occurs often in the Writings of Dion Cassius. Vale!

(n) Translators understood not this place, as it appears from their Version of it. The meaning of Eusebius here is this. He attributes not so much to the Law-makers and Philosophers of the Gentiles, as if that old Savageness and Inhumanity of Men were by little and little brought to be more tractable and gentle by their Precepts and Institutes. But he imputes the reason hereof to the Law of Moses; which, being known to the whole World, at length reclaimed and civilized the manners of all

For the Law-makers and Philosophers of the Gentiles, having derived all their best precepts from that Law, as from a fountain, insisted there afterwards into the minds of their Auditors: whereby Men being polished, were rendered fit to receive the knowledge of the Evangelical Law. For the Mosaic Law was previous and the forerunner to the Evangelical, and prepared the way to Christ's Preaching. This place therefore is to be thus written [Τοις παλαιοις οὐκ εστιν εἰς γενεαν γενεας τὸ θεῖον εἰς αὐτοὺς παρὰ τοὺς νόμους τοὺς ἐννοούμενους] which is plainly written in the Maz, Med, Euk, and Savil, M. SS. and not, as it is in Robert Stephens's Edit. thus [εσχαριζεν & οὐκ εστιν εἰς γενεαν γενεας]. Undoubtedly, unless it be thus written, the sentence will be incoherent. For to what shall the Particle [εἰς] be referred, which is put in the beginning of the Period? There is also another difficulty in this place of Eusebius, that is, what is meant by these words [εἰς αὐτοὺς]. For Eusebius says [οὐκ εστιν εἰς αὐτοὺς καὶ τοις παλαιοις], &c. as before. Which Words, as to me it seems, were put in, that Eusebius might shew, that whatever was say'd by the Law-makers and Philosophers of the Gentiles, they borrow'd it all from the Hebrews. And thus Kusinus understood this place, and thus plainly appears from his Translation. Eusebius discourses largely concerning this Point in his Book, De Preparatione, where he shews that the Greek Philosophers stole many things out of the Books of Moses. Vale!

Power is an everlasting Power which shall not pass, and his Kingdom shall never be destroyed. These things can manifestly be referred to none other than to our Saviour, the Word that was in the Beginning with God, God the Word, term'd the Son of Man by reason of his Incarnation in the latter times. But because we have

(a) He means his Books of the Evangelical Demonstration, of which ten are now extant. Moreover, this Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius ought to be so much the more esteemed by us, because he wrote it after almost all his other Works. Valef.

C H A P. III.

That the very name of Jesus, and also that of Christ was from the Beginning both known and honour'd among the Divine Prophets.

(a) In the (a) NOW that the name both of Jesus, and also of Christ, was of old honour'd among the Prophets below'd of God, it is now an opportune time to declare. First of all Moses, knowing the name of Christ to be most especially venerable and glorious, when he delivered Types and Symbols of heavenly things, and mystical forms, agreeable to

Exod. 25. the Divine Oracle that said to him, See thou do all things after the fashion that was shewed thee in the Mount, the man whom he entitl'd (as much as he lawfully might) the High-Priest of God, the same he stitl'd Christ: and thus to the dignity of High-Priesthood, which excell'd in his judgment all other prerogatives among men, he for honour and glory put to the name of Christ. So then he deem'd Christ to be a certain Divine thing. The same Moses also, when being inspired by the Holy Ghost, he had well foreseen the name of Jesus, judg'd again the same worthy of singular prerogative. For this name of Jesus, which before Moses's time had never been named among men, Moses gave to him first, and to him alone, whom he knew very well by type again and figurative sign was to receive the Universal Principality after his death. His Successor therefore, before that time not call'd Jesus, but by another name, to wit, (b) Aulfe, which his Parents had given him, he call'd Jesus, giving him this appellation as a singular title of honour far passing all Royal Diadems, because that same Jesus, the son of Nave bore the figure of our Saviour; who alone, after Moses, and the accomplishment of the figurative service deliver'd by him, was to succeed in the Government of the true and most pure Religion. Thus to two men who surpass'd all people of that age in virtue and glory, one being then High-Priest, the other to be Chief Ruler after him, Moses gave the name of our Saviour Jesus Christ, as an ensign of the greatest honour. The Prophets also who came after, prophesied plainly of Christ by name, foretelling long before-hand the treacherous practice of the Jewish people against him, and the calling of the Gentiles by him, Both Jeremy saying thus, *The Spirit before our face, Christ our Lord, is taken in their nets, of whom we spake, under the shadow of his wings: we shall be preserved alive among the Heathen: and David also, being very much perplexed, speaking thus, *Why have the Gentiles raged, and the people imagin'd vain things? The Kings of the earth stood forth, and the Princes assembled: together in the same place against the Lord and against his Christ? whereunto afterwards he addeth in the person of Christ, The Lord said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee. Ask of me, and I will give thee the Heathen for thine inheritance, and the ends of the earth for thy possession. The name of Christ therefore among the Hebrews hath not only honour'd those that were adorn'd with the High-Priesthood, being anointed with figurative and mystical oyl prepared on purpose, but Kings also, whom Prophets by the Divine appointment anointing, made figurative Christs; because they bore in themselves a resemblance of the Regal and Princely power of the only and true Christ, The Word of God, who governeth all things. And moreover we have learned that certain of the Prophets also by being anointed have typically become Christs. So that all these have a relation unto the true Christ, the Divine and Heavenly Word, the only High-Priest of the whole World, therefore only King of all the Creation, and the only chief Prophet of the Father among all the Prophets. The proof hereof is demonstrable; for none of them that of old were typically anointed, whether Priests, or Kings, or Prophets, ever obtain'd so great a measure of Divine power and virtue, as the Saviour and our Lord Jesus, the only and true Christ, hath shew'd. Indeed none of them, how famous soever they were among their own followers throughout many ages, by reason of their dignity and honour have caused by their being typically call'd Christ's, that such as were conform to them should be named Christians. Neither hath the honour of adoration been exhibited by their Subjects unto any of them, neither after the death of any of them have the minds of any been so much affected towards him, as to be ready to die for the maintenance of his honour: neither hath their been any so great stir and commotion among all the nations throughout the whole world for any of them. For the power of the figure and shadow was not of such efficacy in them, as the presence of the truth exhibited by our Saviour: Who tho' he received not from any the Ensigns and Badges of the High-Priesthood, nor indeed *lineally descended according unto the flesh from the Priestly Race, nor was advanced by a guard of armed men unto his Kingdom, nor was made a Prophet after the manner of the ancient Prophets, nor obtained any pre-eminence, or prerogative among the Jews; yet for all this he was adorn'd (c) by the Father with all dignities, tho' not in Types and Symbols, yet in very truth. And altho' he obtain'd all these titles in another manner than those men did, whereof mention has been made yet hath he been more truly stitl'd Christ MS. Cothan they all. And he, as being the only and true Christ of God, hath by that truly venerable and sacred name of his filled the whole

C H A P. IV.

That the Religion, by him declared to all Nations, is neither new nor strange.

(a) LET these things therefore be necessarily placed by me herein the beginning of this History, lest any man should surmise our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ to be a person newly apparent, by reason of the late time of his being conversant in the flesh. Now also, lest any should deem his Doctrine to be new and strange, as deliver'd by a new-comer, and one who nothing differeth from the rest of men, come, let us also in short debate thereof. It is indeed most certain, when as the coming and presence of our Saviour Jesus Christ shone now fresh unto all men, that a people new we must confess, yet neither small, nor such as was scituate in some corner of the earth, but of all nations both the most populous and most religious, and upon this account inextinguishable and invincible, because aided continually by the assistance of God, at certain seasons pre-determin'd by the secret Providence of God, to us suddenly appear'd, being ennobled among all men by the title and name of Christ. This, one of the Prophets by the eye of the Divine Spirit foreseeing would come to pass, was astonish'd, in so much that he cried out, thus, * Who hath heard such things? * I thi. 66. Or who hath spoken after this manner? Hath the earth travelling brought forth in one day? And hath a nation sprung up suddenly and at one time? Also the same Prophet shews the very name that should be given, saying, * And they that serve me shall be called after a new name which shall be blessed upon 2. earth. But altho', without controverſie we are but of late, and this new name of Christians hath been but lately known unto all nations; yet, that our life and manner of conversation, together with the rules of Religion, are not newly devised by our selves, but have been (as I may say) even from the original of mankind, instituted and observed by ancient godly men from those notions that nature had implanted in their minds, we will thus make evident. That the nation of the Hebrews is no new nation, but honour'd among all people for their antiquity, is well known to all. They have Books and Monuments in writing, containing the actions of ancient men, who were rare indeed, and few in number, yet excell'd in piety and righteousness, and all other kind of virtues. Whereof some flourish'd before the Flood, others after; as the sons and off-spring of Nath; (b) and moreover Abraham, in whom the children of the Hebrews do glory, as their chief Founder, and Forefather. Now if any one begining with Abraham and going upwards to the first man, does affirm that all those men who have glorious testimonials of their righteousness, were in reality tho' not by name Christians, he shall not err far from the truth: for whereas the name of Christian signifieth a man who thro' the Knowledge and Doctrine of Christ excelleth in modesty and righteousness, in patience of life world with Christians: nor doth he deliver henceforth Types and Shadows unto his followers, but naked virtues and an heavenly life, accompanied with the undoubted doctrine of verity. And the ointment he receiv'd was not corporal, compounded of spices, but divine, by the Holy Ghost and by participation of the unbegotten Deity of the Father. The which thing again Esay declareth, when as in the person of Christ he breaketh out into these words; * The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, wherefore he hath anointed me to preach glad tidings unto the poor, he hath sent me to cure the contrite in heart, to preach deliverance unto the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind. And not only Esay, but David also, directing his words to his person, saith, * Thy throne, O God, lasteth for ever and ever: the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre. Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity: Wherefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

In which Text the Word of God in the first verse termeth Christ God, the second honoureth him with a Royal Sceptre: thence descending by degrees, after the mention of his Divine and Royal Power; in the third place he sheweth him to have been Christ, anointed not with oil of corporal substance, but of divine, that is of gladness: whereby he signifieth his prerogative and surpassing excellency above them, which with corporal and typical oyl had of old been anointed. And in another place the same David speaketh of him thus, saying,

† The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool. And, Out of my Womb before the Day-star have I begotten thee: The Lord sware and will not repent, thou art a Priest for ever after the Order of Melchisedec. This

Melchisedec in the sacred Scriptures is brought in the Priest of the most High God; but neither was he consecrated by any oyl prepared of man for that purpose, nor by succession of kindred had he attain'd unto the Priesthood among the Hebrews: wherefore our Saviour, according unto his Order, and not according to them who receiv'd signs and shadows, is publish'd, and that with addition of an oath, Christ and (d) Priest. Wherefore also the Sacred History neither mentions him to be corporally anointed among the Jews, nor born of the Priestly Tribe, but of God himself before the Day-star, that is, having his Essence before the structure of the world, immortal, possessing a Priesthood that never perisheth by reason of age, but lasteth world without end. But this is a great and an apparent argument of his Incorporeal and Divine (e) power, that he alone, of all men that hitherto were, is by all men throughout the whole world called Christ; is preach'd and confess'd by the common consent and testimony of all, and by this name every where celebrated among the Grecians and Barbarians: and that hitherto among all his followers throughout the world, He hath been both honour'd as King, had in admiration above a Prophet, and also glorified as the true and only High-Priest of God; and above all this, that he is worship'd even as God, in as much as he is the Eternal Word of God, and subsisted before all Worlds,

(f) receiving majestic honour from the Father: but this moreover is most of all to be marvel'd at, that we who are dedicated unto him, honour him not with voices only and noise of words, but with all entire affection of the mind, so that we prefer the confession of him before our own lives.

(d) Or, Chief-Priest. For so the Mag. Mich. Fut. and Savil. MSS. read it. Valef.

(e) Or, Anointing, for some Copies have it written [Χριστιανισμ.] Valef.

(f) That is, from all eternity. Valef.

(b) Some Translators (as Mug. Calvin, and Dr. Hamner, as appears by his Version, and marginal Note thereto) supposed that [εὐρα] i. e. Star, which the word here used in the Original, and is a Greek Aldebrun was a proper name, and a corruption of Tarah the name of the father of Abraham, of whom mention is made Gen. 11. But this is a great mistake: For Tarah, the father of Abraham, was not one of those whom God loved, as it may be plainly collected from Sacred Scripture: Neither did our English think so, as appears by his own words, when he says, a little after this, in this Chapter, concerning Abraham, that he left the Superstition of his fathers. We have therefore translated these words [εὐρα] and moreover. Valef.

and virtuous fortitude, and in profession of sincere piety towards the One and the Only God who is above all; they were no less studious about all this than we are. They cared not therefore for corporal Circumcision; no more do we; nor for the observation of Sabbaths; no more do we; nor for abstinence from certain meats, and distinction of other things, which Moses first instituted and delivered to be typically observed; no more do Christians regard such matters now. But they of old evidently knew the very Christ of God. For that he appeared to Abraham, gave answers to Isaac, talk'd with Jacob, convers'd with Moses, and afterwards with the Prophets, we have shew'd before. Hence thou may'st find those Darlings of God honour'd with the name of Christ, according unto that saying of them, * See that ye touch not my Christ, neither deal perversely with my Prophets. It is manifest therefore, that the service of God, which was instituted by the godly of old about the time of Abraham, and published of late unto all the Gentiles by the Doctrine of Christ, ought to be accounted the first, the eldest, and the ancientest of all. But if they say that Abraham a long time after receiv'd the commandment of Circumcision; yet before the receipt thereof he is said to have been justified by his faith; the Scripture speaking thus, * Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness. And he being such a one already before Circumcision, the Oracle from God, who manifested himself unto him, even Christ himself, the Word of God before hand hath utter'd this unto him in these words, concerning those who in future ages should be justified after the same manner with himself, saying thus; * And all the Tribes of the earth shall be blessed in thee: And that he should be a great and a populous nation, and all the nations on the earth should be blessed in him. And we may by consideration easily perceive that this is fulfilled in us. For he, through faith in Christ the Word of God, who appear'd unto him, was justified; when having left the superfluities of his fathers, and the error of his former life, he confess'd one only God who is over all, and worship'd him with virtuous works, and not with the ceremonious service of the Law deliver'd afterwards by Moses. Unto him, being such a one, it was said that, In him shall all the Tribes of the earth and all nations be blessed. The very same manner of Religion which Abraham follow'd, is found at this present among Christians alone throughout the world, practis'd by them in works which are far more evident than words. What then hindr'd but that we may henceforth confess, that one and the same way of living, and the same kind of Religion is common to us, who have our name from Christ, with them who of old sincerely served God and were so dear to him. It plainly appears therefore that that perfect and exact Rule of Religion, which hath been deliver'd unto us by the Doctrine of Christ, is neither new nor strange, but (if we ought to speak the truth) the first, the only, and the true one. And of these matters let thus much suffice.

CHAP. V.

Of the times of our Saviour's Manifestation unto Men.

Augustinus BUT, after this preparation wherein by way of Preface we have laid down such things as are fit to utter in the Ecclesiastical History we design, it now remaineth that we take the first step as it were of our journey from the appearance of our Saviour in the flesh; calling upon God, the Father of the Word, and upon Jesus Christ himself, of whom we treat, our Saviour and Lord, the Heavenly Word of God, that he will be our help and fellow-labourer in the declaration of the truth. It was now therefore (a) the two and fortieth year of the Reign of Augustus, the eighth and twentieth year after the subduing of Egypt, and the death of Antiochus and Cleopatra, in whom the Rule of the Ptolemies in Egypt ceased, when our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ at the time of the first (b) taxing, which was when (c) Cyrenius was Governor of Syria, was born in Bethlehem of Judea, wherein agreeable to the Prophecies, that went before Isaiah him. Which taxing under Cyrenius, Flavius Josephus, a most famous Historiographer among the Hebrews, maketh mention of; adding thereto There another History concerning the Sect of the fore year wherein Christ was born. Eusebius does not where expressly mention the day. It was the common opinion of the Western Church that he was born on the 7. Kalend. January: But the Eastern Church thought otherwise, that he was born on the 8. Id. January (i.e. on the 6th day Jan.) Vales. The learned have found so great difficulty in assigning the day of our Saviour's birth, that Salvianus said, Dei est non hominis definire; i.e. God only, not Man was able expressly to declare it. It had been much better for these Men to content themselves with the tradition of the Church, rather than by such an elaborate unfruitful search to entangle the truth. For the celebration of this Festival, many testimonies may be produced out of Origen, Cyprian and Chrysostom, each of these Fathers deducing it from the practice of the first antiquity; and St. Augustine makes it a Character of a son of the Church to solemnize the Festivals of it, and this (principally and by name) of the Nativity. To which may be added that the Author of the Confession (Conf. Lib. 4. c. 13.) saith, Deus est qui nos nasciturus est, et quoniam deus nasciturus est, i.e. Keep the day of the feast, and first the day of Christ's Birth. So that the Religion of this day, non est nuper, neque novitia, i.e. not modern, nor newly begun, though Salvianus said so. And for the particular day, the 25th of December, whereon this Festival is by us solemnized, (not to mention other testimonies which might be produced to this purpose) in Joseph the Egyptian's Arabic Codex of the Consuls (a M. S. in the Archives of the publick Library of Oxford, of the gift of Sir Thomas Roe) this day as well as this Feast is affirmed to stand by Apostolical Canon. The words of which, as it is transcribed by Mr. Gregory, are in English these, Allo that you constitute an anniversary feast at the Nativity of our Lord Christ, on the day on which he was born, and that was the five and twentieth of the first Canon (i.e. of December). For this the principal of all the Feasts, &c. See Mr. Gregory's Works, Chap. 34. Dr. Hammond on the Festivals of the Church, and the Learned Selden's Tract of Christmas-Day, for further satisfaction.

(b) It is by learned Men affirmed, particularly by St. Cassianus in Bar. p. 104. (and is most probable) that this decree of Taxing (or enrolling every Person, according to their Families and Estates) was an effect of Augustus his curiosity (and neither of his desire to enrich his Treasury, nor to reform the excesses of those before him) and this over-ruled by God's special Providence, that this Emperor might serve to be instrumental to the conserving the record of the Birth of Christ, whose Name and his Mothers, as well as Joseph's, were now enrolled. And this is an evidence of the nature of this Augustus, that it was not a Tax, for that would not have belonged to women and infants, but to the possessors only. See Dr. Hammond on Luk. 2. v. 1.

(c) There is a great disagreement amongst the Learned about this enrolment and valuation of Men's Persons and Estates, whether it was done once, or twice. Some say there were two, both made by the same Cyrenius, (or Quirinus), and both mentioned by St. Luke: The first he speaks of Chap. 2. of his Gospel; which was made a little before our Saviour's Birth, about the latter end of the Reign of Herod the great, Sentius Saturninus being then President of Syria; this, say these Men, St. Luke calls quinta Augusti, the first Taxing, to difference it from that other mentioned by him, Alia s. 27. And whereas St. Luke says, Cyrenius at that time had been over Syria; these words are to be taken in a looser, nor stricter sense; not that Cyrenius was then the standing Governour there under the Romans, but was sent by the Emperor particularly on this occasion, to take an Inventory of this part of the Empire: For it is confess'd that Sentius Saturninus was then the President of Syria. The other Taxing, mentioned in the Alia, was made ten years after this, after the banishment of Archelaus, and about the insurrection of Judas of Galilee (or Gaulanites). This is the opinion of Salvianus, Petauinus, Cassianus, and Hammond. On the other hand, Valesius (and with him, as he thinks, agrees our Eusebius in this Chapter), says there was but one Taxing, (which may be supposed to have been begun at the latter end of Herod the Great's Reign, about the time of Christ's Birth, and was not perhaps finish'd till ten years after, when Cyrenius was President of Syria, after the Banishment of Archelaus; his Reasons are these: Josephus mentions but one: After this Enrolment once made why should it be repeated, and that by the same person? For if he had done it equally and exactly, what need of a new one? If not, another person ought rather to be sent who might do it better: What had a Roman Magistrate to do with any thing of Government in Judea whilst Herod lived, who in all right was King there, and was so acknowledged by the Roman Senate? Lastly, about the time of Christ's Birth Scribonius and Panys were Procurators in Syria, and not Cyrenius: I shall not take upon me to determine this Difference; the Reader has here the Sum of the Arguments on both sides, and is left to his liberty to be sway'd by which Party he pleases.

The same indeed Josephus before-mention'd in his Eighteenth Book of Antiquities, doth agree in and confirm thus, word for word: * Cyrenius one of the number of the Roman Senators, a man who had born all Offices, and by all the degrees of Honour had climb'd at length to the Consulship, and who was greatly renown'd in other respects, came with a few men into Syria, being sent on purpose by Cæsar, as Judge of the nation, and to take the valuation of their Estates. And a little after, he faith, Judas Gaulanites, a man of the City named Gamala, having taken unto him one Sadduceus a Pharisee, earnestly sollicit-ed the People to Rebellion: Both of them affirming, that the Taxing of this Tribute inferr'd nothing but manifest servitude, and exhorting the whole Nation to maintain their liberty. And in his Second Book of the Wars of the Jews, he writeth thus of the same person: At that time a certain Galilean, by name Judas, stirr'd up the People of that Region to Defection, upbraiding them for paying tribute so tamely to the Romans; and, having God their Sovereign, for suffering mortal Men to be their Masters. ## C II A P. VI.

That in his Time, according to the Predictions of the Prophets, the Prince of the Jewish Nation who before by Succession had held the Principality, succeeded, and that Herod, the first of the Aliens, became their King.

NOW at that time, when Herod, the first of them, who by descent was a Foreigner, had obtain'd the Rule over the Jewish Nation, the Prophecy written by Moses was fulfill'd, which said, * That there shall not want a Prince in Judea, neither a Leader fail of his Loyns, until he come for whom it is reserved. Whom he declares to be the expectation of the Gentiles. Indeed the things of that Prophetic hung unaccomplish'd all the time that it was lawful for the Jews to live under Princes of their own Nation: who taking their beginning as high as Moses himself, continued down their Reign even to the Empire of Augustus: under whom Herod the first (a) Foreigner had the Government of the Jews granted him by the Romans; who, as Josephus declares, was * Gen. 49. 10.

(a) Josephus Scalliger, in his Animad- versions upon Eusebius's Chronicon, has sufficiently made it evident, that Herod was no Foreigner. Josephus, in his 20. Book of Antiquit. Chap. 6. calls Herod τὸν Ἰσραηλῆα, i. e. a Jew as of his Lineage. Valef.

by his father's side an Idumean; by his mother's Augustus an Arabian. But, as Africanus, one of the vulgar sort of Writers, says, they who have been more accurate about his Pedigree, say he was the son of Antipater, who was the son of one Herod an Alcalonite, who was one of the servants which minister'd in the Temple of Apollo. This Antipater being taken by Idumean thieves while he was yet a child, remain'd a long time among them, because his father being one of a mean estate was not able to redeem him. And being brought up after their manner of breeding, became at length very familiarly acquainted with Hyrcanus the High-Priest of the Jews. This very man's son was that Herod who liv'd in the time of our Saviour. When therefore the Principality of the Jews was come into the hands of this Alien, then was the expadation of the Gentiles even at the doors, according unto that prophecy: for then the Line of their native Princes and Governours was broken off, which had been drawn down by a continual succession from Moses himself until that time. For before they were taken Captives and carried into Babylon, Kings, reign'd over them, beginning from Saul, who was the first, and from David. Before their Kings Princes bore rule over them, whom they call'd Judges, beginning their Government after Moses, and his successor * Jefus. After their return from Babylon there was not amongst them any form of Government, an Aristocracy together with an Oligarchy, the best ruling, and they but few in number. For the High-Priests had held that preeminence under Pompey the Roman Captain coming upon them by main force, besieg'd and ransack'd Jerusalem, polluted the holy places, by entering into the Sanctuaries of the Temple, and sent Prisoner to Rome the High-Priest, whose name was Aristobolus with his sons, who by succession from his Progenitors had continued unto that time both Prince and Priest; and committed the Office of High-Priesthood unto his brother Hyrcanus, and from that time forth made the whole Jewish Nation become tributary to the Romans. And indeed not long after, Hyrcanus, the last of those to whom the High-Priesthood by succession befall, being taken prisoner by the Parthians, Herod the first Foreigner, as I said before, had the Government of the Jewish Nation deliver'd to him by the Roman Senate and the Emperor Augustus. Under whom, whenas the presence of Christ was apparent, the long-look-for Salvation of the Gentiles was accomplish'd, and their calling consequently follow'd, according to the predictions of the Prophets. Since which time the Princes and Rulers of Judea (those I mean who were of Jewish extraction) ceasing, straightway the series and course of the High-Priesthood, which among them by order of succession after the decease of the former, was always, as it was meet, wont to fall unto the next of blood, was confounded. Hereof thou hast Josephus a witness worthy of credit, declaring how that Herod, after that he was intrusted with the rule over the Jews by the Romans, assign'd 'em no more High-Priests of the ancient priestly Race, but conferr'd that honour upon certain obscure persons; and how that the same course which Herod had taken in constituting High-Priests, was follow'd by his son Archelaus, and after by the Romans who succeeded him in the Government of Judea. The said Josephus declareth, how that Herod first shut up under his own Privy-seal the Holy Robe of the High-Priest, not permitting

the High Priest to keep it any longer in their own custody; and that after him Archelaus, and after Archelaus the Romans did the same. And let these things be spoken by us to evidence the truth of another prophesie, which by the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus was accomplish'd. For most plainly and exprefly of all other, the Holy Scripture in Daniel describing the number of certain weeks unto Christ the Ruler (whereof we have in another (b) place intreated) foretelleth, that after the accomplishment of those weeks the Jewish anointing should be abolish'd. And this is plainly prov'd to have been fulfill'd at the time when our Saviour Jesus Christ came in the flesh. And let these things necessarily before-observ'd by us for the proof of the truth of the times.

(b) He means his Books of Evangelical Demonstration. For in the 8th Book of that work he Treats of Daniel's weeks, which he affirms were compleated at our Saviour's coming, according to the opinion of Africans. Valef.

C H A P. VII.

Of the Disagreement Supposed to be among the Gospelists about the Genealogy of Christ.

BUT in as much as Matthew and Luke, committing the Gospel to writing, have differently delivered unto us the Genealogy of Christ, and are thought by many to disagree very much among themselves, so that almost every one of the faithful through ignorance of the truth, hath ambitiously striven to comment upon those places; Come on, let us rehearse a certain History which is come to our hands concerning the premises, the which Africans (whom we mention'd a little before) hath set down in an Epistle written to Aristides about the Concordance of the Genealogy of Christ in the Gospels; and having indeed (a) blamed the opinions of others, as wrested and false, he delivereth the History that he himself had met withal, in these very words: 'For seeing that the names of kindred in Israel were numbred either after the line of nature, or after the rule of the law; after the order of nature, as by succession of natural seed, after that of the law, as when any one begetteth a son in the name of his brother who deceased without issue: for because a perspicuous hope of the Resurrection was not yet granted them, they shadow'd out in some sort the promise to come with this kind of mortal resurrection, that the name of the deceased might continue and never be quite blotted out. Because therefore, of them that are reckon'd in this Genealogy, some succeeded their fathers as natural sons, but others received their name whence they receiv'd not their nature; mention is made of both; as well of them who were truly fathers, as of them who were titular only, and as fathers. Thus neither of the Gospels is found false, the one drawing the Pedigree by the natural, the other by the legal line. For the race both of Solomon, and that also of Nathan, are so wrapp'd and twist'd together, by reviving of persons deceased without issue, by (b) second marriages, and by raising up of seed, that not without cause the same men are supposed to have had divers fathers, where-

(a) Or, Having evidenced to be false; for so it is in the King's M. S. Valef.

(b) The chief cause of confounding of Families was, when the woman, having had children by a former husband, basted to remarry, and bore children by her latter also. After which, let us suppose the son, begotten by her first husband, to have married a wife, and afterwards to have died without issue. Then, if his brother by the mother side marry his widow, and beget children of her, in these children there will be a confounding of families; in so much that by nature they may be called this Man's, and have one name, but by Law the others, and bear another name. Valef.

of some were only nominative, others fathers indeed. Thus the account in both Gospels is true, and is brought down to Joseph accurately and exactly, tho' by a various and different line. And, that what I say may plainly appear, I will recite the who begat Jacob the father of Joseph: but if from Nathan the son of David, according unto * Luke 3.

* Luke, then the third in like manner from the 23, 24. and will be (d) Melechi, whose son was Heli the father of Joseph. For Joseph was the son of Heli, the son of Melechi. Joseph therefore being as it were the mark we shoot at, we must shew how each person is term'd his father, as well Jacob who directeth his pedigree from Solomon, as Heli who descended from Nathan; and besides, how, in the first place, these two, Jacob and Heli, were brethren; then, in the next place, how their fathers Matthan and Melechi, born of divers kindreds, may be made appear to be grand-fathers to Joseph. Now therefore thus it was; Matthan and Melechi marrying one after the other the same wife, begat children who were brethren by the mother; the law not forbidding a widow, either dismiss'd from her husband, or after the death of her husband, to be married to another man. First, therefore Matthan, descending from Solomon, begat Jacob of Esba; for that is said to be the woman's name.

After the death of Matthan, Melechi, who descended from Nathan, being of the same tribe, but of another race, (as we said before) took this widow to his wife, and begat Heli his son. Thus shall we find Jacob and Heli, tho' of a different race, yet by the same mother to have been brethren. One of whom, namely Jacob, after Heli his brother was deceased without issue, married his wife, and begat on her the third, Joseph, by nature indeed and reason his own son; whereupon also it is written, And Jacob begat Joseph; but by the law he was the son of Heli: for Jacob being his brother raised up seed unto him. Wherefore neither is that Genealogy which concerneth him to lose its authority, the which indeed * Matthew the Evangelist reciting, saith, And Jacob begat Joseph; but * Luke on the other side, Which was the son, as it was supposed (for he added this withal) of Joseph which was the son of Heli, which was the son of Melechi. Nor could he more significantly and properly have express'd that way of generation according to the law. Therefore in his recital of procreations of this sort, he passeth over in silence even to the end, the word of begetting, carrying the whole series of families step by step up as high as Adam, who was the son of God. Neither is this matter destitute of good proof, or rashly and hastily devised. For the kinsmen of our Saviour according to the flesh, either out of desire to make known the nobility of their Stock, or simply to tell the story, have very truly deliver'd even these things unto us; how that Idumean Thieves invading the City Ascalon in Palæstina, took captive together with other spoils out of the Temple of Apollo

Augustus, adjoining unto the walls, (e) Antipater, son to one Herod, that was Minister in that Temple. But, in that the Priest was not able to pay the ransom for his son, Antipater was brought up after the fashion of the Idumeans, and at length became very familiar with Hyrcanus the High Priest of Judea. He, being by Hyrcanus sent first Embassador unto Pompey, and having recover'd him the Kingdom free and entire, which his brother Arifobulus had in great part usurped, had the good hap himself to gain the title and office of (f) Procurator of Palestine, and liv'd in great prosperity. This Antipater being traiterously slain by some who envied his great felicity, Herod his son succeeded him, whom at last Antonius and Augustus, by decree of the Senate, constituted King over the Jews: whose sons were Herod and the other Tetrarchs. These things are common also among the Greek Histories. Now whereas unto that time the Genealogies not only of the Hebrews, but of them also who lineally descended from ancient Profelytes, as from Abiur the Ammonite, and Ruth the Maoabite, and those who came out of Egypt with the Israelites and mingled with them, were recorded among the ancient Monuments; Herod considering that the Israelitish Pedigrees would avail him nothing, and being prick'd in mind with the consciousness of his basefnefs

(f) Antipater, the Father of Herod, was Procurator of the whole Kingdom of Juda under Pompey, and managed all affairs, both Military, and Civil. Therapion Josephus, in his 14. B. calls him (sarcy & c. i. e. Procurator.) Valef.

(e) I judge this passage also to have little of certainty in it. For Josephus, in the book of his own life, mentioning the original and antiquity of his own race, fetches it from the public Archives. Therefore those public tables, which contained the originals of the Jewish families, were extant in Josephus's time. And so it's false to say that Herod burnt them. Valef.

(f) Two sorts of Men joined themselves with the Children of Israel when they went up out of Egypt. The one were native Egyptians, whom Moses (Exod. 12. 38.) calls Am, i. e. born in the land. The other sort were a mixt multitude, whom he there calls Geri, i. e. strangers. They were extraneous Persons, amongst the Egyptians, who took the land to Tillat a certain portion: The Jews were Heb, before they went up out of Egypt. Both these sorts of Men the sacred Scripture comprehends under the name of a mixt multitude (Exod. 12. 38.) Valef.

Yet some few studious in this behalf having either kept in memory the names of their Ancestors, or copied them out of ancient Rolls, have got unto themselves their proper pedigrees, and glory much that they have preserved the remembrance of their ancient Nobility. Amongst whom were those men I mention'd before; who by reason of their near kindred with our Saviour, were called Despoyms. These travelling from Nazareth and (i) Cochaba, towns of the Jews, into other regions, plainly expounded the foretold Genealogy, partly out of the Book of their (k) Epheemerides, and partly out of their Memory, as far as they were able. case stand, whether thus or otherwise, no man in his judgment, and in the judgment of any other ingenious person, can find a plainer exposition. Let us make much of this therefore, tho' we have (h) no proof to confirm it, seeing we cannot produce a better and a truer exposition. The Gospel indeed in all respects uttereth most true things. And about the end of the same Epistle he addeth these words; Matthan descended from Solomon begat Jacob. Matthan deceased, Melchi of the stock of Nathan on the same woman begat Heli. (m) So Heli and Jeli were brethren by the mother's side. Heli this way dying without issue, Jacob rais'd unto him of seed by begetting of Joseph, his own son by nature, but Heli his son by law. Thus was Joseph son to both. So far Africanus. Now the Genealogy of Joseph being thus recited, the Stock also of Mary, who was of the same Tribe together with him, is in effect made apparent. For by the Law of Moses, mingling of Tribes by marriage was forbidden. For the woman is commanded to be joyn'd in marriage to one of the same house and of the same family, that so the inheritance of the kindred might not be removed from Tribe to Tribe. But of these matters let thus much suffice.

lawful for the Brother by the Mother's side to marry his Brother's Widow, and to beget Children of her, which were in the name and be accounted of the Family of his Brother. The Law (Deut. 25. 5.) speaks of the Brother that dwells in the same House, and that is of the same Stock: But the Brother by the Mother's side is not of the same House, nor of the same Stock: Seeing that the Stock, especially amongst the Jews, was deduced from the Father's Race. Secondly, it may be deliverly questioned, whether in reckoning up the Generations, there be any account had of the adoptive Fathers, Obed, who is mentioned in the Genealogy of Christ, is an eminent example hereto. For when Maalon was dead in the land of Moab, and Ruth left a Widow without Children, Booz the kinsman of Maalon (he that was a nearer kinsman than he giving up his right) took Ruth to Wife, whereby he might raise up Seed to Maalon. Yet Obed that was begotten of her, is by the Evangelists, and in the Book of Ruth not called the Son of Maalon, but the Son of Booz. Valef.

Of Herod's Cruelty towards the Infants, and after how miserable a manner he ended his life.

NOW Christ being born in Bethlehem of Judea at the time before manifested, according to the Predictions of the Prophets, Herod upon an enquiry made by the * wife men that came from the East, asking where he was that was born King of the Jews? For they said they had seen his Star, and had therefore made such a long journey with diligence, because they most ardently desired to worship him that was born, as God. Herod, I say, being not a little troubled, judging his Government to be in very imminent danger, demanded of the Doctors of the Law, then in the nation, where they expected Christ should be born. When he knew of the Prophecy of * Micah, who foretold he was to be born in Bethlehem; by one express Edict he commands all the young children born in Bethlehem and in all the coasts thereof from two years old and under, according to the time which he had diligently enquired of the Wise-men, to be slain. For he supposed, as it was very likely, that Jesus would be involved in the same calamity with them that were about his age. But his Parents having had notice of the whole matter by an Angel that appeared to them, convey'd the young child into Egypt, and so he escaped the King's bloody Plot. Thus much indeed the sacred writing of the Gospel sets forth. And now moreover it would be worth the while to see what immediately befel Herod upon account of his audacious wickedness acted towards Christ and those of the same age with him; how forthwith, without all delay, the Divine vengeance seized him whilst alive after such a manner, as to foreshew some beginnings of those torments which awaited him after this life. And how he clouded these prosperous successes of his reign, as he judges them to be, with domestick calamities following one upon another, with the murders of his wife and children, and others of his nearest relations and dearest friends, I shall not now be able particularly to recount, in as much as the rehearsal of this matter would far surpass even all the most savage cruelty of every Tragedy; which Josephus in his History has at large declared. But, how after his cruel plot form'd against our Saviour and the other infants, he was forthwith smitten from heaven with a disease, as with a scourge, whereof he died, it will not be unfit to understand from the Author himself, who in his *seventeenth Book of Antiquities relates after how lamentable a manner he ended his life, writing word for word thus; 'But the disease of Herod grew yet more bitterly violent, God exacting this judgment of his enormities upon him. He had a gentle fever not expressing it self so much to the outward touch and feeling, as more grievously burning him within. Moreover, he had a vehemently strong appetite after meat, but nothing could suffice him; he had an ulcer of the intrails, with sharp confications especially of the Colick-gut, a phlegmatick and shining humour appear'd about his feet. Moreover, the disease had gotten about the lower belly, and more than that, there was a putrefaction of his genitals, and it bred worms; besides, he had a shortness of breath, which was also unfavoury; a troublesome flux of Rheum, which caused a perpetual difficulty of breathing. And the Patient having not strength to resist these things, there follow'd a convulsion of all the parts. It was said therefore by the Divines, and those who made it their business to give judgment of such things, that the hand of God was upon the King to punish him for his so oft repeated horrible offences." Thus much therefore the aforesaid Writer relates in the fore-mention'd Book. And in the Second (a) Book of his History he speaks of him after the same manner, in these words: 'After that he was taken with a disease, which seizing upon the whole state and habit of his body, tormented him exceedingly with several pains: He had a fever, but not of any acute kind, an insufferable itching over all his body, with continual tortures of the Colon: by the humours about his feet you would judge him to have been hydropical; besides this, a strange inflammation of the lower belly, and such a putrefaction of the genitals as bred worms: moreover, a shortness and difficulty of breathing, with a convulsion of all the parts. This moved those of that time who pretended to know the mind of God, to term these diseases a punishment inflicted on him from heaven. But altho' he struggled with so many distempers, yet he hoped to live and recover, and fought for remedy. Passing therefore over Jordan he made use of the hot-waters that are near Callirhoe. They fall into the lake Asphaltites, but are so sweet that they are potable. There, when his Physicians thought it good to bathe his whole body in warm oyl, being set into a bathing-vessel filled with oyl, he was so weakened all over his body, that he turn'd up his eyes as if he had been dead. But at the noise of his attendants outcries he came to himself again. After this, despairing of recovery, he gave order for the distribution of fifty (b) Drachms to every one of his common soldiers, but to his commanders and friends he gave great sums of money. From thence he return'd to Jericho; and being now grown very melancholy, he did as it were threaten death it self, and resolv'd upon the commission of a most horrible and villanous fact. For he commanded all the eminent personages that were in every town of Judea to be summon'd together and imprison'd in the Hippodrome.

Then calling for his sister Salome and her husband Alexander, I know, said he, the Jews will rejoice mightily at my death; but if you will obey my commands, I can make my self to be lamented by many, and obtain an honourable funeral: As soon as breath is out of my body do you, being guarded with soldiers, kill all these men whom I have imprison'd; so all Judea, yea every family shall, thro' against their wills, mourn army death. And a little after he says, and again when he was tortured, partly by want of sustenance, and partly by convulsions of his violent cough, being overcome with continual torments he resolv'd to hasten his own death. And having taken an apple, he ask'd for a knife, for his manner was to cut them himself when ever he eat them; then looking round lest there should be any one that might hinder him, he lifted up his right hand, as about to do violence to himself. Moreover, the same Writer relates farther, "how that a little before his death he most wickedly commanded (c) another of his own sons, having slain (d) two of them before, to be put to death, and then soon after died in most exquisite torture.

And such was the end Herod made, suffering a due punishment for his cruelty towards the infants of Bethlehem, which he contrived on purpose to destroy our Saviour. After his death an Angel appeared to Joseph then in Egypt, and commanded him to take the young Child and his Mother and return into Judea, telling him they were dead who fought the young Child's life. (b) The word δραχμή is deriv'd from δραχμή, that is, an handful, as containing so many pieces of Brass-money as would make an handful, to wit, six. This word from the Greeks came not only to the Romans, but, after the time of the Seleucids, to the Jews also; so Exr. 2. 69. 3. 10. 11. the Greek word with a very little alteration, rendered by the 72 δραχμαί, by us Drachms. Of the Times of Pilate.

THE said Historian agrees also concerning the reign of Archelaus after the death of Herod, declaring the manner of it, how both by his Father's Testament, and also by the Decree of Augustus Caesar, he obtained the Kingdom of Judea: And how, when after ten years he was deposed from his Government, his brethren, Philip and Herod Fauver, and (a) Lysanias govern'd their Tetrarchies. The same Author, in the eighteenth Book of his Antiquities, makes it plainly appear, that Pontius Pilate was made Procurator of Judea in the twelfth year of the reign of Tiberius (who then was Emperor, succeeding Augustus, who had reigned fifty seven years) and continued to full ten years, almost as long as Tiberius lived. From whence their fiction is manifestly confuted, who of late have publish'd (b) Acts against our Saviour. In which chiefly the title or note of time, inscrib'd upon the said Acts, does evidently show the Authors thereof to be liars. For those things which these men have impudently feign'd concerning the salutary passion of our Lord, are said to have been done when Tiberius was Consul the fourth time, which fell out to be the seventh year of his reign. At which time it is certain Pilate was not come as Governour into Judea, if we may believe Josephus; who in his foresaid Book does expressly shew, that Pilate was made Procurator of Judea several places by Tiberius, in the twelfth year of his Reign.

Of the High-Priests among the Jews, in whose time Christ preach'd the Gospel.

AT this time therefore, namely in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius, according to the * the Evangelist, and the fourth of Pilate's Procuratorship of Judea, Herod, (a) Lysanias and Philip being Tetrarchs over the rest of Judea, our Lord and Saviour Jesus, the Christ of God, being about thirty years of age, was baptized by John, and then first began to preach the Gospel. And the sacred Scripture says, that he finish'd the whole

(a) know not why Eusebius put Lysanias in the middle between Herod and Philip, the sons of Herod the great. For Luke, whose words Eusebius does here profess that he follows, in that famous place concerning the Baptism of Christ, names Lysanias in the third place. Wherefore Eusebius should have observed the same order, especially because Lysanias was neither Son, nor Successor to Herod. Eusebius also seems to be reprovable here, in that after he had said Pilate was then Procurator of Judea, he adds, that the rest of Judea was governed by the Tetrarchs, Herod, Philip, and Lysanias. But Lysanias never had any part of Judea. For Abila was not a City of Judea, but of Syria. Yet Eusebius may be excused, if we say, that by Judea he understood the whole Dominion of Herod the Great: For it's manifest that he had the Tetrarchy of Lysanias given him by Augustus. For the Roman Emperors used to bestow these Tetrarchies on those Kings that were their Confederates and Friends, that they might thereby the more oblige them. It's strange that there is no mention of this Lysanias, of whom St. Luke speaks, either in Josephus, Dion, or the rest, time of his preaching under Ananias and Caiphas being (b) High-Priests, meaning thereby that all his preaching was terminated within that space of time wherein they executed the High-Priest's Office. Altho' therefore he began when Ananias was High-Priest, and continued till Caiphas came on, yet there are scarce full four years contained within this space of time. For, since from the time now mention'd, the Laws and Sanctions about holy matters were almost abolish'd, the High-Priesthood also ceased to be for life and hereditary, neither was the worship of God rightly performed. But the Roman Governours made sometimes one, sometimes another High-Priest, none bearing that Office above a year. (c) Josephus indeed in his Book of Antiquities does relate, that from Ananias to Caiphas there were in one continued order four High-Priests. His words are these; 'Valerius Gratus having put out Ananias from being High-Priest, made Ismael the son of (d) Baphi High-Priest; not long after he removed him, and made Eleazar, son of the High-Priest Ananias, High-Priest; within a year after he deprived him, and gave Simon the son of Cambisus the High-Priesthood. He, after he had held that honour not more than a year, had (e) Josephus, whose name also was Caiphas, for his Successor.' It is manifest therefore that the whole time of our Saviour's preaching was not complete four years, within which space of time there were as many High-Priests made, reckoning from Ananias his bearing that office, to Caiphas his promotion to it, (f) every of which bore the office one year. The Holy (g) Gospel therefore is right in noting Caiphas to be the High-Priest that same year in which our Lord's salutary passion hapned. From which authority of the Gospel also it is evident, that the time of Christ's preaching does not disagree with the account we have laid down. Now our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, not long after his beginning to preach, called twelve men, whom he named Apostles, giving to them in particular a title more honourable, and preferring them before the rest of his Disciples. Besides, he chose other seventy men, whom he sent two by two before his face, into every of those places and cities whither he himself would come.

not that there were two High-Priests at the same time, which is absurd and was never heard of; but that Luke means by these words, that in this fiftenth year of Tiberius, Caiphas was High-Priest, and Ananias was one that had born that Office very lately. (See Dr. Hammond's note on Luke chap. 3. v. 2. where he treats of this matter learnedly and largely.) Who ever had born the High-Priest's Office, those were called High-Priests during their lives, and took Tythes; So Josephus declares B. 2c. of Antiq. Valer.

(d) Joseph, Antiq. B. 18. chap. 4. Eusebius is here very much mistaken; for Josephus does not speak of the time times that St. Luke does; Josephus speaks of the first ten years of Tiberius's Reign, in which time Valerius Gratus was Procurator of Judea; but Luke speaks of Tiberius's second ten years, when Pilate was Governour of Judea, Valer.

(e) Or Phabi, as some Copies read it. Valer.

(f) Or Josephus, or, Josephus, as it is in the old Editions of Rufinus. Valer.

(g) Eusebius understands Josephus, so, as if Josephus had said, that those four High-Priests, Ananias, (or Ananias), Ismael, Eleazar, and Simon executed the High-Priesthood, each the space of one year. Indeed Josephus says this expressly of the two first; but not so of the two first. For he declares that Ismael indeed was put out a little after he was made High-Priest by Valerius; but Josephus is so far from making Ananias to have been High-Priest but one year, that from his words it is plainly gathered, he held the High-Priesthood three years at least. See Josephus's Antiq. B. 2c. chap. 8. Valer.

(b) Josephus, in his 18 B. of Antiquit. 9 chap. says he was banish'd by Caius Celsar to Lions in France. Valef.

(a) THE sacred History of the Gospel also mentions the beheading of John the Baptist, by Herod Jun. to have been not long after this. To which also agrees Josephus, who both makes mention particularly of Herodias by name, and also expressly declares, how that Herod, having put away his former wife lawfully marry'd to him, took this woman his brother's wife by force from him being yet alive, and married her: she was the daughter of Aretas King of the Arabians: and that upon her account, Herod having slain John, went to war with Aretas, incensed at the disgrace of his daughter. In which war, he relates that Herod and his whole Army were vanquish'd in a Battel, and that these things befel him upon account of his cruelty towards John. The same Josephus does agree with the Evangelical History in the account it gives of this John, especially as to his confessing him to have been a most righteous Man and a Baptist. He says further, that Herod was depriv'd of his kingdom for the sake of this Herodias, and was together with her banish'd to (b) Vienna a City of Gallia. All this he relates in his 18th Book of Antiquities, where also he writes these very words concerning John: 'But some of the Jews judg'd Herod's Army to have been overthrown by God, he avenging justly on him the murder of John call'd the Baptist. For him Herod had slain, who was a good man, and one that exhorted the Jews to the exercise of virtue, commanding them to deal justly with one another, and to behave themselves piously towards God, and so to come to be baptized. For Baptism, said he, was then only well-pleasing to God, when it was used, not for the excusing of some certain offences, but in order to the cleansing of the body, the soul being before purified by righteousness. Now when many flock'd to him from every quarter (for they were strangely taken with hearing of such discourses) Herod fearing lest thro' the powerful persuasion of the man, his subjects should revolt, (for they seem'd ready to do any thing that he advis'd) judg'd it better to cut him off before any innovation hapned by him, than, after it was come to pass, and had greatly endangered his affairs, to repent he did not, when it was too late. Upon this very mistrust of Herod's, he being put into bonds, was sent to the aforesaid Castle of Machaberos and there slain. Thus far he concerning John. The same Author, in the same Book makes mention also of our Saviour in these words; 'About that time there was one Jesus, a wife man, if he may be call'd a man; for he wrought wonderful miracles, and taught all that with delight would embrace the truth. He had many followers, both Jews and Gentiles. This was he that was call'd Christ. Whom tho' he was accus'd by the chief men of our Nation, and Pilate condemn'd him to be crucified, yet those who at first loved him forbore not to worship him. For he appeared unto them alive on the third day, as the holy Prophets had predicted, who foretold these and many more wonderful things concerning him. And till this day that Set continues, which of Him are call'd Christians. Seeing therefore that this Writer, being a Jew born and bred, has in his works recorded thus much of our Saviour and John the Baptist, what evasion can remain to the Forgers of those Acts against them, that they should not evidently be prov'd to be the most impudent of Men? But thus far of these Matters.

Concerning our Saviour's Disciples.

Moreover, the names of our Saviour's Apostles are to all apparently manifest in the Gospel, but as to the seventy disciples, a particular * catalogue of them is no where extant. But Barnabas is said to have been one of them; of whom we have frequent mention both in the Acts of the Apostles, and also most especially in Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. Soberness also, they say, was another of them, he that together with Paul wrote to the Corinthians. For so says Clemens in the fifth Book of his Institutions; where also he affirms Cephas (that Cephas of whom Paul speaks, † But when Cephas came to Antioch I withstood him to the face) a name sake of Peter's, to have been one of the seventy disciples. Matthias also, who was numbred with the Apostles in the room of the Traitor Judas, and the other who had the honour to be proposed in the same lot with him, are reported to be of the number of the Seventy. Thaddæus likewise, of whom I will by and by adjoin an History as it came to our hands, is reported to have been one of them. But he that shall attentively observe, will find, even from Paul's testimony alone, that our Saviour's disciples were more in number than Seventy. For he * says, * 1 Cor. 15. 5, 6, 7. Christ after his Resurrection was seen first of Cephas, then of the twelve, after that he was seen of above five hundred Brethren at once; of whom some were fall'n asleep, but the greatest part, he declares, were alive when he wrote these things. Then, says he, he appeared to James. (a) He is said to have been one of the Seventy disciples of our Saviour, and also one of the Lord's Brethren. Lastly, there being many more besides the twelve, who were called Apostles by way of imitation, of which sort Paul himself was one, he farther adds, saying, Then he was seen of all the Apostles. But so much of this. The fore-mentioned History concerning Thaddæus was thus: the first Bishop of Jerusalem, was not of the Number of the Twelve Apostles but of the Disciples of the Lord. Indeed Paul, in his first Epist. to the Corinthians, chap. 15. v. 7. seems to favour this opinion, where reckoning up those to whom Christ appeared after his death, after he hath nam'd the Twelve Apostles, and live hundred others, he adds, After that he was seen of James, &c. Valef.

(a) Many of the ancient writers affirm, that James the brother of our Lord, he that was Ordained

The History of the Prince of the Edessens.

THE Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ being every where famous by reason of his wonderful power, by which he wrought Miracles, drew together an innumerable company even of foreigners, and inhabitants of Countreys far remote from Ju- (a) Or, dea, who were sick and troubled with all sorts of pains, hoping to be recovered. Therefore King (a) Agbarus, the then worthy pie. Valef.

Tiberius.

(b) Agbarus was a King of the Arabians, but he did not then hearken to his request, yet he vouchsafed to give him answer by his own Letter; wherein he promised to send one of his Disciples, who should both cure him, and also bring salvation to him, and his Relations and Friends. Soon after therefore this promise was exactly fulfill'd: For after his Resurrection from the dead, and Ascension into Heaven, Thomas, one of the Twelve Apostles, moved thereto by Divine Impulse, sent Thaddæus, chosen one of the Seventy Disciples of Christ, to Edessa, to be a Preacher and Evangelist of the Doctrine of Christ. By whom all that which our Saviour had promised was fulfill'd. The written evidence of this matter we have taken out of the Office of Records within the princely City of Edessa, in which Agbarus then was Governour. For among the publick Records there, wherein the Antiquities of the City and the Acts of Agbarus are continu'd, are found these things, there preserved to our days. Nothing hinders but that we may hear the very words of the Letter, which we have taken out of the ancient Rolls, and faithfully translated out of the Syriack tongue in these words, thus;

A Copy of the Letter written by King Agbarus to Julius, and sent to him to Jerusalem by Ananias the Courier.

Agbarus Prince of Edessa, to Jesus the Good Saviour, who hath manifested himself within the Confines of Jerusalem, sendeth greeting. I have heard of thee, and of the cures wrought by thee without Herbs or Medicines; for, as it is reported, thou dost restore Sight to the Blind; thou makest the Lame to walk; thou cleansest the Leprous, and thou dost cast out Devils and unclean Spirits, and thou healest those that are tormented with Diseases of a long continuance, and thou dost raise the Dead. When I heard all this of thee, I was fully persuaded to believe one of these two things, either that thou art very God, and art come down from Heaven to do such things, or else the Son of God, and so performest them. Wherefore, I have now written to thee, beseeching thee to come to me, and cure my disease: for I have heard that the Jews murmur against thee, and contrive to do thee mischief. I have a City, a little one indeed, but it is beautiful, and capable of receiving us both. Thus wrote Agbarus, as then but a little enlightened from above. It is also worth while to hear the Answer of Jesus, return'd to him by the same Courier; short indeed it is, but it has much of power and efficacy in it: It was thus:

Blessed art thou, Agbarus, who hast believ'd in me whom thou hast not seen. For it is written of me, that they which have seen me should not believe in me, that fo they which have not seen me may believe and be saved.

(c) Answat part of the Old Testament words occur I am yet to seek. Indeed, in the Gospel of St. John it is written, that our Lord said to Thomas after his Resurrection, John 20. 29. Because thou hast not seen, and yet hast believed, blessed is thy faith. This Epistle of Christ to King Agbarus, if it be genuine, preceded that Reprehension of the Apostle Thomas some years. Valef.

Tiberius.

But as concerning what thou writest about my coming to thee, know, that all things for which I am sent must be here by me fulfilled; which being finish'd, I shall be taken up and return to him that sent me: but after I am ascended, I will send thee one of my Disciples, who shall cure thy disemper, and give life to thee, and to them that are with thee." To this Letter there is this farther added in the Syriack Language: "After Jesus was ascended, Judas, called also (d) Thomas, sent Thaddæus the (e) Apostle, who was one of the Seventy Disciples, to Agbarus. When he was come thither, he abode with Tobias the son of Tobias. As soon as it was heard that he was come, having manifested himself by the miracles he wrought; Agbarus was told, that the Apostle of Jesus was come thither according to his promise in his Letter. Now Thaddæus began to cure every disease and disemper by the power of God to the wonder of all.

When Agbarus heard of the great and wonderful works wrought by him, and how in the name and by the power of Jesus Christ he cured diseases, he had some suspicion, that this was the person about whom Jesus wrote to him, saying, when I am taken up, I will send thee one of my Disciples, who shall heal thy disemper. Having therefore called for Tobias, with whom Thaddæus abode, I have heard, said he, that there is a certain powerful man come from Jerusalem, who lodges at thy house, that performs many cures in the name of Jesus. There is a stranger, Sir, replied he, come to my house who does many miracles: Bring him, said Agbarus, to me. Tobias went home to Thaddæus, and told him, Agbarus the Governour of this City having sent for me, commands me to bring thee to him, that thou mayst cure his disemper. Will go, replied Thaddæus, for it is chiefly upon his account that I am with power sent hither. Tobias therefore getting up early next morning, took Thaddæus along with him, and went to Agbarus. When he was come to Agbarus (his Nobles being present and standing round him) there appeared a wonderful sight in the face of the Apostle Thaddæus, as he came in to him, and he worship'd him. All that were present stood at that, for they saw nothing of the kind which appear'd only to Agbarus. When he ask'd Thaddæus, Art thou in truth a Disciple of Jesus the Son of God, who hast thus come to me, I will send thee one of my Disciples, who shall cure thy disemper, and give life to thee, and to all with thee? Thaddæus answered, Forasmuch as thou hast firmly believed in the Lord Jesus who sent me, therefore I am sent to thee, and if thy faith in him does still increase, according to thy belief thou shalt have the desires of thine heart fulfilled. Agbarus made him answer, I did so firmly believe in him, that I would have raised forces to have destroy'd the Jews who crucified him, had I not been inhibited from that purpose by the Roman Empire. Jesus Christ, replied Thaddæus, our Lord God fulfilled the will of his Father, and having finished

(d) Thomas indeed, that was one of the Twelve Apostles, was called Didymus; but that the same person was named Judas, is not, that I know, any where else to be found. Upon this account therefore this Story is deservedly to be suspected. Valef.

(e) Apostle here is to be taken in a large sense; (see Eusebius at the latter end of the foregoing Chapter;) after the same manner every Nation and City termed their Apostles, from whom they first received the truth of the Gospel. This name was not only given to the Twelve, but all their Disciples, Companions and Assistants, were generally called Apostles. Valef.

Tiberius. nished that, was taken up to his Father. Agbarus said unto him, I believed both in Him and in his Father. Therefore, said Thaddæus, I lay my hand on thee, in the name of the same Lord Jesus Christ: and having done so he was presently cured of the disease and distemper that he had. Agbarus wondered greatly when he saw that really accomplish'd which he had heard concerning Jesus, by his Disciple and Apostle Thaddæus, who without the help of Herbs or Medicines, restored him to his former soundness: and not only him, but one Abdus also, the son of Abdus, who had the Gout; he coming and falling down at Thaddæus's feet, receiv'd a blessing by prayer and the laying on of his hands, and was healed. Many others also of the same City with them were cured by the Apostle, who wrought wonderful miracles and preached the word of God. After all this Agbarus spake thus, We ~~believe~~, Thaddæus, whatever thou dost, thou performest by the power of God, and therefore we greatly admire thee. But, we pray thee moreover, give us some farther account of the Advent of Jesus, how and after what manner it was; of his power also, and by what virtue he wrought those mighty works we have heard: I shall now be silent, replied Thaddæus, because I am sent to publish the word of God: but assemble all the men of thy City together to me to morrow, and I will preach the word of God to them, and will disperse the word of life among them, and expound the Advent of Jesus, after what manner it was, his Commission, and for what reason his Father sent him; the power of his works, the mysteries he declar'd to the world, by what power he wrought so great miracles, his new preaching, the slender and mean reputation he made himself of, the despicableness of his outward man, how Tiberius. he humbled himself even unto death, how he lessen'd his Divinity, how many and great things he suffer'd of the Jews, how he was crucified, how he descended into Hell, and rent asunder that Inclosure never before fevered; how he rose again, and together with himself, raised those from the dead who had lain buried many ages; how he descended from Heaven alone, but ascended to his Father accompanied with a great multitude; how with glory he is set down at the right hand of God his Father in Heaven, and how he will come again with power and glory to judge both quick and dead. Agbarus therefore commanded the men of his City to come together very early and hear Thaddæus preach. After this he commanded, that gold and silver should be given to Thaddæus; but he refused it, saying, how shall we, who have left all that was our own, take any thing that is another's? These things were done in the <sup>(f)</sup> three <sup>(f)</sup> This hundredth and fortieth year. All this being translated word for word out of the Syriack tongue, and not unprofitable to be read, we have thought good to set down opportunely in this place.

the Edessens, falleth with the first year of the two hundredth and second Olympiad. For the Edessens number their years from the hundredth and seventeenth Olympiad, fixing their Æra upon the first year of Selenus his Reign in Asia (as Eusebius writes in his Chronicon) from which time to the beginning of the two hundredth and second Olympiad, there are just three hundred and forty years. Now the beginning of the two hundredth and second Olympiad falleth with the fiftieth year of Tiberius Cæsar; in which year, as many of the Antients believed, our Blessed Saviour suffered and ascended. So that this account falls right, placing Thaddæus his coming to Edessa, and his curing King Agbarus on the same year, in which our Blessed Saviour suffered. Note, that the Edessens began their year, from the Autumnal Equinox, according to the custom of the Syrians, and almost all the Eastern Nations. Valef.

W HATsoever was necessary to be premised by way of Preface to Our Ecclesiastical History, both concerning the Divinity of the comfortable Word, the Antiquity of the Points of our Doctrine and Evangelical Polity; and also moreover concerning the Manifestation our Saviour lately made of himself, his Passion and the Election of the Apostles, we have treated of in the foregoing Book, and briefly summ'd up the Proofs thereof. Now therefore in this, we will diligently look into what followed upon his Ascension; partly from what we find noted in Holy Writ, and partly from other Records, which we will mention in due place.

C H A P. I.

Of those things which were instituted by the Apostles after the Ascension of Christ.

(a) At these words we began the first Chapter, following the Authority partly of Rufinus, partly of the King's, Marci, and Fab. M. SS. or, what goes before is a Preface. Valef.

(a) F I R S T of all therefore, Matthias, who, as before, has been manifested, was one of the Lord's Disciples, by lot was elected into the Apostleship of the Traitor Judas. Then, seven approved men were by prayer and imposition of the Apostles hands ordain'd

Deacons for the publick administration of the Churches affairs; of which number Stephen was one: who (b) immediately after his Ordination, (b) The as if he had been made Deacon only for this, year wherein was the first that, after the Lord, was slain by Stephen those very Jews that had been the Lord's murdered Martyrdom is not agreed on by all: Some say it was the third year after Christ's passion, which was the last of Tiberius, so Synellus. Others say he was martyr'd on the 7th of the Calend. of Jas, that same year in which Christ suffered. So Scaliger says in his Excerpt. Chronolog. which he puts out with Euseb. Chronicon. p. 68. and this seems to have been the opinion of Eusebius, as appears from this place. Valef.

Tiberius, there's, who stoned him to death: And thus he, being the first of the worthy victorious Martyrs of Christ, gain'd a crown (c) answer'd to his name. Then James also, who was term'd the (d) brother

(d) That this James was not the Son of the B. Virgin, nor yet of Joseph by one Eschela a former wife; but of Mary the wife of Cleophas sister to the B. Virgin, may thus be made appear. We read Ps. 19. 25, that there stood by the Cross of Christ his Mother, and his Mother's sister Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalen: In the rest of the Evangelists we find at the same place (Matth. 27. 56.) Mary Magdalen, and Mary the mother of James and Joses; and again at the Sepulchre (Matth. 28. 1.) Mary Magdalen and the other Mary. Wherefore that other Mary by the conjunction of these Testimonies, appeareth to be the sister of the B. Virgin, to be the wife of Cleophas, and the mother of James and Joses; and consequently James and Joses the brethren of the Lord, were not the sons of Mary his mother, nor of Joseph by a former wife, but of the other Mary, and therefore called his brethren, according to the language of the Jews (See Gen. 13. 8. & 12. 4. & 29. 12.) because that other Mary was the sister of his mother. See Bishop Pearson on the Creed. p. 176. Edit. Lond. 1669.

the Just, John and Peter, which they delivered to the rest of the Apostles, and those to the Seventy Disciples, one of whom was Barnabas. But there were two James's; the one surnamed the Just, who was cast head-long from the Battlements of the Temple, and beaten to death with a Fuller's Club: The other was beheaded. Paul makes mention of this James the Just, writing thus: *Gal. 1. 19. * Other of the Apostles saw I none save James the Lord's brother.* At this time also all that our Saviour had promised to the King of the Ostrogoths was fulfilled. For Thormis, moved thereto by Divine impulse, sent Thaulens to Edessa to be a Preacher and Evangelist of the Doctrine of Christ, as from a Record there found we have a little before manifested. He, when he was come thither, did in the name of Christ both cure Agbarus, and also astonish'd all the Inhabitants of the Country with the wonderfulness of his Miracles. And when he had sufficiently prepared them with such works, and brought them to an adoration of Christ's power, he made them Disciples of his wholesome Doctrine. From that very time until now the whole City of the Edessens has continued to be consecrated to Christ's name, enjoying no trivial evidences of our Saviour's graciousness towards them. And these things are said as from the History of the old Records. We will now return again to Holy Writ. After the Martyrdom of Stephen, when the first and forest persecution of the Church at Jerusalem by the Jews arose, all the Disciples of Christ, except the Twelve only, being scatter'd throughout Judea and Samaria, some of them travelling as far as Phenice and Cyprus and Antioch, as holy Scripture testifieth, were not able to be so bold as to communicate the word of Faith to the Gentiles, but preach'd * Acts. 8, to the Jews only. At that time * Paul also unwilling then made havock of the Church, entring

into every house of the faithful, halling men and women, and committing them to prison. Moreover * Philip, one of those who was ordain'd Deacon with Stephen, being one of them that were dispersed, went down to Samaria, and being full of the Divine Power, was the first that preach'd the Word to those Inhabitants. And the Grace of God did so effectually co-operate with him, that by his preaching he drew after him Simon Magus with many other men. This Simon, at that time very famous, did so far prevail with those whom he had deceiv'd by his imposture, that they thought him to be the Great Power of God. Then therefore this very person, being greatly amazed at the miracles Philip wrought by the power of God, craftily insinuated himself, and so far counterfeited a faith in Christ, that he was baptized. The same thing with admiration we see now done by the followers of his most filthy Sect, who creeping into the Church, as their Fore-father did, like some pestilent and leprous disease, do deeply corrupt all those into whom they are any way able to insinuate that pernicious and incurable poison which lies conceal'd within them. But many of them were cast out of the Church, as soon as their viciousness was discover'd: in like manner Simon himself being at length detected by Peter, was deservedly punish'd. Furthermore, when the wholesome preaching of the Gospel daily increased, Divine Providence brought out of the land of Ethiopia a man of great authority under the Queen of that Country; for those nations are according to their country fashion govern'd by a woman, who being the first of the Gentiles, that by Philip, warn'd of God by a vision, was made partaker of the mysteries of the Divine Word; was also the first fruits of the faithful throughout the world: returning into his own country, he is reported to have been the first publisher of the Knowledge of the Great God, and of the comfortable Advent of our Saviour in the flesh: and so by him was really fulfilled that prediction of the Prophet, * Ethiopia * Phil. 68. shall stretch out her hand unto God. At this time, 31. † Paul, that chosen vessel, was made an Apostle, † Acts 9. not of men, neither by men, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead; being vouchsafed this calling by a vision, and a voice from heaven, which came to him at the Revelation thereof.

CHAPTER II.

How Tiberius was affected at the Relation Pilate sent him of those things concerning Christ.

WHEN the wonderful Resurrection of our Saviour and his Ascension into Heaven was now divulg'd among all men; because it was of old customary that the Governours of Provinces should communicate to the Emperour every strange and unusual accident that hapned within their charge, that so nothing that was done might escape his knowledge; Pilate acquainted the Emperour Tiberius with the Resurrection of our Saviour Jesus Christ, now much talk'd of over all Palestine; giving him an account that he had also heard of many other miracles of his, and how that rising again after he had been dead, he was now by many believ'd to be God. And they say that Tiberius refer'd this matter to the Senate, but the relation was rejected by them; upon pretence, that they had not first approved of the matter, Tiberius.

3. &c.

Tiberius. matter; there being an old law among the Romans, that no one should be Deified but by the suffrage and decree of the Senate; but in reality, that the wholesome preaching of the Divine Doctrine might not stand in need of any human approbation or assistance. When therefore the Senate had rejected the Relation concerning our Saviour, Tiberius persisted in his former judgment, attempting nothing prejudicial to the Doctrine of Christ. This much

(a) Tertullian was by birth a Carthaginian; his father was a Centurion of the Proconsular-Office. He wrote many volumes in Latin, of which his Apology only was done into Greek, but by whom, it is uncertain: He flourished under Severus and Antoninus Caracalla. Valef.

(b) In our translation of this quotation out of Tertullian, we have followed the Original expression of the Author, according to Rigaltius his Edition of him: This Greek Translation being not fully expressive of the Author's mind, as Philofius thinks.

create no God, before he was approved by the Senate. Marcus Aemilius knows this concerning his God Alburnus. And this makes for our advantage, because among you Divinity is weigh'd by human approbation. If God please not man, he shall not be God. Man now must be propitious to God. Tiberius therefore, in whose time the Christian name made its entry into the world, communicated to the Senate the account he had received out of Syria Palestine, whereby the Truth of the Divinity of Christ was made apparent; which he confirm'd with his own Suffrage. But because the Senate had not approved of it, it was rejected: The Emperor persisted in his judgment, threatening the Accusers of the Christians with death. Which Opinion Divine Providence, according to his dispensation, instill'd into the mind of Tiberius Cæsar, that the Preaching of the Gospel then in its infancy, might without impediment spread over the whole world.

C H A P. III.

How the Doctrine of Christ spread in a short time over the whole World.

AND thus by the co-operation of Divine Power, the comfortable Word of God, like the beams of the Sun, on a sudden enlighten'd the whole world, and presently agreeable to the Divine * Scriptures, the sound of the heavenly Evangelists and Apostles went out into all lands, and their words went to the ends of the earth. And indeed in a short time there were throughout all Cities and Villages Churches gather'd, which like a Threshing-floor filled with corn, were throng'd with infinite multitudes. And they, who deriving their ignorance from their Ancestors and their errors of old, were enflam'd as to their Souls with the superstitious worship of Idols, as in an inveterate disease, being freed as it were from their cruel masters, and loosed from their heavy bonds by the power of Christ, and the preaching and miracles of his Disciples, did with scorn reject the multitude of of Gods brought in by Devils, and acknowledged there was one only God the maker of all things; and him they worship'd with the Holy Rites of true Religion, by that divine and sober way of worship which our Saviour had spread among mankind. When therefore the Grace of God diffused it self into rest of the Nations; and Cornelius of the City (a) Cæsarea in Palestine, in (a) It was the first place together with his whole household call'd Cæsarea in Palestine by a vision from Heaven and the ministry of Peter, embraced the Faith of Christ; and many others of the Gentiles at Antioch did the same, to whom the Disciples, dispers'd upon the Persecution that arose about Stephen, preach'd the word of God; the Church at Antioch now was increasing and prospering, in which many were gather'd together, both Prophets from Jerusalem, with whom were Paul and Barnabas, and besides, all other brethren, in number not a few: The appellation of (b) Christians then and there first sprang up, as from a pleasant and fertile soil: And Agabus also, one of the Prophets there present, foretold the Dearth that afterwards hapned; and (c) Paul and Barnabas were sent to relieve the Brethren by the Ministration.

(c) This journey of Paul's to Jerusalem can no way fall upon the times of Tiberius. For Luke writes expressly in the Acts, chap. 11. v. 29, 30. that it happened about that time when Herod Agrippa was smitten by the Angel of the Lord: Which it is most certain, happened in Claudius his time. Valef.

C H A P. IV.

How, after the Death of Tiberius, Caius made Agrippa King over the Jews, and punished Herod with perpetual Banishment.

BUT Tiberius having reigned about two and twenty years, died. Caius succeeding him in the Empire, presently gave (a) Agrippa the Kingdom of Judea, and made him King over the Tetrarchies both of Philip and Lysanias. About the Besides, not long after he gave him Herod's Tetrarchy also, having condemned Herod to perpetual banishment, being together with Herodias his wife deservedly punished for divers enormities: (This was the Herod that was present at our Saviour's Passion.) Josephus is a witness of these things also. Moreover, in this Emperor's time Philo flourish'd, a man highly esteem'd of for his learning by many, not only among us, but also among foreigners. He was indeed by original extract an Hebrew, inferior to none of those that were illustrious in dignity at Alexandria. Moreover, what and how the great pains he bestow'd about Divine matters, and in the learning of his own nation, it is to all evidently manifest. Besides, how excellent was he was at Philosophy and Human Learning, it is needless to relate; for he is said to have excell'd all of his own time in the Platonick and Pythagorean Philosophy which he much affected. Of Caius the Emperor, Caius took from Herod his Tetrarchy of Galilee, and gave it to Agrippa. At length, after the death of Caius, Claudius confirm'd the Kingdom to Agrippa which Caius had given him, and gave him also Judea and Samaria, which his Grandfather Herod had. And so the whole Kingdom of Herod the great was pull'd off by Agrippa. See Philo in Placem & in Legat, ad Caium sub finem; and Joseph, Hist. B. 18. so that Eusebius is mistaken, in that he says, Caius made Agrippa King of Judea. Valef.

CHAPTER V.

How Philo went on an Embassy to Caius upon the Jews account.

(a) There are now extant only two Books of Philo's concerning this Subject, the one entitled in Flaccum, the other de Legatione ad Caium; so that either Egebius forgot their number, or else they were heretofore divided into five Volumes; Neither can any one suspect the other three to be lost: For in those two, we now have, are contained all that happened to the Jews under Caius his Empire. Valef.

reasoning before Caius for the Laws and Customs of his own nation, he obtain'd nothing besides laughter and reproaches, and narrowly escaped the danger of being put to death. Josephus mentions all this in his eighteenth Book of Antiquities, writing thus much word for word: 'More-over, there hapning a sedition at Alexandria among the Jews that dwelt there, and the

(b) Philo says there were five Embassadors of the Jews sent to Rome; See his de Legat. ad Caium sub finem. These Embassadors were sent upon two accounts, first, the Jews complained that the Alexandrians denied their Profeucha by bringing the Emperor's Statues into them; and then, that the Alexandrians went about to deprive the Jews of their freedom of the City Alexandria. Valef.

jects of the Roman Empire built Temples and Altars to Caius, and at all points worship'd him as they did their Gods, the Jews only, said he, accounted it a vile thing to erect Statues to him, and to swear by his name. When Apion had urg'd these and many other vehement accusations against them, whereby he hoped, it was likely, to incense Caius, Philo chief of the Jewish Embassy, a man every way famous,

(c) So that the chief Magistrate among the Jews at Alexandria was called: He held his place as long as he lived; and at his death the Jews chose another into his room. See Philo in Flaccum. Valef.

him, commanding him to depart immediately from his presence. And the Emperor was so highly incensed, that none doubted but he would most severely punish the Jews. But Philo being much reviled went out, and, as they say, spake to the Jews that were about him to

(d) Philo's meaning here is, that Caius indeed was angry with the Jews as to appearance, and in words; but that in reality he did arm God, and set him in array against himself. For, in that Caius would have himself called god, he provoked God to take vengeance of him. Antilegomenon (whence the word here used is derived) is a military term, and signifies, to set an army in array against an enemy. Valef.

unto annex only so much as shall make it evidently plain to the Readers, that these miseries straightway without any delay befel the Jews; C. Caligula, upon account of their enormous impieties committed against Christ. First of all therefore he relates, that in the Reign of Tiberius one Sejanus of the City of Rome, a person who then could do much with the Emperor, did use his utmost endeavour to destroy that whole nation; and that in Judea, Pilate, in whose time that horrible wickedness was most audaciously committed against our Saviour, attempting something about the Temple at Jerusalem which yet stood, contrary to the Customs and Ordinances of the Jews, rais'd vehement commotions among them.

CHAPTER VI.

How great Miseries befel the Jews, after their audacious Wickedness committed against Christ.

HE relates further how, after the death of Tiberius, Caius assuming the Government, was every way sorely injurious towards many, but above all he most heavily annoy'd the whole Jewish nation, which in short we may understand from Philo's own (a) words, writing thus (a) Philo word for word: 'So great therefore was the extravagancy and pride of Caius's carriage towards all, but more especially towards the Jewish nation, which he bitterly hated, and appropriated to himself all their (b) Profeucha's in the rest of the Cities, beginning with those at Alexandria, filling them with his own Images and Statues. For in that he suffered others to consecrate Statues to him, he seem'd in a manner to dedicate them to himself. And he changed and transform'd the Temple at Jerusalem, which hitherto had remain'd undefiled and dignified with all the privileges of a Sanctuary, and made it into a Temple dedicated to himself, causing it thence-forward to be called the Temple of CAIUS (c) JUNIOR JUPITER (d) CONSPICUOUS.' Moreover, the same Author, in his second Book which he entitl'd Of (e) Virtues, relates innumerable other calamities, such as are grievous beyond all expression, that befel the Jews dwelling at Alexandria, during the Government of the foresaid Caius. To whom Josephus agrees, who notes that those troubles with which the whole Jewish nation was molested, began even from the times of Pilate, and from those enormous facts committed against our Saviour. Let us therefore hear what he also declares in his second Book of the Jewish Wars, in these (f) words, 'Pilate being by Tiberius sent Procurator Bell. Ind. into Judea, brought into Jerusalem by night L. 2. c. 8. the veiled Images of Caesar, which are called

(b) The Jews had two sorts of places, besides their Temple, (which was for sacrifice) for religious duties; viz. their Profeucha, and Synagogues; the difference between them was this; the Profeucha was a Plot of ground encompassed with a wall or some other inclosure, and open above; the use of it was properly for Prayer; a Synagogue was a covered Edifice, where the Law and Prophecies were read and expounded, and the People instructed in divine Matters; besides, the Synagogues were within, the Profeucha without the Cities. They were in use before the Captivity, as may be gathered from Isa. 24. 26. Psal. 74. 7. See Acts 16. 13. Mr. Mede.

(c) So Caligula was called, to distinguish him from Julius Caesar, who was also called Caius, and was deified. Valef.

(d) Επίφανης, Conspicuous. Valefius translates it præsens; præsentes dei sunt vel qui statim præsentes, vel qui cunctis videntur. Donat. in Ierem. Phorm. That is, the Propitious or Conspicuous Gods were such, as were at hand, or such as were visible to the worshippers. Hence Antiochus King of Syria was called Epiphanes by his flatterers.

(e) Valefius thinks that by this Second Book of Virtues, must be understood Philo's Book in Flaccum; and his reason is, because Philo does no where else but in that Book, relate the calamities that befel the Jews of Alexandria.

and having put him in bonds, would forthwith have put him to death, had he not been miraculously deliver'd out of prison by a Divine apparition, to wit, by an Angel coming to him by night; being dismiss'd for the ministration of preaching. All which hapned to Peter by the disposition of Divine Providence.

C H A P. X.

How Agrippa, called also Herod, persecuting the Apostles, presently felt Divine Vengeance.

BUT the King's attempt to do violence to the Apostles remain'd not long unreveng'd; for a chustifing Minister of Divine Justice pursued him: He therefore, soon after his bloody plot against the Apostles, going down to Cæsarea, as it is related in the Acts of the Apostles, and being there upon the great festival-day dress'd in a white and royal garment, made an Oration to the people from his lofty throne; and when all the multitude gave a shout without acclamations at his Oration, as at the voice of God and not of Man, Sacred Writ declares that he was immediately smitten by an Angel, and was eaten up of worms and gave up the ghost. But the consent between Holy Writ and the History of Josephus, in the account given of this strange thing, is worthy of admiration. In which he, giving evident testimony to the truth in his nineteenth * Book of Antiquities does plainly declare this wonderful thing in these words thus, 'The third year of his Reign over all Judea was now compleated; when he went to the City Cæsarea, heretofore call'd the Tower of Sidon. There he exhibited shows in honour of Cæsar, knowing that (a) Festival to have been instituted for the prosperity of him. Hereunto flock'd a great multitude of those who were honourable and excell'd in dignity, throughout that (b) whole Province. On the second day therefore of the shews, being cloth'd with Robes made all of silver admirably wrought, he entred the Theatre early in the morning. When the silver of his Robes, shining by reason of the beams of the rising-sun cast on them, made a wonderful glittering, striking those who stedfastly look'd on him with wonder and amazement, presently his Flatterers, some from one place, some from another, cry'd out with voices most pernicious to him, terming him God; and beseeching him to be propitious to them. Hitherto, said they, we have revered thee as a Man, but now we acknowledge thee to be above mortal nature. But the King neither rebuked them, nor rejected their impious flattery, presently after looking up heepty'd an (c) Angel sitting over his head; whom he forthwith understood to be the cause of mischief towards him, having (d) heretofore been the foreteller of his prosperity. A pain that pierced his very heart immediately seiz'd him. He had besides a gripping all over his belly, which began with a vehement sharpness, and was continual and without intermission. Looking therefore upon his friends, I your God, says he, am now compelled to end my life; fatal necessity forthwith demonstrating the falshood of your boasting acclamations even now utter'd concerning me: I, who by you was stiled immortal, am now snatch'd away by death. But that destiny is to be born with which God hath decreed. We have in no wise liv'd ill and despicably, but in such splendor as was look'd upon to be most fortunate. When he had spoken these words, he was spent with the vehemency of his pain. Being therefore presently carried into the Palace, a rumour was immediately spread abroad that the King was in imminent danger of his life; straightway the whole multitude with their wives and children (e) sitting upon spread sackcloth, after their country fashion, made supplications to God for the King. Every place was fill'd with wailings and lamentations. But the King lying in an high Bed-chamber, look'd down upon them as they lay prostrate, and could not refrain weeping. At length having been for five days space continually tormented with pains of his belly, he died in the fifty fourth year of (f) his Age, and the seventh of his Reign. For first he reign'd four years under Cæsar, having govern'd the Tetrarchy of Philip three years; in the fourth he had Herod's Tetrarchy annex'd: the three last years of his Reign he pass'd under Claudius Cæsar. Thus far Josephus: wherein, as also in other passages, I much admire him, in that he agrees so exactly with the Holy Scripture. But if any one should think that there is some disagreement about the name of the King; both the time and the action do evidently shew that he was the same person: so that either his name was changed by some mistake of the Transcriber, or else this King had, as many others have, two names.

Of the Impositor Theudas, and his Associates.

BUT because Luke does moreover in the Acts, 4. Acts 5. bring in one Gamaliel (speaking in the consultation the Jews had about the Apostles, of (a) This one (a) Theudas that arose up in those days boasting Theudas himself to be some body, who was slain; and all, as Josephus many as obey'd him, were scatter'd: we also will adjoin the relation of Josephus concerning this very person. Who, in the Book before cited expressly declares thus much word for word: 'When was in Fadus was Procurator of Judea, a certain Impostor, by name Theudas, perwaded a multitude of people to take their Goods with them and to follow him to the River of Jordan: For he said that he was a Prophet, and that he would by his command, part the Waters of the River, the person

(a) This Festival was instituted first by Herod the great in honour of Augustus, in the 192 O. 1. mpiad, says Josephus, (Antiq. L. 16. c. 9.) at the City Cæsarea. Agrippa went to Cæsarea to celebrate it, in the 4 year of Claudius, at the beginning of the 2-6 Olympiad. Vales.

(b) He means Syria, or (which was part of it) Phœnicia; which was call'd the Province, to distinguish it from Judea where Agrippa then reign'd. Indeed Luke says expressly (Acts 12. 20.) that the principal Men of Tyre were then present, which Tyre was the chief City of Phœnicia. Vales.

(c) Josephus calls it: de Sacerdotibus, and Omi: See his words in the B. c. and chap. c. last cited.

(d) To wit, in the reign of Tiberius: When Agrippa, being in bonds, and leaning against a Tree, as he stood before the Palace of Tiberius, saw an Owl sitting over his Head. A German being by, one of his fellow-prisoners foretold this to portend great felicity to Agrippa. See the Story at large in Joseph. Antiq. B. 18. c. 8.

(e) This was the usual posture of the Hebrew mourners. See Job 2. 3. Esaï. 47. 5. Lament. 2. 10. Jonah 3. 63. &c. constant hereunto, the Reveries of the Medals both of Tesepasian and Titus, made for the memory and celebration of the conquest of Judea, were printed with a silent woman sitting on the ground, and leaning her back to a Palm-tree, with this inscription, Judea Capta, i. e. Judea subdada. Note here that the Reveries made to commit victories to memory were always written upon with some representation of proper respect to the place conquered. I know the posture of sitting is a ceremony of Roman lamentation too. But it was first us'd among the Jews, from whom the Romans learned it. Mr. Gregory of Oxford. Chap. 4. pag. 25. &c.

(f) This Man had two Sons, and three daughters; his sons were, Agrippa the younger mentioned Acts 25. and Drusius who died young. His daughters were, Bernice, Mariamne and Drusilla, which last married Relix the procurator of Judea, as we have it in the Acts: Bernice is also mentioned in the Acts coming in great pomp with her brother Agrippa to hear Paul. Joseph. Antiq.

Claudius river, and afford them an easy passage over. By such speeches he deceived many. But Fadus suffered them not to take the benefit of their madness, but sent out a body of horse against them, which falling on them at unawares, partly killed them, and partly took them prisoners. And having taken Theudas alive they beheaded him, and carried his head to Jerusalem." After this the same Writer makes mention of the Death which hapned in the Reign of Claudius, after this manner:—

being Governor of Syria. That Theudas in the Acts therefore must needs be some other Person, whom the Jews had recorded in their Writings, and from thence Gamaliel there recites the story, though we have no other record of it. This is the opinion of Scaliger, in L. 6. de Emendat. Temp. and of Casaubon in Exercit. 2. c. 18. and of Dr. Hammond in his notes on Acts 5. 36. Valesius, in his annotations, differs from all these learned Men, and says that by those words of St. Luke [after this man rose up Judas of Galilee] is meant, that Judas his insurrection was before that of Theudas; which exposition he confirms, by saying, that when ever we begin to reckon from the last, as nearest to us, (to he supposes St. Luke there does) we must necessarily place the last person first in such a reckoning, and the first last: So that notwithstanding St. Luke says [after this man rose up Judas of Galilee] yet Judas his insurrection was long before Theudas's. This he illustrates by two examples of such an expression, one taken out of Tertullian in Apolog. 2. the other out of Clement Alexandr. Lib. 7. Strom. But then being not able to reconcile the time of Theudas his insurrection with the time Josephus places it in, to wit, in the time of Fadus his Procuratorship, he says Josephus was mistaken, placing it later than he should have done. For he will by no means allow two Theudas's. Another way he has to make up this difference, that is, he thinks St. Luke in his expression used a Prolepsis, anticipating the insurrection of Theudas ten years, and makes Gamaliel speak that which was agreeable to his present purpose: And thus Eusebius, he thinks, understood St. Luke's words. The Reader has here the opinion of both sides, and is left to his liberty to believe which he pleases.

Of Helena Queen of the Osdröenians.

(a) Antiq. B. 20. c. 3. AT that time there hapned to be a great Dearth throughout all Judea. When Queen Helena, buying Bread-corn in Egypt at a very dear price, distributed it to them that were in want. All which we find agreeable to what is related in the Acts of the Apostles; where we have this moreover, That the Disciples which dwelt at Antioch, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea; which also they did, and sent it to the Elders by the hands of Barnabas and Paul. But of this Helena, which Josephus has mentioned, there is an illustrious Sepulchral-monument yet to be seen, standing in the Suburbs of Jerusalem, which is now called Elia; and she is said to have been Queen of the Adiabeni.

(b) There were three Pyramids standing, three furlongs from Jerusalem, where the bones of this Helena were buried, says Joseph. Antiq. B. 20. c. 2. he mentions them again in his 6 B. of the Jews Wars. Jerom mentions them in his Oration de Obi. B. Paulus, and says they were standing in his time. Pausanias (in Arcadicis) reckoning up the lately Sepulchres he had seen, admires two above all the rest, to wit, that of Mausolus in Caria, and this of Helena in Judea. This Helena had a Palace in Jerusalem, says Josephus, in the 6 B. of the Jews Wars. Vales.

C H A P. XIII.

Of Simon Magus.

BUT the Faith of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ being now every where diffused among all men; that enemy of man's salvation, plotting to possess himself of the Royal City, brings thither the fore-mentioned Simon. And, joining his enchantments to that man's craftiness, he made many that dwell at Rome his own by inducing them into error. This Justin evidences; a man very famous amongst the Professors of our Religion soon after the Apostles time; whose worth we will give account of in due place. Let us read what he has writ in his (a) second Apology to Antoninus for our Doctrine, where he says thus: 'And after the ascension of our Lord into heaven, the Devils sent forth certain men who filled themselves with Gods: whom you were so far from persecuting, that you worship'd them. Amongst them there was one Simon a Samaritan, of the Village named Gitton, who in the Reign of Claudius, Cesar, having performed many magical wonders by the assistance and art of Devils within your City Rome, the Metropolis of the Empire, was accounted a God by you, to whom you dedicated an image, as to a God, in an Island of the River Tiber, between the two Bridges, with this Latin Inscription, (b) SIMONI DEO SANCTO, that is, to Simon the Holy God. Him almost all the Samaritans, and some of other nations, confess to be the great God, and worship him; as also one (c) Helena, at that time a constant companion of his, who heretofore was a Prostitute in the Stews of Tyre, a City of Phenicia; and her they term the prime Notion (or first Conception) from him. Thus far he: with whom agrees Irenaeus in his first Book against Heresies, wherein he sets forth the Life of this man, his impious and most impure Doctrine, which it would be superfluous here to relate; since any one that has a desire may fully understand from the foresaid Books of Irenaeus, wherein these things are accurately deliver'd, the original, the life, the grounds and reasons of the false opinions, and the endeavours and purposes not only of this Simon, but also of all other Arch-Heretics. We have heard that this Simon was indeed the chief Captain and first Author of all Heresie. From which time even to our age, those who are followers of his Heresie, altho' they pretend to have embraced throughout their whole lives, the Christian Religion renowned amongst all men for its modesty and sanctity; yet nevertheless they relapse to the superstitious worship of Devils, which they seem'd to have abandon'd, prostituting themselves before the Images and Pictures of Simon and his forementioned Helena, whom they worship with sweet perfumes, sacrifices and oblations. And those things which are transacted in secret amongst them, which, say they, do forthwith strike terror into the minds of those that at first hear them, and which (to use the terms of their own written Oracle) do make them tremble and shake by reason of astonishment, are in truth full of terror, amazement of mind, and outrageous

(a) This place of Justin is now to be found not in his first but in his second Apology. Eusebius in citing Justin's Apologies follows not the order of our common Editions. For he always calls that the first which our Editions term the second; and that the second which they call the first: Of which more hereafter. Vales.

(b) The Learned have long since observed, that Justin, by reason of his unskillfulness in the Latin tongue, was here mistaken; thinking that the Image dedicated to Simon Magus was consecrated to Simon Magus. 'Tis certain, that image which Justin had seen in the Island of Tiber, was lately dug up, with this inscription upon it, Simoni Sango Deo Fidio. Sanus was a God among the Sabini that had the charge of bargains and contracts, whence he had the names of Sangus and Fidius. By him the Romans were wont to swear. Some Samaritans, no doubt, deceived Justin, making him believe this Image was dedicated to their Simon Magus. Vales.

(c) G. Rufinus calls her Selene. Vales.

Claudius ragious madnes: so that it is impossible not only to commit them to writing, but even for men of modesty to utter them through their lips, by reason of their excessive obscenity and uncleanness not to be named. For there is not, nor can there be invented any thing so impure, which their most lewd Sect does not far surpass; as deluding silly women laden with all manner of iniquity.

CHAP. XIV.

Of Peter the Apostle's Preaching at Rome.

THE Devil, that hater of all goodness and most treacherous enemy of man's salvation, at this time produced this Simon the author and contriver of so much mischief, that he might be the great Antagonist of the Divine Apostles of our Saviour. But the Divine and Celestial Grace, which is always assistant to Ministers, by their appearance and presence soon quenched the flame, enkindled by the Devil, humbling and depressing by them all haughtiness and swelling pride that exalted it self against the knowledge of God. Wherefore, neither the devices of Simon, nor of any other which then were hatch'd, became any ways prevalent during the age of the Apostles. For the splendour of the truth vanquished and prevailed against all machinations; and the power of the Divine Word, which had newly enlighten'd mens minds from heaven, did both flourish upon earth, and also was conversant and did effectually co-operate with the Apostles. Straightway therefore the foresaid Impostor, having the eyes of his mind blinded by a divine and wonderful splendour and light, as soon as he was detected by the Apostle Peter in Judea, in what he had wickedly committed, took a great journey over-sea, and fled from the Eastern to the Western parts; concluding that he could no other way live freely, and according to his own mind. Arriving at Rome, by the help and assistance of a Devil (a) there lying in wait, he in a short time so far perfected his attempt, that the inhabitants of that City set up in large to him, and worship'd him as God. But all succeeded not long according to his mind. For soon after, in the Reign of Claudius, the benign and most endearing Providence of God brought Peter, that valiant and great Apostle, for courage chief of all the rest, to Rome, against this mighty destroyer of mankind, who, as a stout Leader of God, armed with celestial weapons, brought that precious merchandise of ineffable light from the East to those that dwell towards the West: declaring to them that Light and Doctrine comfortable to the soul, to wit, the publication of the kingdom of Heaven.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Gospel according to Mark.

WHEN therefore he had publish'd to them the Divine Word, immediately the power of Simon was extinct, and, together with the man (a) himself destroy'd. But so great a lustre of Piety enlighten'd the minds of them (a) From these words of Eusebius it is concluded that the death of Simon Magus happened at Rome in the time of Claudius: For Eusebius writeth that Peter came to Rome in Claudius his reign, and that presently after, Simon's magical arts were by his coming destroyed, together with the Author. Though there be others that say Simon was destroyed in Nero's time. Valef.

that were the hearers of Peter, that they thought it not sufficient barely to hear him once, nor were contented to have receiv'd the publication of the Doctrine of the Celestial Word by word of mouth and unwritten. Therefore they earnestly entreated Mark, Peter's follower, whose Gospel is at this day extant, that he would leave with them some written record of that Doctrine they had heard. Neither did they desist till they had prevailed with the man; and thus they gave (b) This the occasion of writing that Gospel, which is called place of the Gospel according to Mark. When the Apostle Peter understood by the Revelation of the Holy Spirit what was done, he was much delighted in his 6. B. that writing by his authority, that so thenceforward it should be read in the Churches. Eusebius in his Sixth Book of Institutions relates this passage. To whom the Bishop of Hierapolis, by name Papian, may be added as a witness. Furthermore, Peter mentions Mark, in his former Epistle, which, as they say, was written at Rome; Peter himself does intimate thus much (calling Rome by (c) a figure Babylon) in these words; * The Church that is at Babylon elected together with you, saluteth you, and so doth Marcellus my son. Valef. * 1 Pet. 5. 13.

CHAP. XVI.

That Mark first preached the knowledge of Christ to the Egyptians.

BUT this Mark (a) going into Egypt is reported to have been the first publisher him in this there of the Gospel he had written, and to have settled Churches in the very City of Alexandria. And furthermore, that so great a multitude both of men and women, who there embraced the Faith of Christ, profess'd from the very beginning so severe and so philosophical a course of life, that Philo vouchsafed in his writings to relate their converse, their assemblies, their eating and drinking together, and their whole manner of living.

Synellus say he went in the third year of C. Caligula: it's the opinion of Eutychius Patriarch of Alexandria, that Mark went thither in the ninth year of Claudius. Valef.

CHAP. XVII.

What Philo relates of the Ascetics in Egypt.

IT is reported that this Philo in the times of Claudius came to be familiarly acquainted with Peter at Rome, who then preach'd the word of God there: neither is this unlikely. For that work of his, of which we speak, being by him elaborated a long time after, does manifestly contain all the Ecclesiastical Rules which are to this present observed amongst us. And seeing he describes evidently the lives of the (a) Ascetics amongst us, he does make it sufficiently perspicuous that he did not see, but also very much approve of and admire the Apostolical men of his time, who being, as it is probable, originally Jews, upon that account did then observe in a great measure the Judaical Rites and Customs. First of all therefore, in that Book his they who he intitled, Of Contemplative Life, or, Suppliants, having confessed that he would infer a retired, and more severe and strict sort of life: So they were called from that Philosophical term [Asketes] which signifies the exercise of virtue and abstinence: And any one that led such a life was called asketes, i.e. Ascetic. The Reader may have farther satisfaction in this matter in Bishop Montague's Asks & Mons, Chap. 7. where he will find this business discussed at large.

Claudius says that the men were called (b) Therapeutæ, and the women that were conversant among them Therapeutriæ: And he adjoins the reason of that appellation, either because like Physicians they healed the minds of those that resorted to them, curing them of their vicious affections, or because they worship'd the Deity with a pure and sincere service and adoration. Further, whether Philo himself gave them this name, devising an appellation agreeable to the manners and dispositions of the men; or whether they were really so called from the beginning, the name of Christians having not yet been every where spread and diffused, it is not necessary positively to affirm or contend about it. But he attests that in the first place they part with their goods; saying, "that as soon as they be take themselves to this course of Philo sophizing they put over their wealth and possessions to their Relations. Then casting away all care of worldly matters, they leave the Cities, and make their abode in gardens and solitary places; well knowing, the conversing with men of a different and disagreeing persuasion to be unprofitable and hurtful." Which thing the Christians of that time seem to me to have instituted out of a generous and most fervent ardour of faith, endeavouring to emulate the Prophetical severe course of life. There-fore in the * Acts of the Apostles (which contain 34:35, 36) nothing but the perfect truth) it is shewed, that all the Disciples of the Apostles selling their possessions and goods, divided the price among the brethren according as every one had need. that so there might not be any indigent person among them. For, as the Word says, As many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prizes of the things that were sold and laid them down at the Apostles feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need. After Philo has attested the very same things with these, of the Therapeutæ, he adds thus much farther concerning them, word for word sayings,

"This (c) sort of men indeed is diffused far and wide over the whole world. For it was requisite that both Greeks and Barbarians should be partakers of so excellent a benefit. Egypt especially is full of them, throughout all its divisions, but most of all about Alexandria: but from all places the principal of them retir'd themselves into a most commodious place above the Lake Maria, situate upon a little rising hill, excellently well feared both for wholeness of air and safe convenience of abiding, as into the Country of the Therapeutæ." Then, after he had described their houses, after what manner they were built, he speaks thus of the Churches they have in divers places. "In every house there is a Chapel they called a Semaueum, and Monasterium, in which alone by themselves they perform the mysteries of a holy life.

(c) Philo's Description of these Therapeutæ in these following words can no way agree with the Christian Professors in those times. For they were then few in number, neither did they look upon any Country as their own, besides the Heavenly Jerusalem. Valef.

"They bring in thither neither meat nor drink, nor any corporal provisions or necessities; but only the Law, and the Divine Oracles of the Prophets, and Hymns and such like, whereby knowledge and piety are increased and perfected." And a little after he says; "All the interval of time from Sun-rising to the Evening they spend in meditations of Philosophy: For reading the holy Scriptures, they philosophize after their Country way, and expound allegorically. For they suppose that the words are only Notes and Marks of some things of a mystical nature, which are to be explained (d) figuratively. They have writings of some ancient persons, who have been heretofore famous Leaders of their Sect, and have left them many monuments of that learning which consists in dark and secret expressions, which they using as original platforms, do imitate thereby that course of study." These certainly seem to be words of such a man as had heard some of our Religion expounding the Holy Scriptures. And it is very likely that the writings of those ancient persons, which he says they had, were the Gospels and Writings of the Apostles, and certain Expositions of the ancient Prophets, of which sort many are contained both in other Epistles of Paul, and also in that written to the Hebrews, Afterwards Philo thus writeth concerning the new Psalms composed by them. "They do not only spend their time in contemplation, but they (f) compose Songs and Hymns to the praise of God of all sorts of metre and musical verse, which they write in grave and seemly Rhimes." He relates many other things of them in that Book I mention'd: but I judg'd these fittest to be selected and pick'd out, in which certain marks of Church discipline are propoed. But if any one shall think what Philo here says to be in no wise proper to the Evangelical Polity, but may be adapted to others besides those I have mention'd, he will certainly be convinc'd by Philo's following words; in which, if he shall duly weigh the matter, he will receive a most undoubted testimony of this thing. Now he writes thus: "Having first laid temperance as certain foundation, they build thereupon the other virtues: for none of them takes either meat or drink before sun-set; for they hold it requisite to spend the day in the study of Philosophy, and the night in making necessary provision for the body. Therefore they allow the whole day to study, but allow a very small portion of the night for bodily provision. Some of them forget to eat for three days together, so great

For it was requisite that both Greeks and Barbarians should be partakers of so excellent a benefit. Egypt especially is full of them, throughout all its divisions, but most of all about Alexandria: but from all places the principal of them retir'd themselves into a most commodious place above the Lake Maria, situate upon a little rising hill, excellently well feared both for wholeness of air and safe convenience of abiding, as into the Country of the Therapeutæ." Then, after he had described their houses, after what manner they were built, he speaks thus of the Churches they have in divers places. "In every house there is a Chapel they called a Semaueum, and Monasterium, in which alone by themselves they perform the mysteries of a holy life.

(f) The composition of Psalms and Hymns was not in use so early in the Church, as these words of Philo must suppose, if we understand them to be spoken of the Christians, that came in after the times of Antoninus, when learned men began to embrace the Christian Faith. So that neither can these words of Philo be any ways understood of Christians. The junior Pliny indeed (in his Epistle to Trajan, Lib. 10. Epist. 97.) says it was a custom of the Christians in their Cenae, carmen Christo tanquam Deo dicere seculum invicem; i. e. to say one with another by turns a Verse or Hymn to Christ as unto God. But there is a difference between saying and composing a Song or Hymn; and besides, this was long after Philo's time. See Dr. Hammond's Preface to his Exposition on the Psalms; and Mr. Gregory's Posthumous Works, Discourse ad.

"They bring in thither neither meat nor drink, nor any corporal provisions or necessities; but only the Law, and the Divine Oracles of the Prophets, and Hymns and such like, whereby knowledge and piety are increased and perfected." And a little after he says; "All the interval of time from Sun-rising to the Evening they spend in meditations of Philosophy: For reading the holy Scriptures, they philosophize after their Country way, and expound allegorically. For they suppose that the words are only Notes and Marks of some things of a mystical nature, which are to be explained (d) figuratively. They have writings of some ancient persons, who have been heretofore famous Leaders of their Sect, and have left them many monuments of that learning which consists in dark and secret expressions, which they using as original platforms, do imitate thereby that course of study." These certainly seem to be words of such a man as had heard some of our Religion expounding the Holy Scriptures. And it is very likely that the writings of those ancient persons, which he says they had, were the Gospels and Writings of the Apostles, and certain Expositions of the ancient Prophets, of which sort many are contained both in other Epistles of Paul, and also in that written to the Hebrews, Afterwards Philo thus writeth concerning the new Psalms composed by them. "They do not only spend their time in contemplation, but they (f) compose Songs and Hymns to the praise of God of all sorts of metre and musical verse, which they write in grave and seemly Rhimes." He relates many other things of them in that Book I mention'd: but I judg'd these fittest to be selected and pick'd out, in which certain marks of Church discipline are propoed. But if any one shall think what Philo here says to be in no wise proper to the Evangelical Polity, but may be adapted to others besides those I have mention'd, he will certainly be convinc'd by Philo's following words; in which, if he shall duly weigh the matter, he will receive a most undoubted testimony of this thing. Now he writes thus: "Having first laid temperance as certain foundation, they build thereupon the other virtues: for none of them takes either meat or drink before sun-set; for they hold it requisite to spend the day in the study of Philosophy, and the night in making necessary provision for the body. Therefore they allow the whole day to study, but allow a very small portion of the night for bodily provision. Some of them forget to eat for three days together, so great great is their desire of knowledge that possesseth them. But some others of them are well pleased with, and feed so richly and deliciously upon the banquet of wisdom, which sets before them wholesome precepts as a most sumptuous feast, that they are wont scarce to taste any necessary food in twice that space, to wit, in six days time." We suppose these words of Philo to be evidently and without all doubt spoken concerning those of our Religion. But if after all this any one shall still persist in a peremptory denial of these things, he will at length recede from his obstinate difficulty of belief, being persuaded to submit to such manifest demonstrations as are no where to be found but in the Christian Religion, composed according to the rule of the Gospel. Philo says further therefore, that among these men, of whom we speak, there are certain women conversant, many of which continue Virgins being old; not out of necessity, like some of those amongst the Grecian Priests, but voluntarily preserving their chastity out of an ardent affection to and desire of wisdom; in the embraces and familiarity whereof they earnestly affect to spend their lives; having despised all bodily pleasures, and desiring earnestly not a mortal issue but an immortal; which that mind only that loves and is beloved of God can of itself bring forth." After many other expressions, he speaks yet more plainly thus: "Their Explications of Holy Writ are figurative by way of Allegories: for these men suppose the whole Law to be like a living creature; the bare words whereof are, as it were the body, and the invisible sense, that lies hid under the words, resembles the soul. Which sense this Sect have and do make it their Religion earnestly to search into and contemplate, beholding in the words, as in a glass, the admirable beauty of the meaning." There is no necessity of adding further here an account of their assemblies, of the distinct apartments of their men and women, and of their several studies and holy exercises, now in use amongst us, more especially about the feast of our Lord's Passion, when we are wont to practise them in fastings, watchings, and attentive reading of holy Scriptures. All which the man we have so often mention'd, does relate in his writings accurately, after the same manner in which we only at

(a) Eusebius means that whole week which precedes the feast of Easter, which the Greek Fathers call οὐρανὴν ἑβδομάδα, the great week, and we the Passion week. But in Philo's Book there is no mention of this feast of Easter. He speaks indeed μεγάλην ἑβδομάδα, of a great solemnity; but by his following words 'tis evident he means the Jewish-feast of weeks, or, our Pentecost. Valef.

ter parts only of the verses. And how through-out those days lying in straw upon the ground, they wholly abstain from wine (as he has said in these express words) and eat nothing that has blood in it: water is their only drink, and their food is bread with salt and hyssop. Farther he describes the order and degrees of their Governments, to wit, (b) those who perform the Ecclesiastical Offices, then the Ministrations of the Deacons, and lastly the Episcopal prefi-ciency over all. He that desires to know these things more accurately, may be therein inform'd from the fore-mentioned History of Philo. It is therefore apparently evident to every one, that Philo writing thus, did mean thereby those first Preachers of the Evangelical Doctrine, and the Discipline, at the beginning delivered by the Apostles.

C H A P. XVIII.

What Writings of Philo's have come to our hands.

Moreover this Philo being a man of a fluent utterance, and abundant in sentences, also lofty and high in contemplations upon the holy Scriptures, compiled a diverse and variable exposition of the sacred Volumes of holy Writ: partly explaining in a fit and agreeable series and order, the subject-matter of the things contain'd in Genesis, which he entitl'd The Allegories of the Holy Laws: and partly making particular and distinct explications of those Chapters in Scripture which contain any thing in them that is dubious, with objections thereupon and solutions thereof; which also he fitly entitl'd Questions and Solutions upon Genesis and Exodus. There are besides elaborate tracts of his peculiarly written concerning certain Problems; such as are, two Books Of Husbandry, and as (a) This many of Drunkeness, and some others, having Book of different and fit Titles: Such is that, (a) Of the things which a sober mind prayeth for, and which it detesteth; and that, Of the confusion of Languages; Valef. and that, Of (b) flight and invention; and that, Of Assemblies upon account of obtaining Learning: and concerning the subject, Who is the Heir of Divine things, or, Of Division into parts equal, and their contraries: and also that, Of the three Virtues which with others Moses wrote of. Besides, that, Of them whose names are changed, and for what reason they are changed: In which Book he says, he wrote Of Testaments the first and the second. There is also another Book of his, Of removals in journey, or shifting of places, and of the life of a wise man perfected according to righteousness, or, Of unwritten Laws, and also, Of Giants, and that God is immutable; also,

(c) That Dreams are sent from God, according to the opinion of Moses's five Books. And thus many are the Books he wrote on Genesis which have come to our hands. We have also known five Books of his, of Questions and Solutions upon Exodus; and also that, of the Tabernacle, and that of the Decalogue, and those four Books, of those Laws which in specie have reference to the chief heads of the Decalogue; and that, of those beasts fit for sacrifice, and, what be the kinds of sacrifices; and that, of the rewards and punishments propounded in the Law as well to the Good as to the Evil; and, of curses. Besides all these, there are extant of his particular

(b) In Suidas this Book is called, ὑπερβασις καὶ ὑποβασις which inscription Suidas took from Sophronius the interpreter of Jerom. But our excellent M. SS. Mar. Aed. Fab. and Sir Henry Savill's have it thus, ὑπερβασις καὶ ἀποβασις. Wherefore I agree with Nicephorus, who rightly distinguish'd the two Books of Philo: the one of which was entitl'd, ὑπερβασις καὶ ἀποβασις, of flight and choice; the other, ὑπερβασις καὶ ὑποβασις; that is, Of nature and invention. Whence it appears that that Book of Eusebius, which Nicephorus made use of, was in this place more correct than our copies. Valef.

(c) 'Tis manifest that Philo wrote three Books on this Subject, That Dreams are sent from God. The first of which is lost; the second is extant in the Paris Edition of Philo, pag. 455, in the beginning whereof he makes mention of a former Book which he had written on that subject. The third is also extant in the same Edition, pag. 1103, but misplaced. Whether he wrote any more than these three, is uncertain. Suidas mentions five Books of Philo's De Somniis. Valef.

(b) He means the Presbyters; concerning whom, see Philo, in his said Book, De vita contemplat. p. 399. Edit. Par. Valef.

Books,

Claudius. Books, as that, Of (d) Providence, and a Discourse compiled by him; (e) Of the Jews, and of the man leading a civil life: also, Alexander, or, Mar. and That Brutes are endowed with Reason. Besides, of this, That every wicked man is a Slave, to which follows in order this Book, That every man studious of Virtue is free. After these he compiled that Book Of Contemplative life, or, Of Suppliants, out of which we have cited those things concerning the lives of the Apostolical men. Also, the interpretations of the (f) Hebrew names in the Law and in the Prophets, are said to have been done by his diligence. This Philo coming to Rome in the time of Caius, wrote a Book of Caius's hatred of God, which, by way of scoff and irony, he entitled, Of Virtues; which Book, it's said, he rehearsed before the whole Roman Senate in the time of Claudius; and the piece was so taking, that his admirable Works were thought worthy to be dedicated to the Public Libraries. At the same time, when Paul travel'd from Jerusalem round about to Illyria, (g) Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome. (h) At which time Aquila and Priscilla, with other Jews, departing from Rome, arrived in Asia, where they conversed with Paul the Apostle, then confirming the foundations of those Churches there newly laid by him. Even the Holy Book of the Apostles teaches us these things. There is an eminent fragment of it in Eusebius De preparat. Libr. 8. cap. Ultim. and in Libr. 7. cap. 21. Valef.

(e) I doubt not but it should be written ὁπὸς Ἰουδαίων, For the Jews, for so this Book is quoted by Eusebius in his 8 B. De Preparat. Evangelic. chap. 10. where there is a most elegant place produced in ὁπὸς Ἰουδαίων Συναγωγὰς, i. e. out of the Apology of Philo for the Jews. Rufinus confirms this our emendation; who turns this place thus, de Judeis Apologeticus Liber. Valef.

(f) Serame makes mention of this Book of Philo's, in his interpretation of the Hebrew names. Moreover, Philo having, only interpreted those names that occur in the Law and the Prophets, Origen added afterwards an interpretation of the words and names of the New Testament; supplying that which seemed to be wanting in Philo's Book, as Serame writes in that Book of his now mentioned. Valef.

(g) Eusebius took this out of the Acts of the Apostl. chap. 18. v. 2. And Origen writes, as he had it out of Josephus, that this was done in the ninth year of Claudius. But that place of Josephus which Origen quotes is not now extant. Therefore Origen seems to me to have forgotten himself. And truly, it is not very likely, that Claudius the Emperor, who had so great a kindness for the Jews, as appears by his many Edicts extant in Josephus, should drive the Jews in particular out of the City. I should rather think, whereas there was a great famine at Rome (which in Eusebius's Chronicon is said to have happened in the tenth year of Claudius) that Claudius expelled all Foreigners out of the City, amongst whom were the Jews also. For so Augustus did before; and 'twas frequently practised by the following Emperors, as oft as the City of Rome was in any scarcity of Provision: And so I judge that place of Luke in the Acts is to be understood. But if any one, relying on the Authority of Suetonius (whose Words are these; Tulius impulso CHRISTO OFFENDIT tumultumque Romæ expulsi; in the Life of Claudius. See Dr. Eussemus's Annot. on Acts 26. v. 31.) does reject this our Opinion, I will not much withstand him. All the Chronologers downwards follow Origen; as does also Barnabas in his Annals. Whom I much wonder at, in that when he had placed this Edit of Claudius on the ninth year of his Reign, he should also cast the Jerusalem Council upon the same year. Which is manifestly repugnant to the History of the Acts of the Apostles. For, after the Jerusalem Council, which is related Acts 15, Paul going back to Antioch, delivered the Epistle of the Apostles to the brethren, and is said to have tarried there some time. After this, being parted from Barnabas, he went into Syria and Cilicia, Preaching the Word of God. Then he travelled into Phrygia, Galatia, and Mysia, where he was warned by the Holy Spirit in a dream to fall into Macedonia, and first Preach'd the Faith of Christ at Philippi; after that, at Thessalonica and Berea. Sailing thence to Athens, he stayed there a good while expecting Timotheus and Sylas; and Preach'd the Word of God to the Athenians. Then going to Corinth he found Aquila and Priscilla there, who were lately come from Italy thither, upon account of the Edit of Claudius, commanding all Jews to depart from Rome, as it is in the 18 chap. Acts. From all this it's apparent, that there was a good distance of time between the Council held at Jerusalem, and the Edit of Claudius; in which space all this we have related was dispatch'd by Paul the Apostle. In Chronico Alexandrino, the Council at Jerusalem is placed on the sixth year of Claudius; he had then have said the seventh. For so all things agree exactly. For Paul said at Antioch the remaining months of that year wherein the Council was; then the following year he travelled through Syria, Cilicia, Phrygia, and Galatia. At length in the ninth year of Claudius he came into Greece. Valef.

(b) Ὅτε ἀκούας, that is, at which time Aquila, &c. for it may be read in two words, thus ὅτε, as I found it written in the King's, and the Esk. M. SS. Valef.

What a Calamity befel the Jews at Jerusalem on the very Day of the Passover.

BUT Claudius yet ruling the Empire, there hapned to be so great a tumult and disturbance at Jerusalem on the Feast of the Passover, that there were (a) thirty thousand Jews slain, being those only who by force were press'd together about the Gates of the Temple and trodden under-foot by one another. So that that Festiva was turn'd into mourning over the whole Nation, and lamentation throughout every Family. Thus much also Josephus relates almost word for word. But Claudius made Agrippa, the son of Agrippa, (b) King of the Jews; having sent (c) Felix Procurator of the whole Country of Samaria and Galilee, and also of the Region beyond Jordan. And when he had reigned but in his thirteen years and eight months, he died, leaving Nero his Successor in the Empire.

Work he compiled after his History, he accounts the number of the slain to be twenty thousand. Which number I would rather agree too, because these Books, as I said, were written last by him. Valef.

(b) This Agrippa the younger, to speak properly, was never King of the Jews. For after the death of Agrippa his father, who dy'd the fourth year of Claudius, Claudius took him being very young and kept him with him, neither did he permit him to succeed in his father's Kingdom. Afterwards Herod the King of Chalcis being dead, Claudius gave Agrippa his Uncle's Kingdom; which when he had held 4 years, Claudius in the twelfth year of his Reign gave him Thracianit, which was the Tetrachy of Philip, and also the Kingdom of Lycania; having first taken Chalcis from him: He transferred to him also the authority over the Temple, and the power of electing the High-priests, which his Uncle Herod had. A little after, Nero added to his Kingdom part of Galilee, as Josephus writes in his twentieth B. of Antiq. Which being thus, it's apparent Eusebius was mistaken, who wrote both here and in his Chronicon, that Agrippa the younger succeeded in his father's Kingdom presently after the death of his father, and was made King of the Jews by Claudius. Altho' Eusebius says not here expressly that he was by Claudius made King presently after his father's death. Indeed, out of Josephus it may be evidently shewn that the younger Agrippa was not made King immediately after his father's death. For in his second Book of the Jewish Wars, chap. 13. he makes the twelfth year of Nero, wherein the Jewish War began, to be the same with the seventeenth of King Agrippa. Therefore the younger Agrippa began to reign the eighth year of Claudius. Moreover, I will not deny that he was King of the Jews, seeing he was King of Galilee, and is by Justus reckoned among the Kings of the Jews. But I deny that ever he was King of Judea. For after the death of the Senior Agrippa, which happened in the fourth year of Claudius, Judea was brought into the form of a Province, and every year the Procurators of Cesar were sent thither, as Josephus relates. Valef.

(c) In the Chronicon of Eusebius, Felix is said to have been sent Procurator into Judea by Claudius, in the eleventh year of his Reign. But in Stadiger's Edition of that Work, it is more rightly placed on the tenth year of Claudius. Yet it seems to be truer, that Felix was sent into Judea in the ninth of Claudius. For Tacitus, in his twelfth Book, says, That Felix was lately set over the Jews, (Sulla and Otho being Consuls, which was the tenth year of Claudius;) And in Acts 24. Paul, pleading his cause before this same Felix, which was done on the thirteenth year of Claudius, speaks thus to him: For as much as I know that thou hast been for many years a Judge unto this Nation. Moreover Rufinus is mistaken, in that he thinks there are Josephus's Words, when as it appears that they indeed are Eusebius's. Valef.

What was done at Jerusalem in the Reign of Nero.

NOW in Nero's time, Felix being Procurator of Judea, Josephus relateth in the twentieth Book of his Antiquities, that there was

was again a Sedition of the Priests one against the other, in these words: 'There arose also a Sedition of the Chief Priests, against the Priests and the Chief of the People of Jerusalem. And each of them forming for themselves a company of most audacious fellows, and such as endeavoured to make innovations, behaved themselves as Captains; and encountering they railed against each other, and threw stones at one another. There was no body to rebuke them; but, as in a City destitute of a Governor, these things were licentiously done. And so great impudence and presumptuous boldness possessed the Chief Priests, that they dared to fend their servants to the Threshing-floor, and take the Tythes due to the Priests. Whence it came to pass that the poorest of the Priests were seen to perish for want of sustenance. In such sort did the violence of the Seditious prevail over all justice and equity.' And again the same Writer relates, that at the same time there arose a sort of Thieves in Jerusalem, who in the day-time, as he says, and in the very midst of the City, kill'd those they met with; but especially on the Festivals, being mix'd among the crowd, and hiding little daggers under their garments, they stab'd the most eminent (a) personages; and when they kill, these murderers would dissemble themselves to be of the number of those that grieved. Whereby they were undiscovered, because of the good opinion all men had of them. And first, he says, Jonathan the High-Priest was killed by them, and after him many were slain daily; and, he says, the fear was more grievous than the calamity, in that every one, as in war, hourly expected death.

(a) The same is in Josephus, Antiquities renders it, enemies; which I like not. For Josephus by that term means the Priests; the most eminent Personages. Vale.

C H A P. XXI.

Of that Egyptian who is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles.

AFTER these things Josephus adds, having interposed some other words: 'But the Egyptian False Prophet annoy'd the Jews with a greater mischief than these. For he, coming into the Country, being a Magician, and having gotten himself the repute of a Prophet, gather'd together about thirty thousand men such as he had seduced; and leading them out of the Wilderness to the Mount called the Mount of Olives, prepared by force from thence to enter Jerusalem; and having vanquish'd the Roman Guards, to seize the Principality over the people, resolving to make them his Guard, who together with him by violence entered the City. But Felix prevented his attempt, having met him with the Roman Soldiers; and all the people joy'n'd their assistance in repelling his injurious violence. So that, the assault being made, the Egyptian fled with a few, and most of his party were slain and taken prisoners.' These matters Josephus relates in the second Book of his History; and it's worthy our (a) observing, together with what is here related of this Egyptian, those things which are declared of him in the Acts of the Apostles: There, in the time of Felix it is said by the Chief Captain at Jerusalem unto Paul, when the multitude of the Jews raised a tumult against him; * Art

(a) Eusebius, Historia, signifies properly to attend to, or observe. In this sense Eusebius uses the word chap. 18. of this Book, and in B. 3. chap. 24. This word occurs in Athenaeus, Polybins, and others. Vale.

* Acts 21. 29. See Josephus Antiq. B. 20. c. 6, & 7. See also Dr. Hammond on Acts 21. 38.

not thou the Egyptian which before these days madest an uproar, and leddest into the Wilderness (b) four thousand men that were murderers? But thus much concerning the Times of Felix.

(b) Josephus says there were thirty thousand Men: Which is to be understood, as that the number of the whole multitude was 30000, of which 4000 only were murderers. And so Josephus will be reconciled to Luke. But I agree not with Eusebius, who writes that this was done in Nero's time. For in Acts 21. this Egyptian is said to have been overthrown a little before Paul's coming to Jerusalem. Now Paul came thither in the last year of Claudius; which may be gathered from the 24 chap. Acts, where Luke writes that Portius Festus was sent as successor to Felix. Seeing therefore Festus was sent into Judea in the second year of Nero, the overthrow of this Egyptian must necessarily fall on the last year of Claudius. The narration of Josephus, who seems to refer all this to the times of Nero, deceived Eusebius. But Eusebius ought to have considered, that Josephus does in that place relate all the Acts of Felix together, as well what he did under Claudius, as what under Nero. Vale.

C H A P. XXII.

How Paul, being sent bound from Judea to Rome, having made his defence, was wholly acquitted.

BUT Festus is by Nero sent as Successor to this Felix: in whose time Paul having pleaded for himself is carried bound to Rome; Aristarchus was with him, whom somewhere in his Epistles he deservedly styles his Fellow-prisoner: And Luke, who committed to writing the Acts of the Apostles, concluded his History here, having shew'd that Paul lived two full years at Rome, enjoying in a great measure his liberty; and, that he preached the Word of God, no man forbidding him: Then, having made his defence, it is moreover reported that the Apostle travel'd again upon account of the ministry of preaching; and that, coming the second time to the same City, he ended his life by Martyrdom in this Emperor's Reign. At which time, being in bonds, he wrote the second Epistle to Timothy, describing therein both his former defence, and also his approaching death.

Take his own testimony hereof. At my first answer (says he) no man stood with me, but all men forsook me, I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge: notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me, that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear; and I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion. By which words he makes it plainly evident, that at the first time, that his preaching might be fulfill'd, he was deliver'd out of the mouth of the Lion; speaking, as it was likely, of Nero, this place because of his cruelty. (a) But afterwards he is very obscure; and has not added any thing like unto these words [He shall deliver me out of the mouth of the Lion]; for by he Spirit he saw that his end was now near at hand: wherefore, having said [and I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion] he adds this, [The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly Kingdom]; evidently signifying that his Martyrdom was at hand; which he more plainly foretels in the same Epistle, saying, For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. Moreover, length I in this second Epistle to Timothy, he manifestly declares, that only Luke was then with him when he wrote it; but, at his first answer, that not so much as he was with him then. Whence 'tis agreeable to reason to think, that Luke concluded the Acts of the Apostles at that time, having continued the History so long as he accompanied Paul. These things we have spoken,

(a) Indeed this place because he is very obscure; and has not added any thing like unto these words [He shall deliver me out of the mouth of the Lion]; for by he Spirit he saw that his end was now near at hand: wherefore, having said [and I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion] he adds this, [The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly Kingdom]; evidently signifying that his Martyrdom was at hand; which he more plainly foretels in the same Epistle, saying, For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. Moreover, length I in this second Epistle to Timothy, he manifestly declares, that only Luke was then with him when he wrote it; but, at his first answer, that not so much as he was with him then. Whence 'tis agreeable to reason to think, that Luke concluded the Acts of the Apostles at that time, having continued the History so long as he accompanied Paul. These things we have spoken, that pistle of

Paul to Timothy this may be gathered, to wit, that Paul's defence was acquired by the coming of his to Rome, which Luke mentions. For it's likely, that Paul's apology for his opinion was more easily admitted by Nero, he behaving himself more mildly at the beginning of his Empire ; but proceeding afterwards to the commission of most horrid and villainous acts, those things against the Apostles together with many other persons, were by him taken in hand.

[edgences] ; but afterward at his second defence he was condemned. The former part here he apparently manifests in these words [At my first defence no Man stood with me] ; and whereas he says [I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lyon], which is as much as if he had said, I was [scilicet] out from Nero's jaws, but Paul here, for otherwise of his second accusation. For he does not say [The Lord delivered me out of the mouth of the Lyon] as he had said before. For he foretold, God revealing it to him, that he should by no means any longer avoid the sword of the persecutor, but he had said of his first accusation [I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lyon] concerning his second, with which he was then charged, he adds these words [The Lord shall deliver me from every evil] ; and will preserve me unto his heavenly Kingdom] apparently manifesting his death by these words. This is the meaning of this place, which neither the Translators, nor I my self at first understood. Wherefore in the words of Eusebius, I must be read [ἐκ τῆς] in two distinct words, or else the accent must be changed, ἐκ τῆς λέξης. Indeed, in the Mar. M.S. it is thus written [ἐκ τῆς] in two distinct words. Moreover Jerome, in his Book De Scripturis Eusebii, has quoted this place of Eusebius, where he speaks of Paul ; but he apprehended not Eusebius's meaning, as it will be apparent to the Reader. Wherefore Sophronius also, when he translated this place of Jerome, into Greek, omitted some words, which seemed to hinder the meaning. Valf.

CHAPTER XXIII.

How James, call'd the Brother of the Lord, was martyr'd.

Moreover Paul having appealed to Cæſar, and being by Fefſus ſent to Rome, the Jews, who had plotted a deſign againſt him, being now diſappointed of their expectation, ſet upon James the Brother of the Lord, to whom the Epifcopal ſeat at Jeruſalem was given by the Apoſtles. And of this fort were their villainous practices againſt him : leading him forth publicly, they required him to renounce the faith of Chriſt before all the people. But when he, contrary to the expectation of all, had ſpoken freely and with a greater boldneſs than they look'd for, before the whole multitude, and had confeſs'd that our Lord and Saviour Jefus Chriſt was the Son of God ; being no longer able to endure the testimony of the man, they ſlew him, who was believed by all to be a moſt juſt perſon, by reaſon of that ſingular eminence he arriv'd to, in his leading a philoſophical and pious courſe of life ; taking the vacancy of the Government as a fit opportunity for this their licentiousneſs. For Fefſus being at that time dead in Judea, that Province was without a Preſident and Procurator. Now the manner of this James's death, the words of Clemens before quoted by us have maniſeſted ; he having declared, that he was caſt headlong from the battlement of the Temple, and beaten to death with a club. But moreover, (a) Hegesippus, being one of thoſe who were of the firſt ſucceſſion after

(a) The fact that the first mention of those who were of the first succession after the Temple, and beaten to death with a club. But moreover, (a) Hegesippus, being one of those who were of the first succession after the Temple, his life-story as it appears in the files is extended to the times of M. Aurelius Antoninus. For in his Reign Polyearp the disciple of John the Apostle was crowned with Martyrdom. Hegesippus therefore is rightly said to have lived in the first succession of the Apostles, in that he flourished in the Reign of the Sons of Antoninus Pius. And coming to Rome when Anicetus was Bishop, he stayed there at Eleutherus' time. In the Alexandrian Chronicle (which I would more willingly call the Antiochian) Hegesippus is said to have died in the Reign of Commodus. He was therefore contemporary with Irenaeus: who also was next to the first succession of the Apostles, as Eusebius testifies. Book 6, chap. 20. Vale!

the Apostles, does in the Fifth Book of his Commentaries most accurately relate these things concerning this James; speaking after this manner: 'James, the Brother of our Lord, undertook, together with the Apostles, the government of the Church: That James who was furnished the Fuff by all, even from the times of our Lord until ours. For many were called by the name of James; but this man was holy from his mother's womb. He drank neither wine nor strong drink; nor eat any creature wherein there was life. There never came razor upon his head; he anointed not himself with oyl, neither did he use a bath. To

(b) him only it was lawful to enter into the Holiest of Holies. He wore no woollen, but linnen garments; and went into the Temple alone, where he was found upon his knees, making supplication for the forgiveness of the people: in so much that his knees were become hard and brawny, like those of a Camel, by reason of his continual kneeling to worship God, and to make supplication for the remission of the people. Wherefore upon account of his most eminent righte-teousness he was called Justus and (c) Oblias, which signifies in English, the defence and righteousness of the people, as the Prophets declare concerning him. Therefore certain men of the (d) seven Heresies among that people of the Jews, which we have before written of in our Commentaries, ask'd him, which is the (e) gare of Jesus? And he said, that that Jesus was the Saviour. Some of them believ'd that Jesus was the Christ: but the foremention'd Septs believ'd neither the (f) Resurrection, nor that he was come to reward every man according to his works. But as many as believed, believed by the means of (c) The learned Nich. Fuller, Book 3. chap. 1. of his Misellany, has thus corrected this place. Ἰουστὸν καὶ ὀβλίαν, κατ' Ὀβλίαν, δὲστὴν, διὰ τοῦ π, ὅτι, ὀβλίαν τὸ τὸ δὲστὸν i. e. He was called Saddick, and Osleam, which signifies in English, a just man, and the defence of the people. For פָּרִיץ in Hebrew signifies, a just man. And Osleam is made up of these two Hebrew words סלם שלם, which signifies, the strength, or, defence of the people; the Letter ל being the sign of the Genitive or Dative case with the Hebrews. The original of this appellation is taken from Psalm 28. 9. where we meet with these words in the original, לְיָהוָה יִשְׁתָּבַח הַיָּמִים The Lord shall give strength to his people. Fuller's Misell. B. 3. chap. 1.

(d) The place of Stephanus, wherein he says, wrote concerning the seven Heresies, we shall meet with in the 4 B. of Euseb. Eccl. Hist. where we will find much more concerning them. Valer.

(g) Petavius does here deservedly reprove Suidas, who had denied, that it was lawful for any Gentle to be present at the Festival of the Jews. For besides that place which Petavius quotes; John 12. 20. we are supplied with many testimonies out of Josephus, to evidence this matter. Vitellius the President of Syria went up to Jerusalem at the feast of the Passover, and was honourably entertained by the Jews: As we may read chap. 6. B. 13. of Josephus's Antiq. He writes the same concerning Quadratus the President of Syria, 4. 2. of his Antiq. Valef.

(h) This word Hefanus, is a corruption of the Hebrew word, חֶפְזָא (which signifies, preserve me, or, make me safe), being the imperative mood Niph. with the Affixe ו derived from the Tense ופעל See the original Text of Jer. 17. 11. And also, see Bishop Pearson on the Creed, in his marginal notes, pag. 70. Edit. Lond. 1669.

(i) These words, which Hegesippus says the Jews then uttered, ought to be understood of Christ, rather than of Jesus. For when Jesus was crucified upon the bastment of the Temple, and had declar'd Jesus to be the Christ and Redeemer of mankind, those that embraced the Faith of Christ began to cry out Hefanus, to the Son of David, that is, to Jesus Christ. Valef.

(k) So the 71 Translate Hefai, 3. v. 10. Their words are these, חֶפְזָא נָתַן לָנוּ מִלְּפָנֶיךָ יְיָ אֱלֹהֵינוּ וְנִשְׁמָרְךָ מִכָּל חַטֹּאתֵינוּ וְנִשְׁמָרְךָ מִכָּל חַטֹּאתֵינוּ וְנִשְׁמָרְךָ מִכָּל חַטֹּאתֵינוּ. But the Hebrew copy differs much from this Translation, חֶפְזָא נָתַן לָנוּ מִכָּל חַטֹּאתֵינוּ. Which our Translation followeth, renders thus in English, Stay to the righteous, that it shall be meet with him; for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Compare the Sep. Translat. of Job, 3. 10. with the Hebrew Text of that place.

'Let us stone James the Just; and they began to stone him, for he was not tully dead after his fall; but turning he knecled, saying, I intreat thee, O Lord God the Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. As they were thus stoning of him, one of the Priests of the sons of Reuben the son of (l) Reuben, testified of by Jeremiah the Prophet, cried out, saying, (m) Cease, what do ye? Justus prays for us. And one of them, being one of the Fullers, took a leaver, with which he used to squeeze garments, and smote Justus on the head; and so he was martyr'd. (n) And

(p) Epiphanius, in Hierol. 78. writes, that these words were not spoken by the Rechabite Priest, but by Simeon the Son of Cleopas. Valef.

(q) Ἰωάννης ἀδελφὸς τοῦ Ἰησοῦ; so the King's M. S. reads it; which Stephens followed in his Edit. But our other three M. SS. Mat. Med. and Euseb. have it thus, Ἰωάννης ἀδελφὸς τοῦ Ἰησοῦ καὶ τοῦ Ἰακώβου; that is, and they buried him in that place, near the Temple; which reading Nicephorus and Rufinus do confirm. Valef.

and Gentiles, that Jesus was the Christ; and loon after Vespasian beset Judea round about, and took the Jews captive. These things Hegesippus, having related fully and largely, does therein agree with Clemens. But James was a person so admirable, and so much cried up amongst all men for his righteousness, that the most sober men of the Jews were of opinion that this was the cause of the siege of Jerusalem, which immediately follow'd upon his Martyrdom; and that this siege beset 'em upon no other account than that audacious willany committed against this James: Justus therefore was not afraid to testify this in writing, declaring himself in these words: 'These things befel the Jews in the way of revenge for James the

Just, who was the Brother of Jesus call'd Christ; because the Jews had murder'd him, being a most righteous person.' And the same Author in the twentieth Book of his Antiquities, relates his death in these words: 'Cesar, being certified of Jesus's death, sent Albinus Procurator into Judea: but Ananus the younger, who as we said before had gotten the High-Priesthood, was a man as to his disposition rash and excessively bold. He embraced the Sect of the Sadducees, who in matters of judgment are cruel above all the Jews, as we before manifested. Ananus therefore, being such an one as we have described him to be, supposing he had a fit opportunity, in that Jesus was dead, and Albinus yet upon his journey, call'd an assembly of the Judges; into which he caused the Brother of Jesus call'd Christ (whose name was James) with certain others to be brought, whom he accused as violators of the Law, and so deliver'd them up to be (p) stoned. But as many as

(p) What can be as seem'd to be the mildest and most modest in more different yea contrary, than this relation of Josephus's, and that of Hegesippus, about James's Martyrdom? For Josephus says, that he was condemned in a publick Council of the Jews; and Hegesippus, that he was murdered in a edition and tumult of the people: Hegesippus relates, that he was killed with a Fuller's Club in the midst of the City: But Josephus declares that he was stoned; which was always done without the Gates of the City. Farther, Josephus shews us the year, wherein James died, by these two Remarks, to wit, that it was when Ananus was High-priest, and when Albinus came first into Judea. Eusebius, in his Chronicon, writes that Albinus succeeded Fessus in the sixth year of Nero's Empire; and yet the same Author places the Martyrdom of James on the year following, which manifestly contradicts what Josephus has related: For he expressly says that James was murdered before Albinus came into that Province. Eusebius therefore ought to have included the beginning of Albinus his Procuratorship, and James his Martyrdom in the same year. But Baronius denies all this, and proves, that the Martyrdom of James happened on the seventh year of Nero; which assertion he confirms both from the consent of all the Antients, and also from Josephus his History of the Jewish Wars, B. 2. chap. 12. But I judge that the consent of Jerome, Nicephorus, and others, who wrote from, and follow'd Eusebius's Chronicon (Eusebius's opinion not being dissu'd) is not much to be esteem'd of: Now the place in Josephus proves nothing else, than that Albinus was Procurator of Judea in the fourth year before the Jewish War began, and in the seventh before the City was taken. But from that place in Josephus it cannot be concluded that Albinus began his Procuratorship in the seventh year before the taking of Jerusalem. Yea, it seems truer in my judgment, that Albinus

Nero. that they both suffer'd martyrdom at the same time, Dionysius Bishop of Corinth, writing to the Romans, doth thus affirm: "So also you, (d) by this your so great an admonition, have join'd together the plantation both of the Romans, and also of the Corinthians, made by Peter and Paul. For both of them coming also to our City of Corinth, and having planted us, did in like manner instruct. Likewise they were both together into Italy, and having taught there, suffer'd martyrdom at (e) the same time." And thus much I have related, that the History hereof might be yet farther confirm'd.

The same thing Clement Romanus in his Epistle had before done. Dionysius therefore says to Soter; Thou by this your admission have again visit- ed the Plantation of the Roman and Corinthian Churches heretofore made by Peter and Paul. This I have the more largely explained, because the Translators, and especially Christophorus, have been much mistaken in the Version of this place. Valef.

(e) Dionysius does not expressly say that Peter and Paul suffer'd on the same day, but only at the same time; which may be so understood, or that there might be an interval of many days between their sufferings. Trendelenburg [Test. eccles. p. 107] says that they were both Martyr'd on the same day, but not in the same year: And that there was a years space between their deaths. With Præstantius agrees Angu- sine, in his 28 Sermon, De Sundis; And Arator, Lib. 2. Hic. Apoll. But Simæon Metaphrastes takes these words of Dionysius so, as if he said that Peter and Paul were Martyr'd on the same day together. His words are to be found in Communi. de peregrinat. Pauli et Petri, apud Surium, Tome 3. Valef.

CHAP. XXVI.

How the Jews were vex'd with innumerable Mischiefs, and how at last they entred upon a War against the Romans.

(a) At these words I began the chapter, following the authority of the King's M.S. But in the Mar. M. S. we found another reading, and a different distinction. For that begins the Chapter from these words (which are the conclusion of the foregoing Chapter) [And thus much I have related, &c. and it points the whole place thus, [And thus much I have related, that the History hereof might be yet farther confirmed. Moreover, Josephus, discourses, &c.] and puts the full point after these words [makes it manifest in express words.] The same reading is observed by the Med. and Euk. M. SS. But the reading and punctuation in the King's M. S. seems to me to be much better; which both Nicephorus and Rufinus followed. I had almost forgot to put you in mind, that these words [et Soter] in the title of this Chapter, ought to be taken adverbially; for Jo Rufinus translates it; Ut innumeris Judæis malis afflictis sint, ac novissime contra Romanos arma moverint. Valef.

express words, amongst many other things, Nero. that a great number of the most eminent personages amongst the Jews, having been cruelly beaten with scourges, were crucified even in Jerusalem by the command of Florus. For it hapned that he was Procurator of Judea, when the War at first broke out, in the twelfth year of Nero's reign. Afterwards, he says, that, "After the revolt of the Jews there followed great and grievous disturbances throughout all Syria, those of the Jewish Nation being by the Inhabitants of every City every where destroy'd as enemies, without all commiseration: In so much that a man might see the (b) Cities filled with dead bodies that lay un- buried; and the Aged together with the Infants cast forth dead; and Women, not having so much as any covering upon those in- parts which nature commands to be conceal'd; and the whole (c) Province was full of unspeakable calamities: But the dread of what was threatned was greater and more grievous than the mischiefs every where perpetrated." Genev.

Thus much Josephus relates word for word. (c) In the original And such was the posture of the Jews affairs at that time.

Josephus and Nicephorus 'tis written ἡ Ἰουδαία. By the Province we must in this place understand Judea, which after the death of Agrippa the Elder was reduced into the form of a Province, and govern'd by Procurators sent from the Emperor. Valef.

In what Parts of the World the Apostles preached Christ.

NOW the affairs of the Jews being in this posture, the Holy Apostles and Disciples of our Saviour, being dispersed over the whole world preached the Gospel. And Thomas, as tradition hath it, had Parthia allotted to him; Andreas had Scythia; John Asia, where after he had spent much time he died at Ephesus. Peter, 'tis probable, preached to the * Jews (a) scattered throughout Pontus and Galatia, and Bithynia, Cappadocia and Asia. (a) The

Jews were dispersed at several times, and for several causes. First, when they were carried Captive into Babylon and into Egypt and Syria; and also when they were subdued by Pompey. Then, in the times of the Maccabees, they did of their own accord remove out of Judea into Egypt. For the Law forbid not the Jews to remove into other Countreys, as it is manifest from the Book of Ruth. Thirdly, they dispersed themselves upon account of gaining Proselytes, which they admitted of all Nations, whence it came to pass that they were scattered over the whole World. Valef. Those Jews that were dispersed in Europe had their chief Assembly at Alexandria; and there the Septuagint Translation of the Bible was in use; and thence they were called (Yohi 7. 35.) Ἰουδαῖοι Ελληνικοί, the dispersion of the Hellenists: And of these there were many also in Jerusalem, which used the same translation of the Seventy Seventy two, being thus skill'd in the Greek tongue; and these living not in Greece are yet call'd Adt 6. 1.) EAA-viva, because they used the Greek language and the 72 translation, whereas the other are call'd there (See Adt 6. 1.) Eβδαλ, Hebrews, who used the Jerusalem Paraphrase. The Arian dispersion is mentioned 1 Pet. 1. 7. they had Diagloss for their Metropolis, and used the Targum, or Caldee Paraphrase of Onkelos in their Synagogues.

Nero. Who at last coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downwards; for so he desired to suffer. It is needless to say any thing of Paul; who having fully preach'd the Gospel of Christ from Jerusalem unto Illyricum, at last suffer'd Martyrdom at Rome in the time of Nero. Thus much (b) Origen declares word for word in the Third Tome of his Expositions on Genesis.
(b) It is very doubtful where the words of Origen's, whom Eusebius here quotes, do begin; whether it be at those words, And Thomas, &c. or rather at those, Peter 'tis probable, &c. For Eusebius has not shewn us where they begin. Vale!

Who first presided over the Roman Church.

After the Martyrdom of Paul and Peter, Linus was the First that was elected to the Bishoprick of the Roman Church. Paul, writing from Rome to Timothy, makes mention of him in the Salutation at the end of the Epistle; saying, * Eubulus greets thee, and Prudent, and Linus, and Claudia.

C H A P. III.

Concerning the Epistles of the Apostles.

I Ndeed, one Epistle of Peter's, called his First, hath by general consent been receiv'd as genuine; for that the worthy Antients in former ages quoted in their writings, as being unquestionable and undoubted. But as for that called

(a) That this 2d Epistle of S. Peter was not at first receiv'd in the Church of Christ with so universal agreement and consent as the former, may be concluded from this passage in Eusebius. But notwithstanding, there are great and sure evidences of this Epistles being written by the acknowledg'd Author of it, as (1.) the Title of Simon Peter with the Addition of An Apostle of Jesus Christ (Chap. 1. v. 1.) (2.) There is a whole passage in this Epistle (Chap. 1. v. 15, 17.) which doth signally belong to Peter, that of having been on the holy Mount with Christ, and hearing those words, This is my beloved Son, &c. which certainly belongs to the transfiguration, Matth. 17. where only Peter and James and John were present with Christ. (3.) This is said to be a 2d Epistle (Chap. 3. v. 1.) written much to the same purpose with the former. (4.) St. Jude speaking (v. 18.) of the fifters that should come, &c. cites that Prediction from the Apostles of our Lord Jesus (v. 17.) where it is reasonable to believe that this Epistle (Chap. 3. v. 3.) is referred to; for in it those very words are met with (and are not so in any other Apostolick writing) Knowing this fift, &c. Compare Jude the 17 and 18. v. with 2 Epist. Pet. 3. chap. v. 3. All this in all Copies stands unmoved to secure the authority of this Epistle, and to convince us of the author of it. See Dr. Hammond's Preface to the 2d. Epist. Pet.

likewise what they say of those Scriptures that are canonical and by general consent acknowledged as genuine, and also what concerning those that are not such. And thus many are the Writings ascribed to Peter, of which I have known only one Epistle accounted to be genuine, and universally acknowledged as such by the Antients. But of Paul's there are fourteen Epistles manifestly known, and undoubted. Yet it is not fit we should be ignorant, that some have rejected that to the Hebrews, saying, it is by the Roman Church denied to be Paul's. Now what the Antients have said concerning this Epistle, I will in due place propose. But as for those Adts that are called his, we have been inform'd from our Predecessors, that they are not accounted as unquestionable and undoubted. And whereas the same Apostle, in his Salutations at the end of the Epistle to the Romans, makes mention among others, of one Hermas, who, they say, is Author of that Book intitled Pastor; you must know that that Treatise also has been question'd by some; upon whose account it must not be placed amongst those which by general consent are acknowledged as genuine: but by others it has been judged a most useful Book, especially for such as are to be instructed in the first Rudiments of Religion. Whereupon we know it is at this time publicly read in Churches; and I do find that some of the most ancient Writers do quote it. Let thus much be spoken in order to a representation of the Holy Scripture, to discriminate those Books, whose authority is in no wise contradicted, from those that by general consent are not acknowledg'd as genuine.

C H A P. IV.

Of the first Succession of the Apostles.

T HAT Paul therefore, preaching to the Gentiles, laid the foundations of those Churches from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, is manifest both from his own * words, and al- * Rom. so from what Luke has related in the † Adts. 15. 19. Likewise in what Provinces Peter, preaching the † Adts Gospel of Christ to those of the Circumcision, to 11. deliver'd the Doctrine of the New Covenant, is chap. sufficiently apparent from his own * words out * 1. Epist. of that Epistle of his, which, we have said, is u- Pet. 1. 1. niversally acknowledg'd as genuine; which he wrote to the Jews that were dispersed throughout Pontus and Galatia, Cappadocia, and Asia, and Bithynia. Now how many and what sincere followers of them have been approved as sufficient to take the charge of those Churches by them founded, it is not eassie to say; except such and so many as may be collected from the words of Paul. For he had very many fellow-labourers, and, as he termed them, fellow-soldiers; many of which were by him vouchsafed an indeleble remembrance, he having in his own Epistles ascrib'd to them an everlasting commendation. But Luke, enumerating in the Adts, the Disciples of Paul, makes mention of them by name. Moreover, Timothy is reported to have been the first that was choic'd to the Bishoprick of the Ephebian Church: as also Titus, of the Churches in Crete. Luke, by original extract an Antiochian, by profession a Physician, for the most part accompanied Paul; and being diligently conversant with the rest of the Apostles, has left us, in two Books written by Divine inspiration, Lessons that are medicinal for our souls,

Nero. souls, which he procured of them. The one is * Luke 1. the Gospel, which he * professes he wrote as they
 1, 2, 3. delivered it unto him, who from the beginning were Eye-witnesses and Ministers of the Word, in all which things, he says, he had perfect understanding from the very first. The other is the Acts of the Apostles, which Treatise he composed now not of such passages as he had received by report, but of what he had seen with his own eyes. They say also that Paul was wont to mean the Gospel according to Luke; when, speaking as it were of his own Gospel, he says, † According to my Gospel.
 † 2 Tim. Of the rest of the Followers of Paul, Crescens is 2, 8. by the Apostle himself declared to be one; who was sent by him into (a) Gallia. Linus also, whom, in his second Epistle to Timothy, he mentions to be at Rome with him, who was before manifested to have been the first that was chosen to the Bishoprick of Rome, after Peter. Cle- mens also, who was likewise constituted the third Bishop of Rome, is attested by Paul himself to have been his Fellow-labourer and Companion in sufferings. Furthermore, that Areopa- gite (by name Dionysius, whom Luke in the Acts records to have been the first that believed after the Sermon made by Paul to the Athenians in (b) Areopagus) another Dionysius, one of the An-tients, a Pastor of the Corinthian Church relates to have been the first Bishop of the Athe- nian Church: But as we go on with this Work of ours, we will in due place declare the Successions of the Apostles in their several times.
 Now we will proceed to that part of our History which follows in order.

But the other reading is the truest, which Clemens confirms in his Constitution. Apostolus reads Gallatia, but says that thereby is meant Gallia. Valef.

(b) Areopagus was the Senate or standing Court of Judicature in Athen, by whose Laws and Orders any new Gods were received among them; and therefore as soon as they perceived that Paul was a promulgator of strange Deities, they bring him to the Areopagus to have him examined what Gods they were that he thus Preached. Two Judicatures they had at Athen; one every year changed, made up of 50 chosen Men, of whom the Republick consisted; the other perpetual, which judged of Murders and the like capital Offences; and this was in Areopago; of which and the customs thereof, See Bur- detius on the Pandects. Why it was called Areopagus, see St. Aug. de ciuit. 1. vi. l. 18. c. 18. The Judges which sat in this Court were call'd Areopagites, who were look'd upon with such reverence, that an Areop- agite signified proverbially an excellent Person. Gell. L. 12. c. 7.
Dionysius was one of these Areopagites.

Of the last Siege of the Jews after Christ's Death.

Vespasian. A Fter Nero, who held the Government thirteen years, Galba and Orba having reigned a year and six months; Vespasian grown famous in the Wars against the Jews, was made Emperor in Judea, being proclaimed by the Army there. He therefore going immediately to Rome, committed the management of the War against the Jews to his son Titus. Moreover, after the Ascension of our Saviour, when the Jews, besides the audacious wickedness committed against him, had now contrived and executed very many cruel designs against his Apostles; (first Stephen being stoned to death by them; then after him James the son of Zebedee and brother of John beheaded, and last of all that James who was first chosen into the Episcopal seat there, after our Saviour's Ascension, murder'd according to the foremention'd manner;) whence the rest of the Apostles, were by innumerable wiles laid wait for to be put to death; and being driven out of Judea, were gone to preach the Doctrine of the Gospel to all Nati-gregation of the Church in Jerusalem, according to an Oracle given by revelation to the ap-call it (a) Pella) beyond

 then at length Divine Vengeance seiz'd them who had dealt so unjustly with Christ and his Apostles, and utterly destroy'd that wicked and abominable Generation from among men. But, how great calamities then befel the whole Nation in every place; and how they especially who were Inhabitants of Judea were driven to the extremity of misery; and how many * Myriads of men, together with women and children, were destroy'd by Sword and Famine, and by infinite other kinds of death; and how many and what Sieges there were of the Jewish Cities; and how great miseries and more than miseries they beheld who fled into Jeru- salem it self, as into the best fortified Metropo-

 War, and every particular action therein; and how at length the abomination of desolation predicted by the Prophets was set up in the very Temple of God, heretofore famous, but now about to suffer all manner of pollution, and to undergo its last destruction by fire: He that is desirous to know it, may accurately read all this in the History written by Iosephus. But, how the same Writer relates, that a multitude of about thirty hundred thousand persons assembled together from all parts of Judea at that time of the Passover-feast, were shut up in Jerusalem (as it were, says he, in a prison) I think it requisite to shew in those his own words. (b) For it was fit, that at directly that very time (wherein they had kill'd the Saviour and Benefactor of all, Christ the Son of these Gods,) that in the same days, I say, they should be shut up as it were in a prison, to receive that punishment from Divine Vengeance which a his Latin waited them. But I will omit the particular re-translation of those miseries which befel them, and their great sufferings by the Sword and otherwise, and do think it necessary to propose only who shall read this our Work may from that part of their Sufferings understand, that the Divine Punishment for their enormous Impieties committed against the Christ of God, did not long after light upon them.

(a) So says Epiphanius (in Hæres. Nazærenum cap. 7.) to wit, that the Christians who dwelt in Jerusalem being forewarn'd by Christ of the approaching Siege removed to Pella. But in his Book (de ponderibus & mensuris) he writes that the Disciples of Christ being warned by an Angel, removed to Pella: And afterwards when Adrian rebuilt Jerusalem and called it after his own name Elia Colonia, they returned thither. Come on therefore, let us again take the fifth Book of Josephus's History into our hands, and rehearse the Tragedy of those things then and there done. * Moreover, (says he) for those that were rich to stay it was equally destructive. For they were slain for their wealth under a pretence of their revolting to the enemy. Together also with the famine, the insolent rage of the seditious increased, and both those mischiefs daily grew more extremely sharp and violent. Besides, there was no food any where openly to be seen; but they rush'd violently into houses, and made a strict search: and when they had found any, they beat the masters of the houses after a most cruel manner, because they denied they had any: but if they found none, they tortured them, as if they had most carefully hid it. Moreover, the bodies of the wretches were a certain sign whether they had any food or no: for those who were yet strong and lusty they supposed had plenty of provision; but such as were already lean and macerated, they medled not with. For it seem'd irrational to kill those that were ready to die for want of sustenance. Many also privately exchanged their estates, the richer sort for one measure of wheat, the poorer for one of barley: then locking themselves up in the inmost recesses of their houses, some of them by reason of their excessive want of food, eat the unground corn; others made bread of it after such a manner as necessity and fear advised them. Indeed there was no where any table furnish'd; but they snatch'd the meat while it was raw from the fire, and (a) tore it from one another. The food was miserable, and the spectacle truly worthy of lamentation; in that the stronger sort got all, whilst the weaker bewail'd their own condition. Famine doubtless is superior to all the affections of the mind; but nothing is so utterly destroy'd by it, as is a dutiful and observant behaviour. For that which otherwise is worthy of a reverent regard, in this case (so writ, in the necessity of famine) is condemn'd. Therefore the wives tore the meat from their husbands, the children from their parents; and, which was most exceedingly lamentable, the mothers snatch'd it out of the very mouths of their infants; yea, they spared not to deprive them of those very drops of milk which were their only sustenance to keep them alive, whilst their most beloved babes languish'd in their arms. And whilst they eat such food as this, they notwithstanding could not secure themselves from being discover'd; because the seditious were every where athand, preying upon them: for when they at any time saw a house shut, that was a sign that those within were eating victuals; and immediately breaking open the doors they rush'd in, and squeezing the bits of meat even out of their very jaws, they took them away. The old men, who would not part with their food, were beaten; and the women which hid what they had in their hands were drawn about by the hair of the head. No compassion was shewn to the hoary-head, or to infants; but lifting up the little children on high, hanging at their morsels of meat, they dash'd them against the pavement. Now to those who prevented their in-curtion, and before-hand devoured what they would by force have taken away, they were more inhuman, as if such had done them an injury. Moreover, they invented cruel ways of torments for the searching out of provision; for they stop'd up the passage of the Privies of those miserable men with the pulse called Orobos, and thrust sharp rods up their fundaments; and to force any person to confess he had but one loaf of bread, or to extort from him a discovery of his having but one handful of meal hidden, he underwent such torments as are most horrible to be heard. Now the tormentors themselves were not oppress'd with hunger; for it would have seem'd less cruel for them to have done all this out of necessity: but they did it to exercise their outrageous insolence, and to procure themselves provision for the following days. Those also, who by night crept out as far as the Roman watch to gather wild herbs and grass, they met; and when they supposed they had now escap'd the enemy, these men by force took from them what they had gotten. And when they often intreated, and by the most sacred name of God beseech'd them to communicate some part of that to them which they had brought off with the hazard of their lives, they imparted nothing thereof to them; yea, they were to look upon it to be a kindness, that they were not also kill'd, as well as rob'd of what they had gotten." To this, after some other words, he adds, saying, "The Jews, after they were hindered from going out of the City, were depriv'd of all hope of relief. And the famine increasing extremely, consumed the people throughout every house and family. The houses were fill'd with women and infants destroy'd by the famine: and the narrow streets with dead old men: the children and young men as pale as ghosts wander'd up and down the market-places, and fell down where-ever the dissembler seiz'd any of them; neither were the sick able to bury their relations: and those who were strong were loth to undertake it, both upon account of the vast numbers of the dead, and also because of the uncertainty of their own condition. For very many dropt down dead upon those whom they were interring. Many also betook themselves to their Coffins or Sepulchres before death seiz'd 'em. Neither was there mourning or lamentation in these calamities; but the famine had suppress'd every one's affection. And they who struggled with the very pangs of death, with dry eyes beheld those who went to rest before them. A profound silence and darkness laden with death encompass'd the City. But the thieves were more pernicious than all this; for they digg'd through into houses, now turn'd into burial-places, and rob'd the dead: and we in taking away the coverings from off the corpses, went out laughing. They also tried the edges of their swords upon the dead bodies: and some of those that lay along, and yet alive, were run through, to make trial of the sharpness of their weapons: but those that beseech'd 'em to make use of their hand and sword upon 'em, by way of scorn they let alone to be destroy'd by the famine. And every one of them that died, leaving the seditious yet surviving, (c) fix'd always prayed to God with their Eyes turn'd towards the holy City, and Temple. We have an example of this custom in Dan, 6. 10. and 1 Kings 8. 48. and 1 Esdr. 4. 58. Hence perhaps was derived the custom of the Christians, to pray towards the East. their Observe here the religion of the Jews, who to make use of their hand and sword upon 'em, in what parts of the world they were their eyes stedfastly upon the Temple. At first they gave command that the dead should be buried at the charge of the publick Treasury, not being able to endure the stench of the dead bodies: but afterwards being insufficient to continue so doing, they cast them from the walls into deep pits; which Titus having view'd round, when he beheld them fill'd full with the dead, and a thick gore issuing from the purrified bodies, he sigh'd, and stretching forth his hands, call'd God to witness, that it was not his fact." To all this, after the interposition of some words, he adds, saying; "I will not be afraid to declare what grief commands me to speak; I think, had the Romans been slack to destroy those flagitious wretches; that either they would have been swallow'd by the earth opening under them; or that the City would have been drown'd by an inundation; or, that, like Sodom, it would have been destroy'd by lightning. For it had brought forth a generation of men by far more abominably impious than those, who had suffer'd such things. By reason therefore of the desperate outrageousness of those men, the whole body of the people was together with them destroy'd." And in his Sixth Book he writes thus: "Of those who perish'd being destroy'd by the famine throughout the City, the multitude was innumerable; the afflictions that beset them can't be utter'd. For in every house where there appear'd but the least shadow of provision, there was fighting; and such as were dearest friends strove one with the other, snatching from one another the miserable provision of their life. Neither were those that died believed to expire for want of sustenance. But the Thieves search'd those that gave up the ghost, lest any one having meat in his bosom should feign himself to die. The Thieves themselves, empty and hollow for want of sustenance, wandred and hunted up and down like mad dogs, striking against the doors like drunken men; and by reason of their stupified condition, breaking into the very same houses twice or thrice in one hour. Necessity made all things to be eaten: and what was unfitting to be given to the most sordid irrational creatures, they gather'd up, and endured to eat. Therefore at the last they did not forbear to eat girdles and shoes; and pluck'd the leather from off their bucklers and eat it. The stumps of old hay were made food by some; and others gather'd the very stalks or small fibres of plants, and sold the least weight of them for four (d) Attick drachms. But what need I speak of the sharpness and extremity of the famine, as to the eating things without life? for I will declare such a fact, the like whereof is no where recorded either among the Grecians or Barbarians; which may seem both horrid to be related, and also incredible to be heard. And indeed lest I might seem to posterity to feign monstrous stories, I could very willingly leave this sad accident unmention'd; but that I have innumerable witnesses thereof, to wit, men that are cotemporary with me: And besides, I should do my Country a very frigid and inconsiderable kindness, should I go about to conceal the rehearsal of what it really suffer'd. A woman, of the Region beyond Jordan, by name Mary, the daughter of Elezazar, of the village Barbezor, (which word signifies, The house of Hyssop) for descent and wealth eminent, flying with the rest of the multitude into Jerusalem, was there together with them besieg'd. All her goods, which she had taken with her out of the Region beyond Jordan and brought into the City, the Tyrants robb'd her of. The remains of what she had, which was of greatest value and price, and what ever provision of food she could any way procure, the Spear-men breaking in daily took from her. A most vehement indignation moved the woman; and oftentimes she reviled and cursed those ravenous pillagers, and provok'd them against her self. But when none of them could be either infligated by anger, or moved by compassion to kill her; and she being grown weary of finding victuals for (e) others; and provision being now nowhere to be found; the famine Thieves, also having entred her very bowels and marrow, and her anger being more exceedingly hot than the famine was sharp; she took Fury and Necessity as her advisers, and in a hostile manner invaded nature it self. And having snatch'd up her son (for she had a sucking-child) Miserable Babe, said she, amidst these Wars, as Famine and Sedition, for whom shall I preserve thee? Amongst the Romans if they let us live, we are Edit of shall be Slaves; and the Famine must precede that adds in Servitude; but the Seditious are more mischievous than both these evils. Behov therefore my food, a (f) gin. Valse. Fiend to take revenge upon the Seditious, and a Story for men to talk of, which is only yet wanting to complete the Calamities of the Jews. Having said this, she kills her son; then raising him, she eat half of him; the remainder she kept cover'd. The Seditious came immediately, and having smelt the horrible savour, threaten'd to kill her forthwith, if she would not bring out to them what she had provided. But she, answering that she had reserv'd a good part for them, uncover'd the remains of her son. Horror and astonishment of mind suddenly seized them; and they stood benumm'd as it were, with amazement at the spectacle. This, said the woman, is the son of mine own womb, and this mine own fact: eat, for I have eaten of him already; be not you nicer than a woman, or more compassionate than a mother. But if you are religious and abhor this my sacrifice, I have eaten the one half already, and let the rest also remain with me. After this they went out trembling, abash'd at this very one thing, and with much ado yielded to leave this food with the mother. Immediately the whole City was filled with the noise of this detestable fact; and every one setting before his eyes this unnatural deed was horribly afraid and trembled as if it had been audaciously perpetrated in (g) his own house. And now all who were formerly press'd with the famine, earnestly hastned to die, and happy were they accounted, who were taken away by death before they heard and saw so great calamities. Such was the punishment the Jews underwent for their iniquity and impiety against the Christ of God.

(d) That is, ten Shillings in our coin. See note on B. 1. chap. 8. in the margin, concerning the word Drachms.

(e) That is for the Thieves, not for her self: And therefore it is the original ἐξ αὐτῆς ἐστὶν ἄλλος; not ἄλλος, as Eusebius adds in the margin.

(f) The Jews, as well as the Grecians, believed, that the Ghosts of such as had been murdered followed those that kill'd them, to take revenge of them. In this sense those words may be taken, that occur Gen. 4. 10. The voice of thy brother's blood cryeth unto me from the ground; i. e. thy brother, whom thou hast wickedly slain, requires that I should revenge him, and punish thee for his murder: Then it follows v. 12. A fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth; i. e. thy brother's Ghost, whom thou hast slain, shall follow thee every where, and be always troublesome to thee. Valse;

(g) That is; all those Citizens were ricken with such an horror at this fact, as it had been done in their own houses. Valse.

Of Christ's Predictions.

BUT it is worth while to adjoin hereunto the most true Prediction of our Saviour, wherein he manifestly foretells these very things after this manner: * And we unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days. But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the sabbath-day: for then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, nor ever shall be. But the same Writer adding together the whole number of those that were destroy'd, says, that by the Famine and by the Sword an hundred and ten Myriads perish'd: and that the Seditious and the Thieves that were left, discovering one another, after the City was taken, were put to death: that the tallest and comeliest of the young men were refer'd to adorn the triumph: that of the rest of the multitude, such as were above seventeen years of age were sent bound to the Mines in Egypt; and that very many were distributed through the Provinces to be destroy'd in the Publick Shews by the Sword and by Wild Beasts: that those who were under seventeen years of age were carried Captive and sold; and that the number of those only amounted to

(a) Eusebius is here mistaken; for Josephus does not say so; but only affirms that the number of those that were taken captive, during the whole War, by the Romans, amounted to ninety thousand Men. (a) ninety thousand. These things were done after this manner in the second year of the Reign of Vespasian, agreeable to our Prefaces and Predictions of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who by his Divine Power foreseeing these things, as if they had been present, wept and lamented, according to the History of the Holy Evangelists, who have related his very words; one while speaking as it were to Jerusalem it self:

Therefore concerning those things which beset the whole Jewish Nation after the Salutary Passion of Christ, and after those words, whereby the multitude of the Jews desired a Thief and a Murderer should be released from his punishment of death, and that the Prince of Life should be destroy'd, it is needless to (b) add any thing to the relation given by Josephus. So much only is requisite further to be annex'd, as may represent the

C H A P. VIII.

Concerning the Prodigies that appear'd before the War.

LET us then take the sixth Book of his History, and rehearse what is therein related by him in these words: * Therefore those Impostors, and such as feign'd themselves to be sent of God, and by their false persuasions deceiv'd the wretched people at that time: so that they neither gave heed to, nor believed those evident Prodigies which foreshew'd their desolation to be at hand. But being like persons thunder-struck, and having neither eyes nor understanding, they contemned and disregarded the fore-warnings of God. First, a Star in the likeness of a Sword stood over the City; and then a (a) Comet continued a whole year. Further also, when, before the revolt and the first beginnings of the War, the people were gather'd together to the feast of Unleavened Bread, on the eighth day of the month April, at the (b) ninth hour of the night, so great a light shined round about the Altar and the Temple, that it seem'd to be bright day; and so continued for the space of half an hour: And this was judged by those that were unskilful a good sign; but by the

(a) We read etia, as it is in Josephus B. 7. pag. 965. But Nicéphorus thought that this Star which appeared in the likeness of a Sword, and the Comet which continued a whole year, was all one; which as we judge, is not right. Valef.

(b) The Jews divided the whole nocturn interea, i. e. night and day, or four and twenty hours, into eight parts, each of them containing 3 hours; the 3d, the 6th, the 9th, and the 12th hour of the day; and the like again for the several watches of the night: The ninth hour of the night (or third watch) according to their account, was commonly betwixt our hours of twelve and three a clock in the Morning. See Buxtorf. Synag. Judaic. Chap. 13.

(c) Scribes that were skill'd in the Law, it was immediately concluded to portend those calamities which afterwards hapned: and at amongst the same Feast, a Cow, led to be sacrificed by the Jews were the same with the Doctors of the Law, as Petavius has well observed, in Animadvrs. ad Histor. 15 Eppheusii. Their office it was, to keep the holy Books of the Law, and to read them in the presence of the People, in the Temple and in the Synagogues. But their principal Office was to be assayers with the chief Priests and Elders in the great Council called the Sanhedrim. See the 6 and 23 Chapters of the Acts. The name of Scribe therefore was the name of a Magistrate among the Jews as well as the among Grecians. And as the synagoga scribes in Greece were to be present at Assemblies and Judicatures, and to have the custody of the Laws and Statutes made by the People, and Decrees made by the Senate; so also were the Scribes amongst the Jews the keepers of the Law. That this was no small honour, appears from many places in the Gospel; where our Blessed Saviour reproves their pride and insolence. After the same manner, amongst the Grecians.

crises, the Scribes [ῥητορὶ καὶ] were in great authority, as appears from that which S. Luke relates Acts 19. 35. [our translation calls him Town-Clerk, how truly, Mr. J. Gregory of Oxford will tell you in his Notes on the Text; chap. 9. p. 43. of his Works.] Amongst the Jews the Scribes were so much the more respected by how much that Nation above all others esteemed their own Laws: Of which the Scribes were not only the keepers, but the interpreters also. Moreover they were consulted as being taken to be Men of great knowledge and skill, and who were best able to interpret Signs and Prodigies; and also who best knew the mysteries of the Law. So we read Matth. 2. 4. Herod then consults the Scribes; and in this place of Josephus here, the Scribes foretell the meaning of the Prodigies. Moreover the Magistrate of the City of Jerusalem who was called ῥητορὶς, had his Scribe, as Josephus tells us B. 20. But whether this Scribe was among the number of those that were interpreters of the Law, it is hard to say. Further, the [ῥητορὶς] amongst the Egyptians were certain Priests who look'd after the Ordinances about the things Sacred, and had the keeping of the mystical Learning, and foretold things to come; concerning whom see Joseph. L. 2. c. 6. where he calls them ῥητορὶς. Thely, after the Canor and the ῥητορὶς went in the chariot place into the Temple, wearing Wings on their Heads, and carrying before them in their Hands, Ink, and a Pen, with a Book. They had also the Hieroglyphical Books of Alecery, and those of Cosmography, and of the situation of Countries, and of Egypt, and of the Nile, and of the places consecrated in honour of their Gods, committed to their custody, as Clem. Alexandrinus writes in his 6 B. Lucianus saith that these sort of Men had been of long continuance in Egypt. Valef.

Vespasian.

The High-Priest, brought forth a Lamb in the midst of the Temple. Also the Eastern-Gate of the Inner-Temple made all of Brass, exceeding massy, and scarcely to be shut in the evening by twenty men, (being made also very strong by vast iron hinges on which it moved, and having bolts that went into the ground a great depth,) was seen to open of its own accord about the sixth hour of the night. (d) Not many days after the Feast, upon the one and twentieth of May, was seen a Ghost for Prodigiousness wholly incredible.

(d) After these Words Eusebius omits some passages that are extant in Josephus, as, of this Prodigies being told to the ῥητορὶς, or Magistrate; for an account of whom, and his office see the Learned Hammond in his Notes on Luke 22. 52.

But that which I am now about to say would seem an idle story, were it not related by those that saw it, and had not the subsequent calamities been answerable to such Prodigies. For before Sun-set there was seen in the air over the whole Country, Chariots, and whole Companies of armed men, running up and down in the Clouds, and investing Cities. Also at the feast, called Pentecost, the Priests, as it was their manner, going by night into the Temple to perform their offices, reported that they perceived at first indeed a motion and heard a noise; but that afterwards they heard a voice as of a great multitude, saying, Let us depart hence: But what was more dreadful than all this; one Jesus, the son of Ananias, a country-man of the ordinary rank, four years before the War, (the City being then in perfect peace and in a flourishing condition) coming to the Feast in which it's customary for all to make Tabernacles to the honour of God near the Temple; on a sudden began to cry out with a loud voice: A voice from the East, a voice from the West, a voice from the four Winds, a voice against Jerusalem and the Temple, a voice against the Bridgrooms and the Brides, a voice against all the People. This he went up and down crying, day and night throughout all the narrow streets and cross-ways of the City. But some of the chief of the people were very much disturb'd at this ominous cry, and being highly incensed, took the man and beat him with many and also grievous stripes. But he neither spoke any thing for himself, nor said any thing in private to those that (e) beat him, but persisted crying those very words he did before. Then Vespasian, the (f) Magistrate, supposing (as indeed it was) that the man was moved by Divine impulse, bring him to the Roman (g) President, where being beaten with stripes till his very bones were bare, he neither treated for himself, nor shed a tear: but to the utmost of his power changing his voice into a doleful tone, he answer'd every stripe, Wo, Wo to Jerusalem. There is another thing also more wonderful than this, which the same Writer relates, saying, that a Prophecy was found in the Holy Scriptures comprehending thus much, to wit, That about that time one was to come out of their Country who should rule over the whole world; which this Writer understood to have been fulfilled in (h) Vespasian. But he did not rule over the whole world, only obtain'd the Roman Empire. This therefore may more justly be refer'd to Christ, to whom it was said by the Father: * Desire of me and I shall give thee the Heavens and the earth for thy possession: And the utmost parts of the earth for thy possession: And the time went out into all Lands, and their words unto the ends of the world.

CHAP. IX.

Of Josephus, and the Writings he left.

After all this, it is fit that we should not be ignorant of this same Josephus, who has given us so great assistance in the History we now have in hand, from whence, and of what stock he came. And he himself does manifest even this also, saying after this manner: 'Josephus the son of (a) Mattathias, a Priest of Jerusalem, who my self also at first fought against the Romans, and was by necessity forc'd to be present at what was done afterwards.' This man was esteem'd the most eminent person of all the Jews of those times, not only by his own country-men, but also by the Romans: in so much that he was honour'd with a Statue dedicated to him in the City of Rome, and the Books compiled by him were accounted worthy to be placed in the Publick Library, He wrote all the Jewish Antiquities in twenty entire Books; and the History of the Jewish War, in his own time, in seven Books; which History he himself testifies, he put forth not only in Greek, but also in his own Country language; and he is worthy to be credited both in this, and in other things. There are also two other Books of his extant very worthy to be read, which are about the Ancientest of the Jews: in which he answers Apion Grammaticus, who at that time wrote a (b) Volume against the Jews, and some others who had Words of

(a) In the King's M.S. it is Ματθαι, and so also in Josephus, in the Book of his own Life, and in the preface to his History of the Jewish Wars. In Sophranion's Book, Descriptio Historie Ecclies, it is, Ἰωάννης Ματθαίου. So also Sophranion calls him in the beginning of his first Book. And Rufinus calls the father of Josephus Matthias; Josephus, says he, Ματθαίου, ex Hierosolymis sacerdos. So it is written in the most excellent M.S. of the Parisian Church, Valef. Suetonius, in the Life of Vespasian, has this passage of Josephus; Unus ex nobilibus captivus Josephus, cum conscriberet in vincula; constantissime asseruerat fore, ut ab eo brevis solueretur, verum jam Imperatore.

(b) The Words of Eusebius seems to confirm, who testifies that Apion wrote more Books than one against the Jewish Nation. But Jerom, in Catalogo, where he speaks of Josephus's Writings, defends the ordinary reading. Valef.

Vespasian. attempted to calumniate the (c) Antiquity and Laws of the Jewish Nation. In the former of these he sets forth the number of the Canonical Books of that called the Old Testament, which of them are among the Hebrews unquestionable and undoubted, as being received from ancient Tradition; discoursing of them in these words.

(c) Josephus in his Books against Apion, answers not only those who had calumniated the Laws and Institutions of the Jews; but also he more especially writes against those who had forged certain Fables concerning the Original and Antiquity of the Jews, as appears by his first Book. But about the end of his second Book he answers Apollonius, Molon, and Lysimachus, who had written some lies about the Laws and Institutions of the Jews. The word antiquities therefore in this place must mean both these, to wit, the Antiquity, and the Laws of the Jewish Nation. Valef.

C H A P. X.

How Josephus makes mention of the Holy Bible.

There are not therefore amongst us an innumerable company of Books disagreeing and contradicting one another; but only (a) two and twenty, containing an historical account of all times; which are worthily believed to be Divine.

(a) There were so many Books of the Scripture amongst the Jews, as they had letters in their Alphabet; So Origen tells us in his exposition of the first Psalm, and Jerom in premio galatico; where also he says that there were among them three ranks of these Holy Volumes; the first contained the Law; the second the Prophets; the third the Hagiography. All which agrees very well with Josephus. But in this they differ; Josephus makes thirteen Books to be of the second Order, to wit, following the Series of the times. But of the third, he reckons only four, disagreeing from St. Jerom; who in the fore said Preface, and in that of his before the Prophecy of Daniel, reckons up eight Books of the Prophets, and nine of the Hagiography. But Josephus seems to have placed the Book of Joshua and Judges, also those of the Kings, Chronicles and Ezra, amongst the Prophetical Writings; not that they contain Prophecies, as the Books of the Prophets do; but because they were written by Men that were Prophets. Valef.

And five of these are the Works of Moses, which comprehend both the Laws, and also a continued Series of the Generations of Men, and what was done by them from their first Creation until his own death. This space of time want little of three thousand years. And from the death of Moses until the Reign of Artaxerxes King of the Persians, Successor to Xerxes, the Prophets, who succeeded Moses, wrote what was done in their Ages, in thirteen Books: The remaining four contain Hymns to God, and Precepts and Admonitions for the well-ordering of Men's lives. Also from Artaxerxes until our own times every thing is indeed recorded, but these Books have not been accounted worthy of the like authority with the former, in that the Succession of the Prophets was not so accurately known. But it is manifestly apparent how highly we revere our own Writings: For in so many Ages now past over, no one has dared either to add or to diminish from them, or to change any thing therein; but it is implanted upon all us Jews immediately from our very birth, to think that these are the Precepts of God, and to persevere in them, and, if need so require, willingly to die for them. And let these words of this Writer be profitably here inserted. He compiled also another elaborate Work not unworthy of himself, about the Empire of Roan, which some have entitled Maccabees, because it contains the Conflicts of those Hebrews, in the Writings called the Maccabees, so termed from them, who valiantly fought for the Worship of God. And, at the end of his twentieth Book of Antiquities, he intimates, as if he purposed to write in four Books (according to the opinion of the Jews, which they had received from their Ancestors) of God, and of his Eusebius. sense, also of Laws, why according to them some things are lawful to be done, and others forbidden. Himself also in his own Books mentions other Works compiled by his diligence. Moreover it is also consonant to reason to adjoin those words of his which he has inserted at the (b) Conclusion of his Antiquities; for the Confirmation of the Quotations and Authorities we have taken out of him. He therefore, blaming (c) Julius Tiberiensis, (who had taken in hand, as well as he, to write an History of those very Times), as having not related the Truth, and accusing the Man of many other faults, at last adds thus much in these words: 'But I was not, in that manner which as you were, timorous concerning my Writings, but gave my Books to the Emperors themselves, when the deeds done were fresh and almost yet in the memory to be seen: For I was conscious to my self, that I had all along faithfully observed the delivery of the Truth; upon account whereof, hoping for their evidence, I was not disappointed of my expectation. And moreover I communicated my History to many others, some of whom were actually present in the War; as was King Agrippa, and (d) several of his Relations: Also Titus the Emperor was so well-pleased, that the knowledge of what was done of the should be delivered to Men solely out of them, that he (e) subscribed my Books with his own Hand, and gave command they should be kept at the close of that Book, and at the end of this Book, of his own Life. Scaliger therefore is mistaken, in his Animadversus, on Euseb, p. 188, where he says, Eusebius forgot himself here; and he is Christophorus, who, supposing this place in Eusebius to be corrupted, altered it. But had they seen the Great MSS. Copies of Josephus, or had they consulted the Basil. Edit. of him, they might easily have found, that which I have said to be true, to wit, that this Book of Josephus, of his own Life, was nothing else but an Appendix or Conclusion of his 20 Book of Antiquities. Valef.

(c) Our MSS. Copies, Mar. Med. and Fik. have it thus written, Τιβεριανῆς; corruptly as I judge. For both Stephanus Byzantius doth acknowledge it to be Tiberias; and also Jerom, in his Book De Scripturis Ecclasticis, calls him Justus Tiberiensis, whom we have followed. But Scaliger still him Tiberiadensis. This Justus wrote an History of the Jewish Wars, as Josephus tells us in his Book, De vita sua; and Stephanus, in the word Βιβλια. Besides, this History he wrote a Chronicle of the Kings of the Jews, as Plotius testifies, in Bibliotheca; Which Work he dedicated to King Agrippa, as Scaliger affirms, in Animadversus, Euseb. pag. 176. And he adds these Words: Nemo de obitu Regis Agrippæ certius pronuntiavit potuit quam is qui illi opus suum dedicavit, i. e. No body could speak more certainly of the death of King Agrippa, than he who dedicated his Work to him. Which I indeed wish had not dropped from so acute a Man. For how can an Historian tell of the death of him to whom he dedicates his History? Unless we say that Justus dedicated his Chronicle to Agrippa, when he was dead, which is absurd. But as Scaliger without all ground asserted, that Justus Tiberiadensis dedicated his Chronicle to King Agrippa; so what he infers therefrom is also absurd. But from Plotius his testimony it is manifest, that that Work was put forth by Justus after the death of King Agrippa. Josephus relates that the History of the Jewish Wars was published by Justus also after the death of Agrippa, although it was written twenty years before. A Book of this same Justus, whose title was Στάσις, is quoted by Laertius, in the Life of Socrates; and which Plotius says was the same with his Chronicle. Valef.

(d) He means Julius Archelaus and Herod, as Josephus himself declares, in his first Book against Apion. Julius Archelaus was Brother-in-law to King Agrippa; for he had married his Sister Mariamne; so says Josephus at the end of his 19 and 20 Books of Antiquit. Valef.

(e) Niephorus, in his 3 Book, Chap. 11, interpreting these Words of Josephus, says that Titus with his own hand copied out the Books of Josephus his History of the Jewish Wars. See what Johannes Laetus has noted at that place of Niephorus. But all Interpreters who have translated this place of Josephus into Latin, understand thereby that Titus only subscribed the Books of Josephus with his own hand, and did not copy them out himself. But I would rather follow the opinion of Niephorus. Neither do these Words of Josephus [ὅτι πάντες τὴν αὐτοῦ ἱστορίαν ἐβίβλησαν, ἀποκρινομένην ἀκριβέστατα] seem to found any thing less to me. Thus this place is pointed in all Copies as well as MS. as Printed. But if this place of Josephus were to be understood only of Titus his subscribing Josephus his Books with his hand, then the distinction or comma ought to be put after the word ἱστορίαν: But here you see it put after the word βίβλησαν. Valef.

for the well-ordering of Men's lives. Also from Artaxerxes until our own times every thing is indeed recorded, but these Books have not been accounted worthy of the like authority with the former, in that the Succession of the Prophets was not so accurately known. But it is manifestly apparent how highly we revere our own Writings: For in so many Ages now past over, no one has dared either to add or to diminish from them, or to change any thing therein; but it is implanted upon all us Jews immediately from our very birth, to think that these are the Precepts of God, and to persevere in them, and, if need so require, willingly to die for them. And let these words of this Writer be profitably here inserted. And, at the end of his twentieth Book of Antiquities, he intimates, as if he purposed to write in four Books (according to the opinion of the Jews, which they had received

Vespasian. (f) publicly read. And King Agrippa wrote sixty two Epistles, testifying therein, that the Truth was delivered by me. Two whereof Vespasian there adjoyns. But let thus much be thus far manifested concerning him. We will now proceed to what follows.

Mar. Mss. And in Sir Henry Savil's MS. it is written [Ἀποστόλῳ] which reading all Interpreters seem to have followed: But I like Rufinus's Version best, who translates it: To be publicly read; in which sense the same Word is used by Eusebius in chap. 22. of his second Book, where he speaks of the General Epistles of James and Jude; and in chap. 3. of his third Book. But from these Words of Vespasian we may gather, that the History of the Jewish Wars was put out by him in the Reign of Vespasian; but his Antiquities were published by him in the thirteenth year of Domitian, as he himself testifies at the end of his 20 Book, and at the close of his Book, of his own Life. But, that which Steiger affirms, in Annot. Euseb. p. 187. no vit, that the Book of Vespasian his own life was by him put out seven years after his Antiquities, seems not probable to me; for that Book is, so we judge it out before, only the twelfth of his twentieth Book of Antiquities; and at the end of it Vespasian reckoning up the Roman Emperors, concludes with Domitian. Valef.

C H A P. XI.

How, after James, Simeon governed the Church at Jerusalem.

AFTER the Martyrdom of James and the taking of Jerusalem, which immediately followed thereupon, report goes, that the Apostles and Disciples of our Lord, who were yet alive, met together from all parts in the same place, together also with the Kinsmen of our Lord according to the flesh, (for many of them hitherto survived,) and that all these held a consultation in common who should be adjudg'd worthy to succeed James: And moreover, that all with one consent approved of (a) Simeon the Son of Cleophas, of whom the History of the Gospel makes mention, to be worthy of the Episcopal Seat there; which Simeon, as they say, was Cousin-German by the Mother's side to our Saviour: For Hegesippus relates, that Cleophas was the (b) Brother of Joseph.

(a) This account of Eusebius's here, agrees not with what he has written in the (b) Brother of Joseph.

that work of his called his Chronicon: For there he writes, that presently after the death of James, Simeon was elected; no vit, in the seventh year of Nero. But here he makes it evident, that after the murder of James, the Episcopal See was vacant for the space of about eight or nine years. Which interval of time, that the Author Chronici Alexandrini might fill up, he places the death of James on the first year of Vespasian. Valef.

(b) That is, because (as we conjecture) he married Mary which was Sister to the Blessed Virgin; upon which account Simeon the Son of this Cleophas is here called Cousin-German by the Mother's side to our Saviour; for so we translate the word ἑτεροψύχῃ; no vit patruelium, i. e. Cousin-German by the Father's side, as it is in the Version of Valerius; but consobrinum, i. e. Sister's Son. For Mary the Wife of Cleophas, and the Blessed Virgin were Sisters. See Jo. 19. 25. and so Simeon the Son of the former Mary, and our Saviour the Son of the latter, were Sisters Children. See the Learned Bp. Pearson on the Creed, p. 175, & 176. Edit. Lond. 1659. And Petavius, in Heresi. 78. Epiphani. cap. 7. & 14. and also St. Jerome, in Catalo.

How Vespasian commanded that the Descendants of David should be sought out.

AND moreover, it is reported, that Vespasian after the taking of Jerusalem, commanded all those that were of the Kindred of David to be diligently sought out, lest any one of them who were of the Royal Race should be left remaining amongst the Jews; and that a most sore Persecution was thereby again brought upon the Jews.

C H A P. XIII.

That Anencletus was the Second Bishop of the Roman Church.

BUT when Vespasian had reigned ten years, his Son Titus succeeded him in the Empire: In the second year of whose Reign, Linus Bishop of the Roman Church, having held that publick Charge twelve years, delivered it to (a) Anencletus. And Titus, after he had reigned two years not why and as many months, was succeeded by his Brother Domitian.

Vespasian. (a) I know Rob. Stephens read Anacletus, seeing that all our Books have it written Anencletus. And so Nicéphorus Constantopolitanus, and his Translator Anastasius Bibliothecarius in Chronolog. Tripartit. reads it. So also Nicéphorus Callistus in Lib. 3. cap. 2. and Genesius Synellus, and the MSS. copies of Rufinus. So likewise Irenaeus (in Lib. 3. where he reckons up the Roman Bishops in order) names him Anencletus; and omits the name of Cletus, which to me seems to be made of a piece of the word Anencletus. Neither does Optatus, nor St. Augustine, in his 165 Epistle (where he counts up the Roman Bishops) acknowledge Cletus. But on the contrary, in two very ancient Catalogues of the Roman Bishops, one whereof is in the Monastery of S. German, and the other in the Vesistie Collège at Clermont—there is no mention of Anencletus; but one of Cletus, who succeeded Linus, and sat eleven years, one month, and two days. From whence 'tis evident that Cletus and Anencletus was the same Man. See more of this in P. Holloixius, in notae ad cap. 7. vite brenei. Valef.

C H A P. XIV.

That Avilius was the Second Bishop of Alexandria.

FURTHERMORE, in the fourth year of Domitian, Domitian, (a) Amianus the first Bishop of the Alexandrian Church, having there spent two and twenty years complete, died. After whom succeeded (b) Avilius, being the second Bishop there. Mark. So

Eusebius said before, concerning Linus Bishop of Rome, at the 2 Chap. of this Book. For Mark was the Apostle of the Alexandrians, as we before have said. But the Apostles were not reckoned amongst the number of the Bishops. There was therefore no end of putting in here Adrian, as Nicéphorus did. See Selden's Notes ad Euthymium patriarcham Alexandr. Valef.

(b) Rufinus and the other Translators call this Man Avilius; and also Jerom himself, in Chronicon, not so rightly as I judge. For he ought to be called Avilius, which is a Roman name; as well as Anianus, who was Bishop before Avilius. Besides, the order of the Chapters is here disturbed in the common Edition; this Chap. of the succession of Avilius being put before that of the succession of Anencletus: But we by the direction of the MSS. Copies Mark, and Euseb. have placed them in their true order. This was a very ancient mistake; for in the Index of the Chapters prefixed before the 3 B. of Rufinus his Translation, and in all the Greek Copies except in that of Euseb. the same Error is committed. But in the Body of the Mar. MS. (which Book has the Titles of the Chapters exactly placed in their order) this Error is corrected. Valef.

That Clemens was the Third Bishop of the Roman Church.

ALSO in the twelfth year of this Emperor's Reign, Anencletus having been Bishop of the Roman Church twelve years, had to his Successor Clemens; whom the Apostle, writing an Epistle to the Philippians, declares to be his Fellow-labourer, saying: * with Clement also, and * Phil. 4. with other my fellow-labourers, whose names are in the book of life.

Concerning the Epistle of Clemens.

Moreover, there is extant one Epistle of this Clemens's, which by general consent is acknowledged as genuine, and is singularly excellent and admirable; which he wrote in the name of the Roman Church to that of the Corinthian Church: which Epistle also we have known to have been publicly read in many Churches before the whole Congregation, both in times past, and also in our own memory. Now, that in the time of the aforementioned Clemens there was a Faction raised in the Corinthian Church, Hegesippus is a Witness worthy to be credited.

C H A P. XVII.

Of the Persecution in Domitian's Time.

(a) Rufinus thought these words that follow here, were the words of Hegesippus, whom Eusebius quoted at the end of the foregoing chapt. whence it appears that Rufinus read as it is in our MSS. copies, Mat. Med. and Luk. eulogio de hystoriaα-λεων. πολλὰ ἄλλα μὲν, &c. Moreover in Rufinus the chap. 17. begins at those words, Now that in the time of the forementioned, &c. as I observed it to be also in the Mat. and Luk. M.SS. But I rather approve of the ordinary writing and distinction. Valef.

(b) Eusebius has the same import with εὐλογία, that is, it signifies one that is devoted from an illustrious and noble stock. So Gregor. Nazianzen, in Orat. 40. μὴ ἀμείβεσθαι συμβαλεμένην τιμῇ, πατρὶς ἢ εὐμελείας πρὸς δόξαν. See Jerom. in Chronico Anno 8. Domitian. says, Domitianus plurimos nobilium in exilium mittit, atque occidit. Valef.

C H A P. XVIII.

Concerning John the Apostle, and his Revelation.

IN this Persecution 'tis reported, that John the Apostle and also Evangelist, who yet lived, was banish'd into the Isle Patmos, upon account of the Testimony he exhibited to the Word of God. Indeed, * Irenæus, writing concerning the number of the name of Antichrist mentioned in the Revelation of John, does in these few words, in his fifth Book against Hereses, thus speak concerning John: 'But if at this present time * his name ought publicly to be preach'd, it would have been spoken of by him who saw the Revelation. For it was scen not a long time since, but almost in our age, about the latter end of Domitian's Reign.' But so mightily did the Doctrine of our Faith flourish in those forementioned times, that even those Writers, who were wholly estranged from our Religion have not thought it troublesome to set forth in their Histories both this Persecution, and also the Martyrdoms suffer'd therein. And they have also accurately shewn the very time; relating, that in the fifteenth year of Domitian, Flavia Domitilla, Daughter of the Sister of Flavius Clemens at that time one of the Consuls at Rome, was, together with many others also, banish'd into the Island Pontia, for the Testimony of Christ.

How Domitian commanded that the Descendants of David should be slain.

WHEN the same Domitian gave command that the Descendants of David should be slain, there goeth an ancient report that some Hereticks accused the Posterity of Jude, (who was the Brother of our Saviour according to the flesh) as being of the Offspring of David, and bearing affinity to Christ himself. And this Hegesippus manifests word for word, laying thus.

C H A P. XX.

Concerning those that were related to our Saviour.

THERE were yet surviving (who were related to our Lord) the Nephews of that Jude, who was called the

(a) Brother of Christ after the flesh, whom they accused as being descended from David. And these

(b) Evocatus brought to Caesar Domitian. For Domitian was afraid of the coming of Christ, as well as Herod. And he asked them, if they were of the Stock of David; and they acknowledged it. Then he questioned them how great Possessions they had, or what quantity of Money they were Masters of; and they said, that they both had but nine thousand (c) Pence, a moiety whereof belonged to each of them: and these they said they had not in ready Money, but in Land of that value, being only thirty nine Acres; of which also they paid (d) tribute, and themselves were maintained by their own labour. And then they shewed their Hands; producing, as an evidence of their working, the hardness of their Skin, and a brawniness imprinted on their Hands by reason of their assiduous labour. Being also ask'd concerning

Christ and his Kingdom, of what sort it was, and when and where it would appear; they return'd answer, that it was neither Worldly nor Terrestrial, but Celestial and Angelical, that it should be at the end of the World, when he would come in Glory to judge the Quick and Dead,

(e) So he is called Mat. 13. 55. But was the usual language of the Jews to call the first Cousins brethren. See Bishop Pearson on the Creed, pag. 175, 176. Edit. Lond. 1669. See also Bishop Montague's Acts and Mon. chap. 4. S. 6. concerning the Desposyni.

(b) Rob. Stephens, in his Edition of Eusebius calls him Isak Isak, and so does the Med. M.S. but in the King's M.S. I found it written [Isak Isak] which Rob. Stephens observed also in his Notes added at the latter end of his Edition. Georg. Syncellus, in Chronico, reads it Isak Isak. We from our three M.S. Copies, to wit, Mat. Luk. and Sir Henry Savill's, have made good the true writing of this place, Isak Isak Isak Isak, and Isak Isak Isak Isak, &c. This reading, Nicephorus and Rufinus do confirm; the Words of Rufinus are, For Evocatus quidam nomen, qui ad hoc missus fuerat, perduxit ad Domitianum. Nicephorus, Lib. 3. cap. 10. has it written Isak Isak. These Evocati were Soldiers of an higher degree who having performed their service and being dismissed, were upon occasion summoned by the Emperor himself. There is mention of these in the ancient Inscriptions, Evoc. Aug. i.e. Evocatus Augusti. No Man need wonder, that Hegesippus, a Greek writer, should make use of a Latin word here; for that is usual with him; and in this very relation of his he has [Isak Isak Isak Isak] and [Isak Isak] both Latin words. Valef.

(c) So we translate the word [Isak Isak] warranted thereto by the same translation of that word, occurring Mat. 22. 19. The value of that Penny there shew'd Christ, was, says Dr. Hammond on the place, a whole Attick Drachm; but what value these here were of, it is hard to say, in regard there were several sorts of these Denarii, which were also of a different value. See Foss. Eymol.

(d) Isak Isak were Tributes, or Taxes, raised upon Lands, and they were commonly paid in Wheat, Barley, Wine, and the like; as it appears from Cod. Theodosian. Taxes was the Till gathered by the Publicans, who farmed it commonly; it was paid in ready money. The word here is Isak; which we therefore render: Tribute. Valef.

with them; afterwards they desire him to be their Complice in greater Rogueries: So by little and little he was accusom'd to lewdness; and because he was high-spirited, having once left the right way (like a strong hard-mouth'd Horse holding the Bit between his Teeth,) he was so much the more fiercely hurried into destruction. In fine, despairing of the Salvation of God, he spent not his thoughts now upon any trifling design; but attempted some enormous wickedness, and in as much as he was wholly past all hope, he (g) scorn'd to run the hazard of so mean a punishment as other Thieves did.

Taking therefore those his Accomplishes, and having form'd them into a troop of Thieves, he was readily made their Commander in chief; being the fiercest, the most bloody, and cruellest person of them all. Some time after, and there hapning some necessity for it, they lend again for John; who, after he had first in order those things upon account whereof he came, said; Come on, Bishop, restore us that which was committed to thy custody, which I and Christ deliver'd to thee to take care of, in the presence of the Church as witnesses, over which thou dost preside. But he at first was astonish'd, supposing himself to be falsely accused about money which he had not receiv'd; neither could he give credit to John concerning his demand of what he had not, nor yet durst he disbelieve him. But when John had said, I demand the young Man and the Soul of our Brother; the old Man, fetching a deep sigh, and also weeping, said, he is dead. How? and what kind of death? To God, said he, he is dead; for he proved wicked, and extremely naughty, and in conclusion a Thief. And now in stead of continuing in the Church, he hath taken possession of the Mountain with a troop of Associates like himself. The Apostle therefore having rent his Garment, and with a great outcry smiting his Head, I left, said he, an excellent Keeper of our Brother's Soul! But let an Horse be presently brought me, and let me have a Guide to direct me in the way. He rode (as he was) forthwith from the Church, and coming to the place, is taken by the Watch which the Thieves had set; he flies not, nor makes entreaty, but calls out, For this purpose I came, bring me to your Captain: He in the mean time, armed as he was, stood still; but as soon as he knew John approaching, being ashamed, he fled: but he, forgetful of his Age, with all possible speed pursued him; crying out, Son, why dost thou flee from thy Father, unarm'd and aged? Have compassion on me, my Son; fear not; as yet there is hopes of thy salvation; I will intercede with Christ for thee; if need require, I will willingly undergo death for thee, as the Lord underwent it for us; I will by way of recompence give my Soul for thine; stand still; believe me, Christ hath sent me. He, having heard this, first stood still looking downward; then he threw away his Armour; afterwards trembling, he wept bitterly, and embrac'd the approaching old Man, craving pardon as well as he could for crying, and being as it were baptized the second time with tears; only he hid his Right Hand. The Apostle promising him, and solemnly swearing that he had obtain'd remission for him of our Saviour, praying, kneeling, and kissing the young Man's Right Hand, as being now cleansed by repentance, brought him into the Church again. And partly by abundant prayers making supplication for him, partly with continual fastings striving together with him, and also comforting his Mind with holy Bible, divers (b) Sentences out of Holy Scripture, he with departed not, as they say, until he had (i) restored him to the Church; having hereby shewn a great example of true repentance, an illustrious instance of Regeneration, and a Trophie of a conspicuous Resurrection.

(i) There is a difference between being brought in, and restored to the Church: He is brought into the Church, who promises he will repent: But he is restored to the Church, who, having been actually and truly penitent, is received into it again, and owned as a member thereof. Valef.

C H A P. XXIV.

Concerning the Order of the Gospels.

These words of Clement we have here inserted, upon account both of the Story it self, and the Profit it may yield to the Readers. But, we will now declare and recount the unquestionable Writings of this Apostle. And indeed the Gospel according to him, well-known to all the Churches throughout the World, must in the first place be without controversy acknowledg'd and received as undoubted and genuine. Now that it was truly, and upon a good account put in the fourth place after the other three Gospels by the Ancients, may after this manner be made apparent. Those Heavenly and truly Divine Persons (I speak of the Apostles of Christ) having been as to their Lives and Conversations perfectly purified, and as to their Souls adorn'd with all manner of Virtue, were indeed rude of speech and uneloquent; but they put their confidence in that divine and wonderful power of working Miracles bestow'd on them by our Saviour, and neither attempted nor knew how to be (a) Embassadors of their Master's Precepts in witness of words and artificialness of language. But they solely made use of the demonstration of the Divine Spirit cooperating together with them, and the power of Christ with which they were fully endow'd, and which by them perform'd Miracles; and so they publish'd the knowledge of the Kingdom of Heaven to the whole world; making it the least of their care to be diligent about writing Books: And this they did, because they were employ'd about a more excellent and more than human work. Indeed Paul, who was the most powerful of them all in the furniture of words, and the most able in weighty expressions, hath left in writing nothing more than some very (b) short (b) It is Epistles; although he could have disclosed innumerable whether

Eusebius would call Paul's Epistles short or few: Both may be said of them; so that, that they are few, being in number not above fourteen; and they are short to them that Piously and Religiously read them. Origen in Libro 5. Exposition. in Evangelii. John, calls them, hypsichrous, that is, containing few Verbs: He that desires to read Origen's Words, will find them hereafter quoted in the sixth B. of Eusebius, chap. 25. Valef.

merable secrets, because he attained unto a contemplation of those things that are in the third Heaven, and being caught up into the divine Paradise, was vouchsafed to hear these unspeakable words. Moreover, the rest of our Saviour's Preachers, both the Twelve Apostles, and also the Seventy Disciples, together with innumerable others besides them, were not unexperienced in these things. And yet of all the Disciples of the Lord, only Matthew and John have left us written Records; who also, as report says, were necessitated to write. For Matthew, having preach'd first to the Hebrews, and being about going to other Nations, did in his own Country language open the Gospel according to him; supplying by writing the want of his presence and converse among those, (c) whom he was now to leave. Now, when soon after Mark and Luke had set forth the Gospels according to them, John they say, spent all that time only in Preaching, and at length came to Write for this reason. The three first written Gospels having been now deliver'd into the hands of all, and of John himself, they say, that he approved of them, and confirm'd the truth thereof by his own testimony; only there was wanting in writing an account of those things done by Christ at the first beginning of his Preaching. And the thing is true: for 'tis evidently periphrastic, that the other three Evangelists have committed to writing only those things which were done by our Saviour in one years space, after John the did after the Baptist's confinement to prison. And to him that shall attentively consider these things, it will not appear that the Gospels disagree one with the other; seeing the Gospel according to John contains the first part of the Acts of Christ; but the remaining three give a relation of what was done by him at the latter end of the time. With good reason therefore has John pass'd over in silence the Genealogy of our Saviour after the flesh, as having been before written of by Matthew and Luke; and has begun with his Divinity, reserv'd as it were by the Divine Spirit for him, as being the more excellent person. Let thus much therefore be spoken by us concerning the writing of the Gospel according to John. Now what was the occasion of writing the Gospel according to Mark hath been manifested by us in what we said * before. And Luke also himself, in the beginning of his Gospel, hath shew'd the cause for which he compiled that History; for he makes it manifest that, because many had rashly taken in hand to make a declaration of those things which he himself most certainly knew, he judg'd it necessary to disengage us from the uncertain conjectures made by others, and therefore hath in his own Gospel deliver'd a most firm and true account of those things, the evidence whereof himself had sufficiently obtain'd, having been assisted therein both by the company and converse of Paul, and also by his familiarity with the rest of the Apostles: And thus much now concerning these things. But at a more opportune season we will endeavour to manifest, by a Quotation of the ancient Writers, what has been said by others concerning this very matter. Among the Writings of John, besides his Gospel, also the former of his Epistles hath without controversy been admitted as genuine, both by those men that are Modern, and also by the Antients: the two other Writings of his are question'd. The Opinion concerning his Revelation is even at this time on both sides much controverted among many: But this Controversie also shall at a seasonable opportunity be discuss'd by the authority of the Antients.

C H A P. XXV.

Concerning those Divine Writings, which are without controversy acknowledged; and those which are not such.

BUT it will in this place be seasonable summarily to reckon up those Books of the New Testament which have been before-mention'd. In the first place therefore is to be ranked the four Sacred Gospels: Next to which follows the Book of the Acts of the Apostles: After that are to be reckon'd the Epistles of Paul; after which follows that which is called the First Epistle of John, and in like manner the Epistle of Peter is to be admitted as authentick. Then is to be placed, if you think good, the Revelation of John: the Opinions concerning which I will in due place declare. And these are the Books that with general consent are acknowledg'd. Among those which are question'd as doubtful, which yet are approved and mention'd by many, is that which is called the Epistle of James, and that of Jude, also the Second Epistle of Peter, and those called the Second and Third Epistles of John, whether they were written by the Evangelist, or another of the same name with him. Amongst the Trajan.

(c) Nicæphorus, Lib. 2. chap. 45. reads it το λεγμεν τιν εαυτο παροισι; and Rufinus and Mysiculus translate it as we have done. But Christophorus interprets it otherwise; thus, and what seemed to be wanting to those from whom he departed whilst he was present with them, that he fully made up by his fidelity and labour in writing. In which translation this is to be blamed, to wit, in that he says Matthew wrote his Gospel after his departure from the Hebrews, when as Eusebius says the contrary; For in the Greek it is αφ' ου εσταλλετο, i. e. from whom he was going. Athanasius in his Treatise of Lib. 5. Scrip. and Christostome, write that Matthew first wrote his Gospel at Jerusalem: And Nicæphorus and the Author of Chronica, Alexandra, say he wrote it in the 15th year after Christ's Ascension. Christophorus referred those Words ταυτοι αφ' ου εσταλλετο to the Words λεγειν; whereas they are referred to the Word απεκλειν. And in the King's Mat. and Med. M. 55. after the word περσους and ισραηλ, the comma is put false.

Baptist's being shut up in prison; and that they have expressly evidenc'd the same at the beginning of their History. For, after the forty days Fast, and the Temptation that follow'd thereupon, Matthew does plainly set forth the time of his own * Matth. 4. 12. writing, saying, * When he had heard that John was cast into prison, he departed out of Judea into Galilee. 14. And in like manner Mark; † Now after that John, says he, was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee.

And Luke also, before he begins the relation of the Acts of Jesus, does in like manner make this remark, saying, that Herod, adding yet this to all the evils he had done, shut up John in prison. Therefore they say, that the Apostle John, being for these causes thereto requited, has declared in a Gospel according to him, the time pass'd over in silence by the former Evangelists, and what was done by our Saviour therein, (and they were the things that he did before the imprisonment of the Baptist;) and thus he manifests the same things, partly when he says thus; This beginning of miracles did Jesus; and partly when he makes mention of the Baptist, whilst he is speaking of the Acts of Jesus, as being at that time * Baptizing in Armon, near to (d) Salem: And this he evidently declares by saying thus; For John, says he, was not yet cast into prison. Therefore John indeed in the penning of the Gospel according to him, declares those things that were done by Christ, the Baptist being as yet not cast into prison; but the other three Evangelists give an account of those things Christ

* John 3. 23, 24. (d) In the most Antient Man. M. S. I found it written αμαρην with a diphthong, i. e. Saleim. Valef.

Trajan. the (a) Spurious Works let there be rank'd, both the Work intitled The Acts of Paul, and the Book called Pafior, and the Revelation of Peter; and moreover that which is called the Epistle of Barnabas, and that named the (b) Doctrines of the Apostles; and moreover, as I said, the Revelation of John (if you think good) which some, as I have said, do reject, but others allow of, and admit among those Books that are received as unquestionable and undoubted. And among these some do now number the (c) Gospel according to the Hebrews, with which those of the Hebrews that have embraced the Faith of Christ are chiefly delighted. All these Books may be question'd as doubtful. And I thought it requisite to make a Catalogue of these also, that we may discriminate those Scriptures that according to Ecclesiastical Tradition are true and unforg'd, and with general consent receiv'd as undoubted, from those other Books which are not such, nor incorporated into the New Testament, but are question'd as doubtful; which yet have been acknowledged and allow'd of by many Ecclesiastical Persons: And further that we may know these very Books, and those others that have been put forth by Heretics under the name of the Apostles, containing as well the supposed Gospels of Peter, Thomas, and Matthias, and of some others besides them; as also the supposed Acts of Andrew and John, and other of the Apostles. Of which Books no (d) Ecclesiastical Writer even from the Apostles times hitherto hath in any of his Works vouchsafed to make the least mention. But moreover also, the manner of the Phrase and the Style wherein they are written are much different from the Apostolick natural propriety and innateness; and the meaning and drift of those things delivered in these Books, being mightily dissonant from Orthodoxal truth, doch manifestly evince that they are the forgeries of Heretical Men. Upon which account they are not to be rank'd amongst the Spurious Writings, but altogether to be rejected, as wholly absurd and impious. But we will now proceed to what follows of our History.

(a) Concerning this Book in the Learned Arch-Bishop Usher in his Dissertation on Ignatius's Epistles, Chap. 7. Edit. Oxon. 1644.

(c) Concerning this Gospel, St. Jerome, in Catalogo, where he is speaking of James the brother of our Lord, says thus, Evangelium quod appellatur secundum Hebraeos; Quod a me nuper in Græcum Latiniq; Sermonem translatum est, quo et Origenes sæpe utitur, &c. Julianus Pelagianus, Lib. 4. speaks of this Gospel, where he accuses Jerome, because in his Dialogue against the Pelagians, he made use of an authority of a fifth Gospel, which he himself had translated into Latin. But that which Eusebius adds, that the Jews which embraced Christianity are chiefly delighted with this Gospel, makes him seem to mean the Nazaræans and Ebionites; for they use to read that Gospel written in Hebrew, as St. Jerome shews, in Elai, c. 11. and in Ezech. c. 18. Valf.

(d) Eusebius speaks not here of the Successors of the Apostles, but of the Bishops; but he speaks of the Ecclesiastical Writers, who in a perpetual succession have flourished in the Church. Therefore

*ἡ δὲ τοῦ Διαβόλου ἐκκλησιαστικὴ, is the same as ἡ τοῦ ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐκκλησιαστικὴ, i. e. of the Ecclesiastical Writers in every Age. For, as heretofore among the Jews there was a succession of Prophets, tho' sometimes interrupted (as Josephus says in his first Book against Apion;) so in the Church there always was a succession of Learned Men and Writers which were called Ecclesiasticks. Moreover in the M. SS. Mar. Med. and Euk. it is written ἡ τοῦ Διαβόλου, with the Article, *Valf.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of Menander the Impostor.

MENANDER, succeeding Simon Magus, shew'd himself to be, as to his Disposition and Manners, a second (a) Dart of Diabolical force that no whit inferior to the former. He also was a (b) Samaritan; and, arriving to no less height of pretence, he imposed upon his Disciples, and abounded much more in greater and more monstrous illusions: for he said that he himself was a Saviour, sent from above on this for the salvation of men from invisible ages; and word. Simon rendered it, that no man could otherwise overcome the Angels the makers of this world, unless he were first instituted in the magical knowledge delivered by him, and initiated in the Baptism by Langus him imparted. Of which Baptism those that were adjudg'd worthy, they, he affirmed, would be partakers of a perpetual immortality in this very life; they should be no longer subject to death; but Christo continuing in this present life should be always young and immortal. And indeed 'tis easy to know all this from the Books of Irenæus. And Justin in like manner having made mention of Simon, adds also a Narration of this Man, saying, "And we knew one Menander a Samaritan also of the Village Caparattæ, a Disciple of Simon's, who being moved by the fury of Devils, and coming to Antioch, seduced many by magical art; who also perfwaded his followers that they should not die; and at this time there are some of his Sect that profess the same." Wherefore it was the Diabolical power by such Impostors, going under the name of Christians, to endeavour to illuminate by Magick the great Mystery of Godliness, and by them to expose to reproach the Ecclesiastical opinions concerning the Immortality of the Soul, and the Resurrection of the Dead. But those who joyn'd themselves to such Saviours as followers of them, were frustrated of the true hope.

Hen. Savil's, I found a far different punctuation of this place from that which Christophorson followed, as appears by his Version. For in the said M. SS. it is thus pointed, ἔπλεον δὲ τῶν ἑτέρων τῶν ἀποστόλων ἡ τοῦ Διαβόλου ἐκκλησία ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἡ τοῦ ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐκκλησιαστικὴ. And truly this punctuation is far better than the vulgar. For what can the meaning of these words be [ἡ τοῦ ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐκκλησιαστικὴ] ? I know the Jews hated the Samaritians, as the world of Men; inasmuch that the name of Samaritan was accounted by the Jews the greatest reproach. But here Menander's Country is spoken of; his Manners Eusebius speaks of hereafter. Moreover he is said to be a Samaritan in the same sense that Justin in Apologet. and Clemens in Libr. Recognit. calls Simon a Samaritan; i. e. he was of the Province or Country of Samarita, he came not out of the very City Samarita. For Simon was of the Village Griton; but Menander of the Village Caparattæ. Valf.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Heresy of the Ebionites.

THE malicious Devil being unable to remove others from the love of the Christ of God, finding that they might (a) some other way be surpriz'd, he made them his own. These the Antients fitly term'd Ebionites, in that they had a poor and low opinion of Christ: for they accounted him an ordinary man, and nothing thing more than a man; justified only for his proficiency in Vertue, and begotten by Mary's accompanying with her Husband: And they asserted that an observance of the Law was altogether necessary for them, supposing they could not be saved only by Faith in Christ and a life agreeable thereto. But others among them being of the same name have eschewed the monstrous absurdity of the fore-cited Opinions, denying not that the Lord was begotten of the Virgin by the Holy Ghost: But notwithstanding, these in like manner also, not confessing that he existed before all things, as being God the Word, and the Wisdom of the Father, are led into the same impiety with the former; especially in that they make it their business to maintain and observe the bodily worship of the Law. They also think that all the Epistles of the Apostle Paul ought to be rejected, calling him an Apostate from the Law: they made use only of the Gospel called The Gospel according to the Hebrews; the rest they made small account of: They observ'd also the Sabbath and all other Judaical Rites in like manner as the Jews do; but on Sundays they perform'd the same things with us in remembrance of the Lord's Resurrection. From whence, because of such opinions by them held, they got this name, to wit, the appellation of Ebionites, a name that betokens the poverty of their understanding. For by this name a Beggar is called amongst the (b) Hebrews.

(b) עביון signifies Egeuus, a beggar, in Hebrew; from the theam עביון Voluit, desideravit; because a beggar desires, or craves supplies for his wants. Buxtorf's Lexic. Rab. See Origen, Lib. 4. de Princip. concerning these Hereticks.

C H A P. XXVIII.

Of the Arch-Heretick Cerinthus.

WE have heard that at the same time there was one Cerinthus a Founder of another Heresie. Cairn, whose words I before quoted, in that Disputation of his now extant, writes thus concerning him. 'But Cerinthus also, who 'by Revelations written by himself, as it were by some great Apostle, hath feign'd monstrous Narrations as if they had been shew'd him by Angels, and sets them abroad amongst us, saying, that after the Resurrection the Kingdom of Christ will be terrestrial, and that men living again in the flesh at Jerusalem shall be subject to Desires and Pleasures. He also being an enemy to Divine Scripture, and (a) desirous to induce men into error, says that there shall be the number of a thousand years spent in a Nuptial Feast.' And Dionysius also, who in our time was chosen Bishop of the Church of Alexandria, (b) in his second Book concerning Promises, speaking something of the Revelation of John, was from ancient tradition, mentions this Man in these words: 'But Cerinthus, the Founder of the Heresie called from him the Cerinthian Heresie, was, they say, the Author of that

(a) ὁ ἐχθρὸς τῆς ἀληθείας. So it is Printed in Rob. Stephens's Edition. I know not by what accident. Which error of the Press the Geneva Edition afterwards followed: But we, from our M.S.S. copies, and from Nicéphorus his Book, have made good the true reading of this place, thus, ἐχθρὸς πλανῶν, desirous to induce Men into error, &c. Valef.

(b) It should be thus written ἐν τῷ 2<sup>ῳ</sup> βιβλίῳ περὶ τῶν ἐπαγγελιῶν, in his second Book concerning promises. Dionysius Alexandrinus wrote two Books of promises, or rewards, which God promised to give to pious Men after this Life. The second of these was written against Nepos a Bishop of Egypt, who from the Revelation of John asserted that Christ's Kingdom would be terrestrial, as Eusebius declares in his seventh Book. Valef.

Book, (c) being desirous to put a creditable name upon his own forgery. For this was one of the Tenets of his Doctrine, that the Kingdom of Christ should be terrestrial: And those things which he, being a lover of his body, and altogether carnally minded, earnestly lusted after, them he dreamt the Kingdom of Christ consisted, to wit, in the Satiety of the Belly, and of those parts beneath the Belly; that is, in Meats, Drinks and Marriages, and in those things whereby he thought these might with a greater pretence and shew of piety be procured, that is, in Feasts, Sacrifices, and in the slaying of Offerings.' Thus far Dionysius. But the explication of Irenæus, in his first Book against Heresies, does recite some more secret false Opinions of this Man's; and in his third Book he delivers in writing a certain Story (unworthy to be forgotten) as from the Tradition of Polycarp, saying, that John the Apostle going on a time to the Bath to bathe himself, and understanding that Cerinthus was within, retired in great haste from that place, and was fled out at the door, not enduring to go under by the same roof with him; and that he perswaded those who were with him to do so also, saying, Let us be gone, lest the Bath fall, Cerinthus that enemy of the Truth being within it.

name of John the Apostle, that he might get the greater authority for his own Opinions. Valef.

(d) Christophoros, in stead of Χριστοφόρος read Χριστομαρτυρος from B. 7. c. 25. But that place in B. 7. is rather to be corrected by this, than this corrupted from that. Our M.S.S. Copies Marx and Med. have it written Χριστομαρτυρος in B. 7. So also Nicéphorus in his 3<sup>d</sup> B. c. 14. Under the name of Feasts and Sacrifices Cerinthus hid his Lusts, that he might make a shew of honesty and decency.

C H A P. XXIX.

Of Nicholas, and those Hereticks who bear his name.

AT this time the Heresie called the Heresie of the Nicholaites, continued for a very short time; of which also the Revelation of Sir John makes mention. These boasted of Nicholas H. Saviu's (one of the Deacons, who together with Stephen were Ordain'd by the Apostles to minister to the poor) as the Author of their Self. Now Clement A. to wit, Alexandrinus in the third of his Stromata relates thus much of him word for word: 'He, they say, having a beautiful Wife, being after our Saviour's Ascension blamed by the Apostles for his Jealousie, brought his Wife forth, and permitted her to marry whom she had a mind to. For this deed, they report, is agreeable to that saying of his, to wit, That we ought to abuse the flesh. Those therefore who follow his Heresie, (b) simply and rashly assenting to this saying, and, imitating this deed, do most impudently give themselves over to Fornication. But I am given to understand that Nicholas was made use of no other Woman besides her married; and that those of his Children which ought to be Daughters remained Virgins when they were retired to the Word [ἐκ τῶν ἀποστόλων, i. e. assenting to] and not to the Word [ἐκ τῶν ἀποστόλων, i. e. the saying:] Which being not minded by Christophoros, he widely mistook Clement's meaning. For Clement does not say that that fact, or that saying was done or said by Nicholas rashly and inconsiderately. Yea, he declares in the 2<sup>d</sup> of his Stromata about the latter end, that this saying [ἡ ἀποστολική ἐκείνη τῇ λέξει] was one of Nicholas his Apophthegms, or Pithy Speeches. Which saying of his, his followers interpreted so, as if Nicholas had commanded every one to abuse his flesh with all manner of voluptuousness and lasciviousness: But Nicholas meant the clean contrary by this his speech, to wit, that the flesh ought not to be indulged to, but to be kept under, and wearied out with continual exercises of Vertue. ## C H A P. XXXII.

How Simeon the Bishop of Jerusalem suffered Martyrdom.

AFTER the Persecution of Nero and Domitian, whose times we now recount, there was a Persecution raised against us by piece-meal throughout every City, which proceeded from a popular Infurrection. In which we have by tradition received,

(a) In the King's MS. it is Simon, as Rob. Stephens observed. Jerom, in Chronico, testifies that the name of this Bishop of Jerusalem was written two ways, to wit, Simon and Simeon. The same George, Spencer observes, and also the Author Chronici Alexandrini. Valef.

that (a) Simeon the son of Cleophas, who we declar'd was constituted the second Bishop of the Church at Jerusalem, finish'd his life by Martyrdom. And this the same Writer attesteth, several words of whose we have before quoted, that is, Hegesippus: Who, giving a relation of certain Hereticks, adds, that this Simeon, being at that time by them accus'd and torment'd divers ways, and for the space of many days, because he was a Christian, struck with a great amazement both the Judge and those about him, and at length died by the same kind of suffering that the Lord did. Nothing hinders but that we may hear the Writer relating these things word for word, thus: 'Some of those Hereticks accus'd Simeon the son of Cleophas, as being a Descendant from David, and a Christian; and so he suffered Martyrdom when he was an hundred and twenty years old, under Trajan the Emperor, and

(b) Atticus of the Consular Order then President of Syria."

And the same Author says, that those misaccusers, (such as were of the Royal Family of the Jews being at that time sought for) hapned to be convicted, as belonging to that Family. Now, should any one say that this Simeon was one of those who both saw and heard the Lord, he would speak what is in no way absurd, having as an undoubted Evidence thereof the great length of his life, and the mention made in the Gospels of Mary the Wife of Cleophas; whose Son that he was, * our former words have manifested. Also the same Writer says, that others, related to one of those called the Brethren of our Saviour (whose name was Judas) lived until this Emperor's Reign, after their profession of the Faith of Christ under Domitian, * which we mentioned before. For thus he writeth, "They come therefore and preside over the whole Church, as being Martyrs, and of the Kindred of our Lord. And a profound Peace ensuing over the whole Church, they continued alive till the times of Trajan the Emperor, until the fore-said Simeon, the son of Cleophas (who was (c) Uncle to our Lord) being accus'd by the (d) Hereticks, was in like manner also impeach'd for the (e) same thing before Atticus the President. And being cruelly tortured for many days he with constancy profess'd the Faith of Christ; in so much that the President and all those about him wondred greatly, how a man of an hundred and twenty years old as he was, could have endured such torments. And in fine, it was order'd he should be crucified." Moreover the same Man, relating what was done in those times, adds, that until then the (f) Church continued a pure and undefiled Virgin; those who endeavour'd to corrupt the found Rule of wholesome Doctrine, if any such persons there were, absconding themselves hitherto in obscure darkness. But after the sacred company of the Apostles was by various kinds of death become extinct, and that generation of those men, who were accounted worthy to hear with their own ears the Divine Wisdom, was gone, then the conspiracy of impious Error took its rise from the deceit of False Teachers; who, in as much as not one of the Apostles was then surviving, did now at length with a bare face attempt to preach up — the knowledge falsely Thewords so call'd, in opposition to the Doctrine of the Truth.

(g) And thus much this Author, treating of these things, has after this manner said. But we will here proceed to what in order follows of our History.

B. 4. Ensebius seems to have attributed that to the whole Church which Hegesippus spake of the Church at Jerusalem in particular. Valef.

(g) All these Words, to the end of the Chapter, are wanting in the Max. Med. and Ful. MSS. neither doth Rufinus acknowledge them in his translation, as appears therefrom. And this whole Clause seems to me to be Spurious and Supposititious. How Trajan forbade that the Christians should be sought after.

MOREOVER, so great a Persecution rag'd against us at that time in many places, that Plinius Secundus the most eminent amongst the Governours of Provinces, being moved at the multitude of Martyrs, gave the Emperor an account of the great numbers of those that were destroy'd because of their Faith; and together therewith certified him, that he found they did nothing of Impiety, nor acted any thing contrary to the Laws; only that they rose at break of day, and sung Hymns to Christ, as unto God; but that they abhor'd the commission of Adultery and Murder, and such-like horrid crimes; and that they did all things consonant to the Laws. Upon account of which Trajan made this Edict, That the Christians should not be sought out; but if by accident they were lighted on, they should be punish'd. Which being done, the most vehement hear of the Persecution that lay heavy upon us, was in some measure quench'd: but to those who had a mind to do us mischief there remain'd Pretexts no whit less fair and specious; in some places the People, in others the Rulers of the Provinces, forming treacheries against us; in so much that even when there was no open and general persecution, yet there were particular ones throughout the Provinces, and very many of the Faithful underwent various sorts of Martyrdoms. (d) The Author Chronici Alexandrini supposeth that the Cerinthian Hereticks and the Nicholaites are here meant: To whom I do not assent. Hegesippus means those Sects which at that time were potent at Jerusalem, to wit, the Pharisees, Sadducees, and others, of whom hereafter, at Book 4. Trajan. some, being at length troubled at their great number, asked advice of Trajan then the Emperor, what he should do with the residue, saying, that, besides their obstinacy in not sacrificing, he found nothing of impiety in their religious Mysteries, only that they held early Assemblies in singing Hymns to Christ as unto God, and that they had (a) certain Symbol or Signal of their Polity; that they forbade Murder, Adultery, Fraud, Perfidiousness, and suchlike crimes. Then Trajan returned answer, that those sort of Men should not indeed be diligently fought out, but if by chance (b) they were lighted on and brought before the Governours, they should be punished." And this was then the posture of Affairs.

(a) He that translated the Words of Tertullian into Greek, has rendered them unhappily. For neither does symbolus significare disciplinam, nor signaculum, to agree together. I would therefore rather translate these Words of Tertullian thus, signum quodammodo significans disciplinam, i. e. and that they had a certain Symbol or Signal of their Polity. Valef.

(b) Here also the Greek Translator of Tertullian hath done ill; for Tertullian, or rather Trajan, calls those Oblatos, who were brought in before the Judges; for so the Latines use to speak. The sense therefore of the Emperor Trajan's Rescript against the Christians is this, that the Governours of Provinces should not too diligently hunt after the Christians by sending out Spies and Officers to take them, but if any Christians were by chance found out by their Officers, or if they were made appear to be such by their Accusers, that then they ought to be punished. Concerning Ignatius and his Epistles.

MOREOVER, at this time Polycarp a Disciple of the Apostles flourished in Asia, to whom was committed the Bishoprick of the Church at Smyrna, by those that saw and ministered to the Lord. At the same time (a) Papias was famous, who also was Bishop of the Church at Hierapolis, a man most eminently learned and eloquent, and knowing in the Scriptures. Ignatius also, renowned amongst many even to this day, who was chosen Bishop of Antioch, being the second in succession there, after Peter. Report goes that this Man was sent from Syria to Rome to be made food for Wild Beasts, upon account of the Pro-read these Words in his Copies, as may be gathered from his Translation. Wherefore I doubt not but they were inserted by some unskillful Scholiast, against the mind and opinion of Eusebius. For how can it be, that Eusebius should here stile Papias a Man most excellently learned, and very skillful in the Scriptures, whereas himself does at the end of this Book expressly affirm, that Papias was a Man of an ordinary Wit, and altogether ignorant and simple. Valef.

cession of his Faith in Christ. And being led through Asia under the custody of a most watchful Guard, he confirm'd the Churches in every City through which he passed, by Discourses and Exhortations; warning them most especially to take heed of the Heresies, which then first sprung up and increased: And he exhorted them firmly to keep the Traditions of the Apostles, which he thought necessary for the more certain knowledge of Posterity to be put in writing, having confirm'd them by his own testimony. Coming therefore at length to Smyrna, where Polycarp then was, he wrote one Epistle to the Church at Ephesus, mentioning  Onesimus the Pastor there; and another to the Church at Magnesia standing on the River Meander, wherein again he makes mention of Damas the Bishop; and another to the Church at Tralles, the Governour whereof at that time he declares was Polybius. Besides these Epistles he wrote also to the Church at Rome, wherein he earnestly beseeches them that they would not intreat him to avoid Martyrdom, lest they should defraud him of his desired hope. Out of which Epistle 'tis worth our quoting some short Passages for the confirmation of what we have said. Thus therefore he writes word for word: 'From Syria to Rome I fight with Beasts, by sea and land, day and night, bound to ten Leopards, that is, to a File of Soldiers, who being kindly treated by me, become (b) worse. But by their Injuries I am the more instructed; but for all that I am not justified. Oh! that I might enjoy the Wild Beasts that are provided for me! which I even heartily wish may be found to be fierce! which I will allure to devour me immediately, that they spare me not, as out of fear they have left some untouched. But if they be unwilling to do it, I will compel them by force.

Pardon me; I know what is good for me: Now I begin to be a Disciple:

(c) Let nothing visible or invisible divert me from, or envy my happiness of attaining Christ Jesus. Let Fire and the Crofs, the Assaults of the Wild Beasts, the pulling asunder of Bones, the cutting off of Members, the stamping in pieces of the whole Body, the punishment of the Devil, come upon me; so I may obtain Christ Jesus. And thus much he wrote from the foresaid City to the Churches before named. Being now gone beyond Smyrna, he from Tras again sent Letters to those at Philadelphia, also to the Church at Smyrna, and privately to Polycarp the Prelate thereof: To whom, because he well knew him to be an Apostolical Man, he entrusted his Flock at Antioch, being a very true and good Pastor; requesting him, that he should have a diligent care thereof. The same per Ignatius's son writing to those of Smyrna, borrows some concern- words, which whence he had I (d) know not, ing Christ

speaking thus much concerning Christ; 'But I both know and believe that after the Resurrection he was in the flesh; and that, coming to Peter and those who were about him, he said unto them, take hold of me, handle me, and see, for I am not an incorporeal Spirit: And straightway they touch'd him, and believed.' Irenæus also speaks of his Martyrdom, and mentions his Epistles, saying thus: 'As one of our Men, condemn'd to the Wild Beasts for his Faith in God, said, I am the Bread-corn of God, and I must be ground by the Teeth of Wild Beasts, that I may be found to be pure Bread.' And Polycarp mentions the same Epistles in that of his to the Philippians, in these very words: 'I therefore beseech you all to obey those that are over you, and to exercise all manner of Patience, which you have evidently seen, not only in those Blessed Men Ignatius, Rufus, and Zosimus, but also in others of us; likewise in Paul himself, and in the other Apostles; being fully persuaded that all these ran not in vain, but proceeded in Faith and Righteousness; and that they are in that place due to them from the Lord, together with whom they suffer'd. For they loved not this present World, but him who died for us, and was by God raised for us again.' And a little after he adds; 'Both you and Ignatius wrote to me, that if any one went into Syria, he should carry your Letters thither: Which I will do if I can get a fit opportunity; either I myself, or some other, whom I will send as a Messenger on purpose for you. Those Epistles of Ignatius sent by him to us, and all the other we had here with us, we have sent to you, according as you enjoy'd us; they are made up with this Letter; from which Epistles you may profit very much; for they contain Faith, Patience, and whatever is conducive to our Edification in the Lord.' And thus much concerning Ignatius: After whom succeeded Heros in the Bishoprick of Antioch.

C H A P. XXXVII.

Concerning those Preachers of the Gospel who at that time were eminent.

Among those who were illustrious in those times Quadratus was one, who, as some say, flourished at the same time with the Daughters of Philip, in the gift of Prophecy. Many others also besides these were famous at that time, having obtain'd the first place among the Successors of the Apostles: Who, because they were the (a) eminent Disciples of such Men, built up those Churches, the Foundations whereof were every-where laid by the Apostles; promoting greatly the Doctrine of the Gospel, and scattering the salutary Seed of the Kingdom of Heaven at large over the whole World. For many of the then Disciples, whose Souls were inflamed by the Divine Word with a more ardent desire of Philosophy, first fulfilled our Saviour's Commandment, by distributing their Substance to those that were necessitous; then after that travelling abroad, they perform'd the work of Evangelists to those who as yet had not heard the word of Faith; being very ambitious to preach Christ, and to deliver the Books of the Divine Gospels. And these Persons, having only laid the foundation of Faith in remote and barbarous places, and constituted other Pastors, committed to them the culture of those they had perfectly introduc'd to the Faith, departed again to other Regions and Nations, accompanied with the Grace and Co-operation of God. For the Divine Spirit as yet wrought many wonderful works by them; inasmuch that at the first hearing, innumerable multitudes of men did with most ready minds altogether admit of and engage themselves in the worship of that God who is the Maker of all things. But it being impossible for us to recount by name all those who in the first Succession of the Apostles were Pastors or Evangelists in the Churches throughout the world, we will here commit to writing the mention of their names only, whose writings, containing the Apostolical Doctrine they delivered, are to this day extant amongst us.

C H A P. XXXVIII.

Concerning the Epistle of Clemens, and those other Writings, which are falsely attributed to him.

AS for example, the Epistles of Ignatius, which we have reckoned up, and that of Clemens acknowledg'd by all as undoubted, which he wrote in the name of the Roman to the Corinthian Church. Wherein, seeing he has inserted many Sentences taken out of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and sometimes had made use of the express words of it, it evidently manifests that that Work is not new; whence it has seem'd agreeable to reason to reckon this Epistle amongst the rest of the Writings of that Apostle. For Paul having written to the Hebrews in his own Country-Language, some say that Luke the Evangelist, but others that this Clemens, of whom we speak, translated that Work. Which latter seems the truest Opinion, because both the Style both of Clemens's Epistle, and also of that to the Hebrews appears to be very like; and the Sense and Expressions in both the Works are not much different. You must also know that there is a second Epistle, which is said to be Clemens's: But we know for certain that this is not so generally acknowledg'd, nor approved of as the former, because we are sure the Antients have not quoted any Authorities out of it. Further also, some have of late produced other voluminous and large Works, as if they were his, containing the (a) Dialogues of Peter and (b) Apion; (c) of which there is not the least mention extant amongst the Antients; neither does there appear in them the (d) pure Form of Apostolical sound Doctrine. Now therefore 'tis apparent which are the genuine and undoubted Writings of Clemens: we have also spoken sufficiently concerning the Works of Ignatius and Polycarp.

Antioch with Anubion about the same time that the Apostle Peter came thither. But there is nothing hind there of Peter's dispute with Apion. What shall we say then? That the Book of Clemens which contains Peter's dispute with Apion is different from his Books Recognit.: To me indeed they seem not to be two Books. For if there had been two Books of Clemens's, the one Recognit., the other containing the dispute of Peter with Apion, why should Eusebius mention one only, and omit the other? There was therefore but one Book of Clemens's, entitled αρεσκων, or αρεσκων πιστης. But 'twas divided into two parts; the former mentioned Marcus and Fausinus to be acknowledged of their Children; in the second part was contained the Dialogues of Peter and Apion. Indeed Rufinus, who translated that Book of Clemens's into Latin, does tell us, in his Epistle to Gaudensius the Bishop, that there were two parts of this Book in the Greek; in the one of which some things occurred which the other had not: He writes also, that on set purpose he omitted some things, because they disagreed from sound Doctrine. (b) This name is written with a double p, in all our MSS, but that of Mr. Fakett, where 'tis writ with a single p, as it is in Yosephus and others. Photius, in Biblioth. chap. 112. agrees with our Copies, and

(a) In our MSS, Mar. Alc. Tuk. and Sir. Henry Nat.'s, it is written, αρεσκων πιστης, i. e. eminent, or excellent Disciples. Valel.

(a) In the 10th Book Recognit. of Clemens Romans, there is mention of Apion, who is said to have come to

Antioch with Anubion about the same time that the Apostle Peter came thither. But there is nothing hind there of Peter's dispute with Apion. What shall we say then? That the Book of Clemens which contains Peter's dispute with Apion is different from his Books Recognit.: To me indeed they seem not to be two Books. For if there had been two Books of Clemens's, the one Recognit., the other containing the dispute of Peter with Apion, why should Eusebius mention one only, and omit the other? There was therefore but one Book of Clemens's, entitled αρεσκων, or αρεσκων πιστης. But 'twas divided into two parts; the former mentioned Marcus and Fausinus to be acknowledged of their Children; in the second part was contained the Dialogues of Peter and Apion. Indeed Rufinus, who translated that Book of Clemens's into Latin, does tell us, in his Epistle to Gaudensius the Bishop, that there were two parts of this Book in the Greek; in the one of which some things occurred which the other had not: He writes also, that on set purpose he omitted some things, because they disagreed from sound Doctrine. (b) This name is written with a double p, in all our MSS, but that of Mr. Fakett, where 'tis writ with a single p, as it is in Yosephus and others. Photius, in Biblioth. chap. 112. agrees with our Copies, and and Clement also in B. 10. Recognit. where he says that Apion Plistonice came to Antioch with Andronic. Lastly Agellus, in his 6 B. says Apion Græcus homo qui Plistonice est appellatus. Undoubtedly Apion is a Roman name, wrested into a Greek form, as Isachorus, Isaphorus, and the like. Apion was a common name amongst the Egyptians derived from Apis, whom they worshipped; as, Serapion, Amunon, and the like. Protreus King of the Cyrene was called Apion. Wherefore seeing this Grammarian the Son of Plistonice was an Egyptian, it seems that he should be called Apion, rather than Apion. For Apion that was Consul in Justinian's time, the Latin Annals call Apion, but the Chronicon Alexandrinum calls him Apion. Valef.

(c) But Origen, in his 3d Book Explanat. on Genesis, makes mention of these Books of Clement's; and quotes a passage out of them, which is still extant in the Books of Clement's Recognit. This quotation of Origen's is in the 22 chap. Philok. (pag. 81. Edit. Cambr. 1658.) and in the common Editions of that piece the place is said to be taken out of his B. 2. against Celsus; but in the Books of Origen against Celsus now extant, it is not to be found. This quotation out of Clement is indeed in his 3d B. Explanat. on Genesis. — But I have observed that Origen does often quote Books, whose Authority is unknown; wherein he does, like the Bee, gather Honey from venomous Flowers. Valef.

(d) Plinius testifies the same, chap. 112. Biblioth. and before him, Rufinus in his Epistle to Gaudentius the Bishop, to wit, that in those Books Recognit. of Clement's there are some things said concerning the Son of God, which disagree from the true rule of Faith, and make for the opinion of the Arriani. Ephraimus, in libro Editionum chap. 15, does expressly affirm, that those Books of Clement Romanus, entitled ἀντίστιμις, were corrupted and falsified by the Ethiopes. Concerning the Book of Papias.

THE Books of Papias now extant, are five in number, which he entitled, An Explication of the Oracles of the Lord. Irenæus mentions no more than these five to have been written by him, saying thus; 'And these things Papias, the Auditor of John, the Companion of Polycarp, one of the Ancients, attests in writing, in the fourth of his Books; for he completed five.' Thus far Irenæus. But Papias, in his Preface to his Books, does not evidence himself to have been a Beholder or an Auditor of the Holy Apostles, but only, that he received the Matters of Faith from those who were well-known to them; which he declares in these words: 'But it shall not be tedious to me, to (a) set down in order, together with my Interpretations, those things which I have well learn'd from the Elders, and faithfully remembred, the truth whereof will be confirm'd by me. For I delighted not in those who speak much, as most do, but in those that teach the truth: Nor in those who recite strange and unusual Precepts; but in such as faithfully rehearse the Commandments given by the Lord, and which proceed from the Truth. Now if at any time I met with any one that had conversed with the Elders, I made a diligent enquiry after their sayings, what Andrew, or what Peter said; or what Philip, or Thomas, or James, or John, or Matthew, or any other of the Lord's Disciples, were wont to say; and what Arifion, and John the Elder (the Disciples of our Lord) utter'd. For I thought that those things contain'd in Books could not profit me so much, as what I heard from the Mouths of Men yet surviving.' In which words 'tis very observable that he recounts the name of John twice; the former of whom he reckons among Peter, James, Matthew, and the rest of the Apostles; manifestly shewing thereby that he speaks of John the Evangelist: But, making a distinction in his words, he places the other John with those who are not of the number of the Apostles; putting Arifion before him; and expressly calls him The Elder. So that hereby is shewn the truth of their Relation; who have said that there were two in Asia who had that same name; and that there are two Sepulchres at Ephesus, and each of them now called the Sepulchre of John. Now I judg'd it very requisite to make this observation. For 'tis likely that the second, (unless any one would rather have it to be the first) saw that Revelation which goes under the name of John. Further, this Papias, whom we speak of, professes he received the sayings of the Apostles from those who had been conversant with them; and was, as he says, the Hearer of Arifion and John the Elder. Indeed he mentions them often by name, and has set down in his Works those Traditions he receiv'd from them. And thus much has been said by us, not unprofitably, as we judge. It is also worth our adding to the fore-quoted words of Papias, other Relations of the same Authors, wherein he gives an account of some Miracles, and other Passages, which he received by tradition. Indeed, that Philip the Apostle together with his Daughters lived at Hierapolis, has been manifested by what we said * before. Now * Chap. we are to shew, that Papias, who liv'd at the same time, mentions his receiving a wonderful Narration from the Daughters of Philip. For he relates, that in his time a dead was Man raised to life again: And further, that there came to pass another Miracle about Justus who was surnam'd (b) Barabas, how that he drank deadly Poison, and by the Grace of the Lord sustain'd no harm. That this Justus, after our Saviour's Ascension, was together with Matthew set forth by the Holy Apostles, and that they pray'd that one of them might in stead of the Traitor Judas be allotted to fill up their number; the Book of the Acts of the Apostles doth after this manner relate — And they appointed two, Joseph called Barabas, who was surnam'd Justus, and Matthias. And they pray'd and said. Moreover the same Writer has set down some other things which came to him barely by word of mouth, to wit, certain strange Parables of our Saviour's, and Sermons of his, and some other more fabulous Relations: Among which he says there shall be a thousand years after the Resurrection from the Dead, wherein the Kingdom of Christ shall be corporally set up here on earth: And, I judge, he had this opinion from his misapprehending the Apostolical Discourses, in that he did not see through those things they spake mystically by way of similitude. For he seems to have been a man of a very narrow understanding, as it may be conjectur'd from his Books. Yet he gave occasion to very many Ecclesiastical Persons after him to be of the same erroneous Opinion with him; who had a regard for the Antiquity of the Man, as for example, to Irenæus, and to every one also who has declared himself to be of the same Opinion. He relates also in his Books other Interpretations of the aforesaid Arifion's, of the sayings of the Lord; and the Traditions of John the Elder. To which we do refer the studious Readers, and judge it requisite now only to adjoin to his fore-mentioned words a Passage he relates concerning Mark the Evangelist, in these words; 'This also the Elder said; Mark, being the (c) Interpreter of (c) Jerom, in Catalo- go, calls Mark the interpreter of Peter from this place of Papias, as I judge. Hence 'tis, that many of the Greeks write, that the Gospel of Mark was dictated by Peter. So Athanasius in his Treatise, de Libris Sacre Scripturæ. Which, how it's to be understood, Papias declares in this place. For it is not to be supposed that Mark wrote his Gospel from the mouth of Peter dictating to him; but, when he heard Peter Preaching the Word of God to the Jews in Hebrew, Mark carefully digested those things in the Greek Language, which concerned Christ. Valef.

Trajan. Peter, accurately wrote whatever he remembered; but yet not in that order, wherein Christ either spake, or did them: For he was neither an Hearer of the Lord's, nor yet his Follower; but, as I said, he was afterwards conversant with Peter, who preach'd the Doctrine of the Gospel profitably to those that heard him, but not so as if he would compose an History of the Lord's Sayings. Wherefore Mark committed nothing of error, in that he wrote some things so as he had remembered them. For he made this one thing his chiefest aim, to wit, to omit none of those things he had heard, nor yet to deliver any thing that was false therein." Thus much Papias relates concerning Mark. Concerning Matthew, he says this; Moreover Matthew wrote his Divine Oracles in the Hebrew tongue, and every one interpreted them, as they were able. This Papias also has quoted Authorities taken out of the First Epistle of John, and likewise out of the former Epistle of Peter. He has set down also another Relation about a Woman who was accused of many Crimes before the Lord; which Relation is contain'd in the Gospel according to the Hebrews. And thus much we have usefully and diligently observed, and added to those things which before he had set down.

CHAP. I.

Who were the Bishops of the Roman and Alexandrian Churches in the Reign of Trajan.

(a) In the Chronicon of Eusebius, the beginning of Primus his being charge of that Church. At the same time also, Bishop of Eusebius having finish'd his eighth Year, Alexander undertook the Bishoprick of Rome, who was the fifth in succession from Peter and Paul.

Also the beginning of Alexander's being made Bishop of Rome is placed on the 10th year of Trajan. But in the digesting of the years of the Bishops both of Rome, and also of other Cities, I have observed that Eusebius's Chronicon does often dissent from his Ecclesiastical History. Whether it be the fault of the Transcribers, or of Jerom the Translator, or of Eusebius himself, I cannot positively affirm: For in so great a diversity it's difficult to assign the cause of the mistake. But, seeing that the Ecclesiastical History was written by Eusebius after his Chronicon, wherefore such a disagreement occurs, that seems rather to be followed, which is asserted in the Ecclesiastical History. ## CHAP. II.

Moreover, the Doctrine and Church of our Saviour flourishing daily, increased more and more: But the Calamities of the Jews were augmented by continual Mischiefs following one upon another. For, the Emperor entering now upon the eighteenth Year of his Reign, there arose again a Commotion of the Jews, which destroy'd a very great number of them. For both at Alexandria, and over, all the rest of Egypt; and moreover throughout Cyrene, they being stirr'd up as it were by some violent and contentious Spirit, rais'd Sedition against the (a) Greeks and (a) The Gentiles with whom they dwelt. And they increasing the Faction very much, on the ensuing Year, kindled a great War; Lupus was at that time & Towns Governour of all Egypt. Moreover it hapned that with the in the first encounter they were too hard for the Greeks; who flying to Alexandria, took the Jews, and that were in the City alive, and slew them. But had equal those Jews who inhabited Cyrene, being frustrated of assistance in the War from them, persisterd to infect and destroy the Country of Egypt and all its (b) Prefectures, by Pillages and Robberies, one Lucius being their Leader: Against whom the Emperor sent Marcus Turbo with Horse and Foot, and also with Naval Forces: He in many Engagements, having made the War against them long and tedious, destroy'd many Myriads of Jews, by raised not only of those of Cyrene, but also of those of Egypt, who flockt together to give assistance to their King Lucius. But the Emperor suspecting that those Jews in Mesopotamia would also set upon the Inhabitants there, commanded (c) Lucius Quietus to clear that Province of them: who engaging with them, destroy'd a very great number of them that dwelt there: for which successful piece of service he was appointed Deputy of Judaea by the Emperor. And thus much those Heathens, who committed to writing the Translations of those times, do almost in the very same words relate.

ges they did; on the other hand, the Jews would not live in a meaner condition, than the rest of the Citizens did. Hence arose frequent Contentions, both in Egypt, and also in Syria, as Philo and Josephus do attest. Therefore in our Translation we have inserted both [Grecians and Gentiles] because one word seem'd not to suffice. For the Jews did not only assault the Grecians, but the Natives also of Egypt and Lybia: Nor again, the Gentiles only, but the Christians likewise, of whom there was then no small number in Egypt and Cyrene. Valef.

(b) This destroying of all Egypt and Lybia by the Jews, besides Diof, Orosius mentions, in his 7 B. Valef.

(c) This

(c) This Man was a Moor, not of the Province of Mauritania, but of the barbarous Moors, who were Allies of the Roman Empire. At first he commanded a Troop of Moors; not long after he was condemned for his lewdness, and in disgrace cashiered. But afterwards in the Dacick War, when the Army stood in need of the assistance of the Moors, he did a brave piece of Service. Upon which account being rewarded and honoured, he did more and braver exploits in the second Dacick War. At length, in the Parthian War, which Trajan waged against the Parthians, he was so valiant and fortunate, that he was chosen into the Pretorian Order, bore a Consulship, and Governed the Province of Palestine, which Promotion first made him to be envied, then hated, and at last ruined him. Thus much Dion Cassius relates, in Excerpt. Valef.

C H A P. III.

Who, in the Time of Adrian, wrote Apologies in defence of the Faith.

Adrian. When Trajan had held the Empire twenty years compleat, excepting six months, Adrianus succeeded in the Government: To whom Quadratus dedicated and presented a Book, wherein he had comprized an Apology for our Religion; because certain malicious Men endeavour'd to molest the Christians. This Work is still extant amongst many of the Brethren, and we also have it. From which Book may be seen periphrastic evidences of the Man's Understanding, and of his truly (a) Apostolical Faith and sound Doctrine. The same Writer makes his own Antiquity sufficiently evident, by what he relates in these very words: "The Works of our Saviour were always conspicuous, for they were true. Those that were healed, such as were raised from the dead, did not only appear after they were healed, and raised; but also were afterwards seen of all; and that not only whilst our Saviour was conversant upon earth, but also after he was gone they continued alive a great while; inasmuch that some of them survived even to our Times." Such a person indeed was Quadratus. Aristides also, a faithful Man of that Religion profess'd by us, left in like manner, as Quadratus did, an Apology for the Faith, dedicated to Adrian. And this Man's Book is, to this day, preserved by many persons.

to a way or path to go in, which was wont to be cut out that it might be fitter for use; thence the Latin Phrase, viam facere, i. e. to cut a way, that is, to go before and direct any in their journey. And with the word [εὐδοκίαν, right] joined with it, it is to go before one, and direct him in the straight way to such a place. Hence the Syriack Version of the New Testament renders this Phrase in Timothy [εὐδοκίαν & ἀγαθόν] recte predicare sermone, i. e. rightly to preach the word. Fuller's Miscellan. B. 3, chap. 16.

Who were embold with the Title of Bishops over the Roman and Alexandrian Churches in this Emperor's Time.

IN the third year of Adrian's Empire, Alexander the Bishop of Rome died, having compleated the tenth year of his Administration. Xystus was Successor to him: and about that time, Primus dying in the twelfth year of his Presidency over the Alexandrian Church, Iustus succeeded him.

C H A P. V.

Who were Bishops of Jerusalem from our Saviour, even to these Times.

Moreover, the space of time which the Bishops of Jerusalem spent in their Presidency over that See, I could in no wise find preserved in writing. For, as report says, they were very short-lived: But thus much I have been informed of from old Records, that unto the Siege of the Jews in Adrian's Time, there were in number fifteen Successions of Bishops there: All whom they say, were by birth Hebrews, who had sincerely embraced the knowledge of Christ; inasmuch that by those, who were then able to give judgment as to such matters, they were approved to be worthy of the Episcopal Office. For that whole Church at Jerusalem was made up of believing Jews, who had continued steadfast in the Faith from the Apostles Times even to the then Siege; wherein the Jews, revolting again from the Romans, were vanquished and destroyed by no small Wars. The Bishops therefore that were of the Circumcision then ceasing, it will be now requisite to give a Catalogue of them in their Order from first to last. The first therefore was James, called the Brother of the Lord; after him the second was Simon; the third Iustus; the fourth Zaccheus; the fifth Tobias; the sixth Benjamin; the seventh John; the eighth Matthias; the ninth Philip; the tenth Senesca; the eleventh Iustus; the twelfth Levi; the thirteenth Ephraim; the fourteenth (a) Ioseph; the fifteenth and last (a) Eusebius in his Chronicon, calls him are now treating of; all which were of the Circumcision. But now, Adrian being in the twelfth year of his Empire, Telephorus the seventh from the Apostles, succeeded Xystus, who had compleated the tenth year of his Episcopal Office over the Romans; and within a years space and (b) some months Eumenes, the sixth in Order, succeeded in the Presidency over the Alexandrian Church; his immediate Predecessor there having Ierom and others called Iofes. (b) Or, one

Ephraim also is, by Nicephorus, called Ephrem. Valef. months; for Iulianus seems to have read in his Copy. Valef.

C H A P. VI.

The last Siege of the Jews in the Time of Adrian.

BUT when the Rebellion of the Jews again increased exceedingly, * Rufus the President of Judea, having had Auxiliary Forces sent him from the Emperor, marched out against them; and, making use of their Madnes and Desperation as an occasion of his sparing none, he slew on Myriads together both of Men, Women and Children; and by the Law of War reduced their Country to servitude and subjection to the Romans. The Leader of the Jews at that time was by name Barchochebas, a name indeed that signifies a Star, but otherwise he was a Man that was a Murderer and a Robber; who by reason of his name did monstrously pretend to his Followers, being (a) Slaves, that he was a Star come down from Heaven to enlighten them who were now oppressed with servitude. But the War growing sharp in the eighteenth year of Adrian's Empire at the City (b) Bethara, which was the best fortified place, and not far distant from Jerusalem; and the Siege continuing a long time; the Innovators also having been utterly destroyed by famine and thirst; and the Author of this their Madnes undergone

Adrian. condign punishment; from that time that whole Nation was (e) altogether interdicted to enter into the Country about Jerusalem; the Law, Edict and Sanctions of Adrian having commanded them, that they should not so much as from afar off behold their Paternal Soil. Arifon of (d) Pella relates this. Thus the City being made destitute of the Jewish Nation, and wholly cleared of its old Inhabitants, was possess'd by Foreigners that of B. 8. of dwell there, and (e) afterwards made a Roman City; and, changing its name, was, in honour of the Emperor Ælius Adrianus, called Ælia. And when there was a Church there gather'd of the Nations that dwell in it, Mark was the first who, after the Bishops of the Circumcision, undertook Only on the publick Administration of Matters there.

(that whereon Jerusalem was taken and destroyed by the Romans) the Jews out of all Nations were wont to meet in Palestine, and having paid a sum of Money to the Soldiers, they entered into that part of the City where Solomon's Temple heretofore stood; and there they bewailed the destruction of the City and Temple. See Scaliger in Animadv. Euseb. p. 198. Valef.

(d) That was a City of Syria, which, after the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, was the Seat of the Bishops of Jerusalem; as Eusebius testifies. This Arifon of Pella wrote a Book entitled A Dispute of Jason and Papiscus; this Book Origen makes mention of in his 4. B. against Celsus; But the Preface of it is only now extant amongst the Works of Cyprian. Valef.

(e) Eusebius is here doubly mistaken; both in that he says Jerusalem was wholly destroyed in Adrian's time; and also because he thought that Ælia Capitolina was built by the same Adrian after the Siege of Bethera. As to the first; it's evident from Josephus, that Jerusalem was totally destroyed by Titus, in so much that it was ploughed. As to the second, Ælia was so far from being built by Adrian after this Victory obtained over the Jews, that this War was begun by the Jews upon that very account. For when the Jews saw the Soil of their City occupied by Strangers; and perceived that in that very place where the Temple had been, Jupiter Capitolinus was worshipped and sacrificed to; being not able to endure that, they took Arms, and began this War which Eusebius heretelates. Which was begun in the 16 year of Adrian, and ended the 18 of his Empire. But Ælia Capitolina was built long before, to wit, in the second year of Adrian: From whose times to those of Constantine the Great it was always called Ælia. But from the time of Constantine the Great it recovered again the name of Jerusalem, both upon the account of the honour of that name, and also because of its Prerogative, being the first Episkopal Seat. Valef.

C H A P. VII.

Who at that time were the Authors of false Doctrine.

NOW, the Churches throughout the whole World shining like most bright Stars, and the Faith in our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ flourishing among all Mankind, the Devil that Hater of Good, as being always the Enemy of Truth, and most malicious Impugner of Man's Salvation, using all his Arts and Stratagems against the Church, at first arm'd himself against it with outward Persecutions: But then afterwards being excluded from them, he made his assaults by other methods, making use of evil Men and Impostors, as being the pernicious Instruments for destroying of Souls, and Ministers of Perdition; devising all ways, whereby these Impostors and Deceivers, cloathing themselves with the title of our Religion, might both lead into the Pit of Destruction, those of the Faithful whom they had enticed to themselves, and also divert such as were unskilful in the Faith from the way that leads to the comfortable Word, by such means as they attempted to put in practice. From that

Menander therefore, whom we a little * before manifested to have been the Successor of Simon, there was hatch'd a Serpentine Breed, double-mouth'd as it were, and double-headed, which constituted the Founders of two different and disagreeing Heresies; Saturninus, by birth an Antiochian, and Basilius, an Alexandrian; whereof the former in Syria, the other in Egypt, set up Schools of most detestable Heresies. Moreover, Irenæus makes it manifest that Saturninus feign'd mostly the same things that Menander did; but that Basilius under a pretext of more mystical matters, most mightily enlarged his Inventions, forming monstrous and fabulous Fictions for the making up of his impious Heresie. There being many Ecclesiastical Men therefore, who at that time were Defenders of the Truth, and eloquent Maintainers of the Apostolical and Ecclesiastical Doctrine, some of them forthwith comprized in writing explanatory accounts of the fore-manifested Heresies, which they left as Cautions and Preventions to Posterity: of which there is come to our hands a most strenuous Confutation of Basilius, of Agrippa Casar's, a most eminent Writer in those times; wherein he discovers the horrible imposture of the Man: Disclosing therefore his Secrets, he says that he made four and twenty Books upon the (a) Gospel, and that he counterfeited for himself Prophets named by him (b) Barcebas and Barceph, and some (c) others who never were in being; and that he gave them barbarous names to astonish those who were admirers of such things; and that he taught that it was a thing indifferent to taste of Meats offer'd to Idols, and that in times of Persecutions those did not imprudently who abjured the Faith: and that, after the manner of the Pythagoreans, he enjoyn'd a five years silence to his Followers: the fore-said Author having recounted these things and others like them concerning this Basilius, hath most diligently detected and brought to light the error of the forementioned Heresie.

But Irenæus writeth also, that Carpocrates, the Father of another Heresie termed the Gnostick Heresie, was Contemporary with these. These Gnosticks thought that those magical Delusions of Simon's were not to be expos'd covertly as he did, but publicly and openly; boasting of amorous Potions accurately and curiously made by them, and of certain Spirits that were causes of Dreams, and (d) Familiars, and of certain other such-like Delusions, as if these were the greatest and only excellent things. And agreeable hereunto they taught, that those who would arrive to perfection in their Mysteries, or rather detestable Wickednesses, must act all things that were most filthy and unclean; being no other waysable to avoid the Rulers of the World (as they call them) unless they distributed to all of them their dues by most filthy and detestable acts of obscenity. The Devil therefore who delights in mischief, making use of these Instruments, it came to pass that he both miserably enslaved such as were seduc'd by them, and so led such them into destruction; and also gave those Nations as those that were unbelievers a great occasion of a report abundantly flandering the Divine Doctrine; a report arising from them being diffused to the reproachful detraction of the whole Christian Religion. help they Upon this account therefore chiefly it happened that an impious and most absurd suspicion concerning us was spread abroad amongst those who

(a) Eusebius says not upon what Gospel Basilius wrote these Books, perhaps Basilius made these Books upon his own Gospel; for he wrote one, and set his own name to it, and called it [the Gospel according to Basilius] as Origen attests in his 1. Homil. on Luke; and Jerom in his Preface to St. Matthew. These Books were called Basilius's Exegeticks. Clemens (Lib. 4. Stromat.) quotes some places out of the 23d of these Books. Valef.

(b) Or, Barcebas: Upon these Prophets, Barcebas and Barceph, Ignore the Son of Basilius wrote some Books of Expositions, as Clemens Alexandr. shews, B. 6. Stromat. Valef.

(c) Eusebius speaks here of those Prophets whom Basilius feigned for himself. Our Author is right in his saying that Basilius's Heresie sprang up in Adrian's Reign. For then the Hereticks began to creep out of their holes: They thought (the Apostles being all dead) that they had then an opportune time to divulge their Errors. Valef.

(d) So they were called, because they were supposed to be familiar with the Devils, and kept them from Men; and used such unclean and filthy things, as if these were the greatest and only excellent things. And agreeable hereunto they taught, that those who would arrive to perfection in their Mysteries, or rather detestable Wickednesses, must act all things that were most filthy and unclean; being no other waysable to avoid the Rulers of the World (as they call them) unless they distributed to all of them their dues by most filthy and detestable acts of obscenity. The Devil therefore who delights in mischief, making use of these Instruments, it came to pass that he both miserably enslaved such as were seduc'd by them, and so led such them into destruction; and also gave those Nations as those that were unbelievers a great occasion of a report abundantly flandering the Divine Doctrine; a report arising from them being diffused to the reproachful detraction of the whole Christian Religion. help they Upon this account therefore chiefly it happened that an impious and most absurd suspicion concerning us was spread abroad amongst those who

Adrian. then were Unbelievers; as if we used detestable carnal Copulation with Mothers and Sisters, and fed upon nefarious Meats. But these Crafts of the Devil's did not long succeed with him; the Truth asserted and confirmed itself, and in process of time shone forth most clearly and apparently. For these Devices of the Adversaries, being repelled by their own force, forthwith became extinct; Heresies of a different sort newly design'd and cut out, and succeeding one after the other, the former forthwith melted and fell away, and being dissolved into kinds that were of divers sorts and fashions, were, some one way, some another, destroy'd. But the brightness of the Catholick and only True Church, being always the same, and so continuing steadfast and like itself, was greatly increased and augmented; the Gravity, the Sincerity, the Ingenious Freedom, the Modesty, and Purity of an Holy Conversation and Philosophical Course of Life, shooting forth a splendor over all Nations both Grecians and Barbarians. That reproachful Detraction therefore wherewith our Religion had been overspread, was instantly suppress'd. Wherefore our Doctrine continued to be the only, and the (e) prevailing Opinion among all Men, and was confest to be most eminently flourishing upon account of its Gravity, its Prudent Modesty, and its Divine and Wise Precepts; in so much that no one hitherto hath been so audacious, as to charge our Faith with any foul Slander, or any such reproachful Detraction, as those our old Adversaries were formerly ready and willing to make use of. But moreover, in these times the Truth again produced many that were its Defenders, who engaged these impious Heresies, not only with unwritten Arguments, but also with penn'd Demonstrations.

(e) Kαθα is the term in the original, hence the Christian Religion was by the Heathens call'd καθαρίσματα, i. e. the prevailing opinion; and the Christians were termed καθαροί by Porphyrius, in his Book de Oraculor. Philosoph. which place Eusebius quotes, in his 9th B. Preparat. Evangel. cap. 10. Valf.

C H A P. VIII.

What Ecclesiastical Writers there were in those Times.

(a) In my opinion Hegeppus is not rightly placed in the times of Adrian; neither do his words here quoted by Eusebius, evince so much. It's certain, Hegeppus wrote his Books when Eusebius was Bishop of Rome, as he himself attests in the 22 chap. of this Book. He was contemporary therefore with Irenaeus, who then compos'd his Elaborate Books against the Heresies. Indeed our Eusebius, retracting as it were his former opinion, does, in the 21, and 22 chap. of this Book, place Hegeppus in the times of Marcus Antoninus. Val. (b) Which was celebrated every fifth year, at Antininea in Arcadia, says Plutarchus, in Arcad. Val. (c) Amongst the Egyptians, the Chief Priest, who was over the other Priests, and distributed to them the Revenue of the Temple, was call'd a Prophet. For the first Officer of the Temple was the Canon, then the Hieroglyph, after him the Scriba, then the Vestitor; last of all the Propheta took his place, who carried a Water-pot in his bosom. See Eusebius in 3 B. advers. Hæres. &c. Concerning these Prophets of Antinous instituted by Adrian there is mention made in an old Greek Inscription, quoted by Cajaubon in his Notes on Spartianus. Wherefore it's no wonder that Antinous, deified by Adrian, had his Prophets, seeing he was worshipp'd chiefly by the Egyptians. Valf.

Justin, a sincere lover of the true Philosophy; as yet spent his time about; and was studious in, the Writings of the Gentile Philosophers: He in like manner declares this very time, in his Apology to Antoninus, writing thus: We judge it not absurd here to mention Antinous also who lived very lately; whom all men through fear have undertaken to worship as a God, notwithstanding they evidently know who he was, and from whence he had his Original. The same Author, mentioning also the War then waged against the Jews, adds thus much; For in the (d) late Jewish War, Barchochabas, who was the Head of the Jewish Rebellion, gave command that the Christians only should be most cruelly tormented, unless they would deny Jesus Christ, and blaspheme. But Justin moreover, declaring in the same Book, his own Conversion from the Gentile Philosophy to the Worship of the True God, that it was not done for the by him rashly and unadvisedly, but with judgment and consideration, he writes thus: 'I also myself, being much addicted to, and affected with the Platonick Philosophy, hearing the Christians calumniated, and seeing them undaunted at Death, and at whatever else is accounted terrible, thought it impossible that such Men should live wickedly and be given to Voluptuousness. For, what sensual or intemperate person, and one who accounts Human Flesh good food, could willingly embrace death, which would deprive him of his desires? and would not rather use his utmost endeavour to live continually in this life, and conceal himself from the Magistrates? much less would he voluntarily offer himself to be put to death.' Moreover, the same Author relates, that Adrian (having received Letters from that most Eminent Governor (e) Serenius Granianus concerning the Christians, setting forth how unjust it was they should be slain uncondemn'd, merely to gratify the clamours of the People, when no accusation appear'd against them) wrote an Answer to (f) Minutius Fundanus Proconsul of Asia, wherein he commanded that no one should be put to death without a judicially Prosecution, and an Accusation lawful and allowable. And Justin there produceth the Copy of the Rescript in Latin, the Language wherein it was originally written. But before I he premitteth these words: '(g) And altho' from the Letter of the most Excellent and Renowned Cæsar Adrianus your Father, we might request you would give command, that the judiciary Proceedings against us be made according as we desire; yet we crave this, not so much because it was commanded by Adrian, but in regard whom we know and understand our Petition to be just: received. And moreover, that you may perceive what we say herein to be true, we have inserted the Copy of Adrian's Letter;' which is thus. To these words Justin hath annexed the Latin Copy of the Fundanus Letter; which we, as well as we could, have here done into Greek, after this manner.

The reason, as I suppose, might be this; either Granianus died soon after he wrote to Adrian; or else he left that Government; For the Proconsuls were annual. Valf.

(g) Justin, in his 2d Apology, as 'tis now commonly written, p. 99. Val.

C H A P. IX.

The Rescript of Adrian, that we Christians should not be unjustly prosecuted.

TO Minutius Fundanus. I received a Letter, written to me, from that eminent Person Serenius Granianus, your Predecessor.

Adrian. 'for. Indeed, this business, as I judge, is not to be pass'd by undiscuss'd; lest both the Christians be molested, and also an occasion of doing mischief given to Sycophants. Wherefore, if the Men of your Province can by a due way of complaint openly charge the Christians with any accusation, and so do it, as that they appear and answer it before the Seat of Judicature; let them make it their business only to take such a course as this against them; but let them not use (a) tumultuous outcries and clamours. For 'tis most requisite, if any person prefers a complaint, that you should have the cognizance of the matter. If therefore any one does accuse them, and make out that they do any thing contrary to the Laws, do you give sentence according to the nature of the offence. But if it be certain, that any does frame an accusation merely out of a malicious detraction, do you determine according to the heinousness of the crime, and take care that due punishment be inflicted on him. And thus much concerning the Rescript of Adrian.

(a) He means the outcries, which the People were wont to make in the Theatres. The Christians to the Lyons! as Tertullian attests. Some.

times it is happened that the Proconsuls and Governours were forc'd to yield to their tumultuous Clamours, tho' unwilling to it of themselves. Wherefore the Emperor Adrian admonisheth Fundanus the Proconsul not to suffer himself to be induced by such requests to the persecution and slaughter of the Christians. It was an old custom in the Roman Empire, for the populace both in the City and in the Provinces, as oft as they met at the publick Shows, to ask of the Emperor, or Governor what they had a mind to, with loud outcries all at once. Instances hereof are frequent in the Writers of the Roman History. Valef.

CHAP. X.

Who in the Reign of Antoninus were Bishops of the Roman and Alexandrian Sees.

Antoninus Pius. BUT, Adrian having paid the dues of nature after he had reigned one and twenty years, Antoninus, surnam'd Pius, succeeded in the Roman Empire. In whose first year Telephorus departing this life in the eleventh year of his Presidency, Hyginus assumed the Episcopal Government of the Roman Church. Moreover, Irenæus relates that Telephorus ended his life with a glorious Martyrdom; manifesting in the same place, that in the times of the foresaid Hyginus Bishop of the Romans, flourish'd at Rome both Valentinus the Introducer of his own Heresie, and also Cerdo the Founder of the Error of the Marcionites; his words are these.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning those who were Arch-Heretics in those Times.

FOR Valentinus came to Rome when Hyginus was Bishop there: but he flourish'd in the Times of Pius, and continued to those of Anicetus. Cerdo also, who was Master to Marcion, flourish'd in the Times of Hyginus, who was the (a) ninth Bishop; he went into the Church, and openly confessing his error, so continued at Rome; sometimes teaching privately, other while again acknowledging his error; but being now and then reprehended for his impious Doctrine, he (b) withdrew himself from the Assembly of the Brethren. Thus far Irenæus, in his

(a) These Words of Irenæus are extant in his 3 B. chap. 4. where the old Translator seems to have read the eighth: Which reading is most agreeable to Irenæus, as appears from the 3 Chapt. of the same Book; where he reckoning up the Roman Bishops, counts Hyginus the 8th from the Apostles. But in the 1 B. of Irenæus chap. 28. it's written [the 9th] is also in Epiphanius, in Heret. Cerdon, and in the Epistle of Cyprian to Pompeius. Valef. (b) Irenæus does not say he was excommunicated; but that he separated himself from the Church; whence it appears, that Cerdo condemned himself, in his own judgment, and so prevented the sentence of the Church. Val.

Third Book against Heresies. Moreover, in his First Antoninus Pius. Book he again says this concerning Cerdo: 'But one Cerdo, deriving the original of his Errors from the Tenets of Simon, came to Rome in the times of Hyginus (who was the ninth that in the Episcopal Succession from the Apostles had that See) and taught, that that God, who was preach'd under the Law, and by the Prophets, is not the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ: for the one is known, the other unknown; the one is just, the other good. Marcion of Pontus, an impudent Blasphemer, succeeding him, did mightily propagate that Opinion.' But the same Irenæus, having founded the bottom of that immense depth of matter, full of various errors, which Valentinus had put together, does fully discover the secret and occult Deceit and Wickedness, that like a Serpent lurking in its hole, lies hid within him. Moreover, he says, there was at the same time another person (by name Mark) who was most expert at Magical Delusions; and further he declares their prophane Rites of Initiation, and their most detestable Mysteries in these very words: 'For some of them prepare a Nuptial-Bed, and perform a secret Ceremony by pronouncing some words over such as are to be initiated; and a Marriage, they say, thus made by them, is spiritual, and conformable to the Celestial Nuptials: But others of them bring [those that are to be initiated] to the Water, and dipping them, use this form of words, In the name of the unknown Father of all, In the name of the Mother of all, In Him who descended upon Jesus. Another sort of them pronounce Hebrew names, to put those that are to be initiated into the greater Consecration.' But Hyginus dying, (c) after he had been Bishop four years, Pius undertook the Government of the Roman Church. Moreover, at Alexandria Mark was chosen Pastor, Emmenus having far there thirteen years complete. Which Mark dying after he had presided there ten years, Celadion assumed the Government of the Alexandrian Church: And at Rome, Pius departing this life in the fifteenth annu year of his Presidency, Anicetus was preferred to that See. (f) The Maker of the Universe (e) to be the Father of Christ, and to affirm there is another greater Father of Christ are wanting in the common Editions of Iustine; and they seem to be superfluous. Marcion asserted, there were two Gods, the one the Creator, by whom this World was made; the other superior to him, who framed the better and more excellent things: This God, he said, we ought to confess, and to deny the other. This is the meaning of Iustine's Words; to whom agrees Epiphanius, in Heret. Marcion. Marcion held, that that most High God was the Father of Christ; and that Christ came down from Heaven to reprehend the other God the Maker of this World, whom he called the God of the Jews. than Antonus Plus. than he that made it : And all their Followers, as we said, are called Christians, after the same manner as the name of Philosophers, derived from Philosophy, is in common given to all that profess it, though they differ as to their Sects and Opinions. To this he adds further, saying, "We have compiled a Book against all the Heresies that ever were, which, if you be willing to read it, we will deliver to you." The same Justin, having wrote many elaborate Works against the Heathens, dedicated also some other Books, containing an Apology for our Faith, to the Emperor Antoninus, surnamed Pius, and to the Roman Senate ; for he dwelt at Rome : But in his Apology, he makes known himself, who and whence he was, in these words.

C H A P. XII.

Concerning Justin's Apology to Antoninus.

TO the Emperor Titus Aelius Hadrianus Antoninus Pius Cæsar Augustus, and to Venerissimus his Son the Philosopher, and to Lucius (by a) Nature Son of Cæsar the Philosopher, but by Adoption Son to Pius) the lover of Learning : To the Sacred Senate also, and People of Rome, I Justin the Son of Priscus, the Grand-child of Bacchius, who were of (b) Flavia Neapolis a City of Syria-Palestina, make my Request and (c) Petition in behalf of those Men (being my self one of them) who are unjustly hated and most injuriously treated by all Mankind." And the same Emperor being address'd to (by) other Brethren, Inhabitants of Asia, who were vexed with all manner of Molestations by the Men of their own Province, vouchsafed to send this Edict to the (d) Common-Council of Asia.

(a) Lucius was by Nature the Son of Aelius Verus Cæsar whom Adrian adopted. Hedyng. Adrian adopted Antoninus Pius, upon this condition, that Pius should adopt Marcus and Lucius ; as Spartianus and Capitolinus do declare. But others say, that Lucius was adopted by Marcus ; so Capitolinus in the life of Marcus. Wherefore in these words of Justin, can be no other Person meant by Cæsar the Philosopher, than Aelius Verus, whom Adrian adopted. For Justin says, that Lucius was by nature the Son of Cæsar the Philosopher, and the adoptive Son of Antoninus Pius. Now, it's evident, Lucius was Aelius Verus's own Son : Therefore by Cæsar the Philosopher must be meant Aelius Verus. But there are two things which seem to withstand this Exposition of this Passage. The first is, the surname of Philosopher is no way agreeable to Aelius Verus. Indeed, Aelius Verus (who was adopted by Adrian) was a learned Man, and studious, especially in Poetry, as Capitolinus says in his Life : But his Morals were in no wise agreeable to the study and profession of Philosophy. Then further, if Justin would here mean Aelius Verus, why does he not mention his name? For the Appellation of Cæsar the Philosopher, seems not sufficient to evidence him to be meant ; in as much as that Appellation might be common to Marcus also. We could easily clear our selves of these difficulties, by admitting the reading of the four MSS. Mez. Med. Fuk. and Savil. where this place is thus written [And to Lucius the Philosopher, by nature the Son of Cæsar] which reading Cajetan approves of, in his Notes on Spartianus. But we judge it not to be good. For it follows in Justin [the lover of Learning] where you see Marcus and Lucius have each their Epithetes : Marcus is termed [the Philosopher] and Lucius [the lover of Learning.] Valef.

(b) Neapolis, a City of Palestina, is called Flavia, because there was a Colony brought thither by Flavius Vespasianus. Before, it was called Sidon. Yet Pliny does not say there was a Colony there. Afterwards, the Emperor Severus deprived it of its privileges, and reduced it to a Village, because it favoured Niger's side. Valef.

(c) In the Original 'tis [ἡ δέξις] Rufinus translates it [postulatum, i. e. a Petition]. The Greek Word [ἐκσυγγενία] signifies, to go to the Emperor, and make a request to him ; which was most commonly done in Writing : There is extant a form of such a Petition (presented by Marcellinus the Presbyter to Theodosius Augustus) which Syrmundus published lately : It begins thus ; Deprecamus majestatem vestram ; i. e. We earnestly intreat your Graciousness, &c. Valef.

The Rescript of Antoninus to the Common Council of Asia, concerning our Religion.

THE Emperor Cæsar (a) Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Augustus Armenicus, Pontifex Maximianus, Tribune of the People XV. Consul III. to mislike the (b) Common [Council] of Asia, sendeth Grec- in attributing this Rescript to Antoninus Pius, when as it was M. Aurelius's (as appears by the Title) written in the first year of his Reign, when he was Consul III. See Onuphrii Fast. ad ann. Vrb. 914. The testimony of Melito (which Eusebius produces to confirm his opinion in this point) destroys it. For Melito, in his Apology, reckons up all the Rescripts of Antoninus Pius in favour of the Christians ; so viz, his Epistle to the Larissans, to the Thessalonians, to the Athenians, and to all the Grecians : Now if this Rescript to the Common Council of Asia had been Antoninus Pius's, doubtless Melito (being of the Province of Asia) would not have omitted it. For he could not be ignorant of it, since it was publish'd at Ephesus : And, when he had reckoned up the other Rescripts of Pius, why should he not make mention of this, which was written to the people of his own Province? Valef.

(b) Eusebius, i. e. Council, is to be understood. For the Asians had a Common Council of the whole Province, to which each City sent its Representatives ; as Arifides declares, in the 4. of his Orat. Sacr. And the same Author says there, that this Council met in the upper Phrygia, that is, at Apamea, or Synnada. Yet as it seems, they met in other Cities. There were, in the other Roman Provinces, such Councils as these. Valef.

(c) It should be your, i. e. your ; and are careless both of all other [religious per- as it is in formance,] and also of the worship of the Im- mortal God : And the Christians, who adore Apology, him, you are enraged at, and persecute even Valef.

(d) Although this Rescript be not Antoninus Pius's ; yet it's here produced in an opportune place. For in it is mention made of that Epistle which Antoninus Pius wrote to the Governors of Provinces, when they enquired of him what they should do with the Christians, Melito makes mention of this Epistle of Pius's ; whose words Eusebius quotes in chap. 26. of this 4. Book. Valef.

(e) To some Laws in the Codex Theodosianus, there is put [P. P.] which mark signifies that that Law of the Emperor was made Publick in such a City. For the Emperors, as oft as they would have any Edict be taken notice of and known to all, were wont to write with their own hand this word [Proponatur, i. e. Let it be publish'd.] Valef.

Antonicus (f) publick Assembly of Asia. Tharthese things were thus done, Melito Bishop of the Church at Sardis (who flourish'd in the same times) does evidently attest, by what he has said in his most useful Apology, which he made to the Emperor Verus, for our Religion.

Antonicus Pius. (f) That is, in the room or place where the Council met. It may also be taken for the Temple which the Province of Asia built in honour of Rome and Augustus. There is extant an old Coin of Claudius Augustus wherein there is a Temple to be seen with this Title [R. & A. U. G.] and this Inscription [COM. ASIÆ.] on both sides of the Temple. This Temple, I suppose, was at Ephesus, wherein all the Cities of Asia met to solemnize their Religious Rites for the prosperity of the Emperor and the Roman People: And this Temple was for the use of all Asia in common, being built at the publick charge. Valef.

Some Memoirs of Polycarp the Disciple of the Apostles.

AT this time, Anicetus presiding over the Roman Church, Irenæus relates that Polycarp (who till now survived) came to Rome and discoursed Anicetus about a Question that arose concerning Easter-Day. And the same Author delivers another Relation concerning Polycarp, (in his Third Book against Heresies) which I judg'd requisite to adjoin to what has been mention'd concerning him; it is thus: "And Polycarp, who was not only instructed by the Apostles and conversant with many that saw Christ, but also was by the Apostles ordained Bishop of the Church of Smyrna in Asia (whom we also saw in our younger days; for he lived to a great age, and being very ancient, ended his life by a glorious and most renowned Martyrdom) This Polycarp, I say, continually taught what he had learned of the Apostles, such Points as the Church now teacheth, and such only as are true: All the Churches throughout Asia do attest this, and also all those who to this day have been Successors to Polycarp; who doubtless is a Witness much more worthy to be credited, and gives a firmer assurance to the Truth, than either Valentinus or Marcion, or any other Authors of corrupt Opinions. This Polycarp coming to Rome in the Times of Anicetus, converted many of the foresaid Hereticks to the Church of God, declaring that he had received the one and only Truth from the Apostles, which was taught by the Church. And there are some yet surviving, who heard him relate, that John the Disciple of the Lord going into the Bath at Ephesus to wash himself; and seeing Cerintus in it, leapt out, having not bathed himself, but said, let us make haste away, lest the Bath fall, Cerintus that Enemy of the Truth being within it. This same Polycarp also, when Marcion on a time came into his presence and said to him, (a) Take acquaintance of us; return'd him answer, I take notice of thee to be the first begotten of the Devil. So exceedingly cautious were the Apostles and their Disciples, not to much as by speech to have any converse with such as were corrupters of the Truth; as Paul also said, * A Man that is an Heretick, after the

(a) In the Original the term is [ἐπιπροσέτις] which in this place is the same almost in signification with the word [Salutare, i. e. to salute]. For therefore would Marcion have had himself taken notice of, that he might be saluted. So, anciently in the Church, when the Faithful approach the Holy Table, the Deacon was wont to cry aloud often [ἐπιπροσέτις ἀλλήλους, i. e. acknowledge one another] to wit, let any prophane Person or Jew should come to the Sacrament. Valef. St. Paul uses this term [1 Cor. 16. 18.] where our Translation renders it [acknowledge.]

There is extant also of this Polycarp's a most incomparable Epistle, written to the Philippians; from which those who are desirous to be careful about their own Salvation, may learn the Character of his Faith, and the Publication of the Truth." Thus far Irenæus. But Polycarp, in his said Epistle to the Philippians, which is still extant, quotes some Authorities out of the First Epistle of Peter. Moreover Antonicus, surnamed Pius, having completed the two and twentieth year of his Reign, died, and was succeeded by M. Aurelius Verus (who also was named Antoninus, and was his Son) and his Brother Lucius.

C H A P. XV.

How, in the Reign of Verus, Polycarp, together with others, suffered Martyrdom in the City of Smyrna.

AT this time, when most fore Persecutions were stir'd up in Asia, Polycarp ended his Life by Martyrdom: [The Account of] whose Death (as it is yet extant in writing) we judg'd most requisite to be inserted into this our History. It is an Epistle, written from the Church over which he presided, to the Churches throughout (a) Pontus, which sets forth the Sufferings of Polycarp in these words: "The Church of God of [x] which is at Smyrna, to the Church at Philomelium, and to all the Congregations of Holy Ca-tholick Church everywhere, the Mercy, Peace, the readings, as I judge, should be [x] everywhere, i. e. everywhere; which is confirmed by the Inscription of the Epistle, which is thus, [x] everywhere, &c. i. e. everywhere, &c. Neither is there any mention of the Churches of Pontus in the title of this Epistle. For Philomelium is not a City of Pontus, but of Lycania, as Pliny says, or (as others) of Pisidia. For so in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, one Paul, a Philomelian, is named among the Bishops of Pisidia. Valef. In Robert Stephens Edit. it is [x] everywhere, i. e. everywhere. (b) This whole Epistle, concerning the Martyrdom of Polycarp, is put out by the Learned Bishop Usher. Our Eusebius does not insert the whole Epistle; the Learned Reader may see it entire in that Edit. of Bishop Usher.

with Scourges even as deep as their inmost Veins and Arteries; (insomuch that the hidden parts of their Bodies, and their Bowels were visible;) then laid upon the Shells of a sort of Sea-fish, and on some very sharp Heads of Darts and Javelins strew'd on the Ground, and undergoing all sorts of Punishments and Torments; and in fine, thrown to the Wild Beasts to be devour'd." But most especially they relate, that Germanicus (c) In Bi- was most signally courageous, who being (c) corroborated by Divine Grace, overcame that fear Edit. of of bodily Death implanted by Nature on the Mind of this Epistle of Man. For when the Proconsul, desirous by this place persequation to prevail upon him, proposed to rent from what this is. The Words there are these, [x] everywhere & everywhere Germanicus strengthened the imbecility of others by his great patience in undergoing the Tortures.

him his youthfulness, and earnestly entreated him that, being young and in the prime of his years, he would have some compassion on himself: He made no delay, but readily and courageously enticed the Wild Beast to devour himself, and almost forced and stimulated it, that he might the sooner be dismiss'd out of this unrighteous and wicked life. Immediately upon his glorious death, the whole Multitude, greatly admiring the Courageousness of the Divine Martyr, and the Fortitude of all the other Christians, on a sudden began to cry out, Destroy the Impious: Let Polycarp be fought after. Moreover, there following a great tumult upon these clamours, a Man, by name Quintus, by extract a Phrygian, lately come out thence, seeing the Wild Beast, and the other tortures they threatened to make use of, was daunted and dispirited, and at length gave way to a desire of saving his life. The Contents of the foresaid Epistle do manifest, that this Quintus (together with some others) ran with too much rashness, and without any religious consideration, to the place of Judicature; but being forthwith apprehended, he gave all Men a signal example, that none should be so audacious, as to precipitate themselves into such Dangers without a considerate and pious Circumspection. But thus far concerning these Men. Now the most admirable Polycarp, when he first heard these things, was not at all disturb'd, but continued to keep himself in a steadfast, serene, and unmoved temper of mind; and resolv'd with himself to continue in the City. But his Friends and those who were about him, beseeching and entreating him, that he would withdraw himself, he was prevailed with, and went out of the City to a Country-house not far distant therefrom; where he abode with a small company, spending the time day and night (being intent upon nothing else) in continued Prayers to the Lord; wherein he craved and made humble supplications and requests for the Peace of all the Churches throughout the World: For that was his constant and continual usage. Moreover, three days before his apprehension, being at prayer in the night-time, and falling into a sleep, he thought he saw the Pillow, whereon his Head lay, on a sudden consumed by a flame of fire. Whereupon being awaked out of his sleep, he forthwith expounded the Vision to those who were then present, and having little less than predicted what was in future to be, he expressly declared to those that were about him, that he should be burnt to death for [the testimony of] Christ. Further, when those that sought for him used their utmost care and diligence to find him out, he was again constrained through the love and affection of the Brethren to remove, as they say, to another Country-house: Whither his Pursuers soon after came, and catch'd up two Boys that were there; by the one of which, after they had scourged him, they were conducted to the House where Polycarp lodg'd; and coming in the Evening, they found him reposing himself in an upper Room: Whence he might easily have removed into another House, but he would not, saying, The Will of the Lord be done. Moreover, when he understood they were come, as that Epistle relates, he went down, and with a very cheerful and most mild countenance talk'd with the Men: inasmuch that they (to whom Polycarp was before unknown) thought they saw a wonder, when they beheld his exceeding great Age, and his venerable and grave (d) Behaviour: and they admired so much diligence should be used to apprehend such an old Man. M. Aurelius and L. Verus. But he, making no delay, presently order'd the Table to be spread for them; then he invites them to a sumptuous Feast, and requested of them one hours space, which he might without disturbance spend in prayer: When they permitted him that, he arose and pray'd, being so full of the Grace of the Lord, that those who were present and heard him pray were struck with admiration, and many of them alter'd their minds, and were now very sorry that so Venerable and Divine an old Man was forthwith to be put to death. Afterwards, the foresaid Epistle contains word for word this subsequent relation concerning him; 'But after he had ended his Prayer (wherein he made mention of all Persons who at any time had been (e) conversant with him, both small and great, noble and obscure; and also of the whole Catholic Church throughout the World) the hour of his departure being now come, they set him upon an Ass, and brought him to the City on the day of the (f) great Sabbath: Herald the (g) Eirenarch and his Father Nicetas met him; who taking him up into their Chariot, as they lay together, endeavoured to persuade him, and said,

*For what harm is it to say these words, Lord Caesar, and to sacrifice, and so to evade punishment? He at first made them no answer; but they continuing to be importunate with him, he said, I will never do what you endeavour to induce me to. They, despairing of persuading him, gave him opprobrious language, and thrust him out of their Chariot so hastily, that in his going down he very much bruised the fore-part of his Leg. But he, no more concern'd than if he had suffer'd no harm, went on cheerfully and made haste, being brought by [a Guard] to the † Stadium: but (there being so great a noise made in the Stadium that few could perfectly hear) this voice came from Heaven to Polycarp as he entered the Stadium, Be courageous, Polycarp, and behave thyself valiantly. No person indeed saw him that spoke, but many of us Christians heard the voice. When therefore he was brought before the Tribunal, a great shout was made, because the Multitude heard*

(e) In the Mat. and Ald. MSS. in stead of συμμεσθοντων, i. e. amicis hospitibus, &c. the reading is [συμμεσθοντων], i. e. which had been conversant and so Rufinus read this place, as appears from his Version: And the old Translator of this Epistle, put forth by Bishop Usher, is found to have read it so likewise. Valg. In Rob. Stephens Edit. it is συμμεσθοντων δωτων, i. e. which had bestowed to him.

(f) So it was called whenever the first day of the feast of unleavened Bread fell on the Sabbath-day. See Jo. 19. 31. & 7. 37. For that which among the Jews is † a feast, סבב † is the day of solemn assembly in any feast, (and such were the first day, and the last of the feast of Tabernacles; the first and seventh of the feast of unleavened Bread, and the day of Pentecost) is by the Jews, writing in Greek, called πασιμα ημερα, a great day. So the 72 render it, † 1. 13. where we read calling of assemblies. See Scalig. prol. de Emend. Temp. p. 6, & 7. Bishop Usher (in his Tract De anno Naccedon. chap. 3.) says, that the great Sabbath mentioned here, was that which immediately preceded Easter; the Learned Reader may see the Author and his Reason.

(g) It was the Office of this Magistrate to apprehend seditious Persons, and Disturbers of the publick Peace, and, having before sent their Indictments, to bring them to the places of Judicature: So says August. in his 140, and 159 Epist. Hence 'tis here said, that Herald, the Eirenarch of Smyrna, took up Polycarp into his Chariot, whom he had commanded to be found out and apprehended by his guards. These *Eirenarch*s were made of some of the Members of the Court of Judicature, as the 49th Law in the Code Theodos. does shew. At last Theodosius Junior wholly abolished that Office in the East: His Constitution is extant in the Code Theodos. They had under their Command Horse-men, and the Diognites, [i. e. pursuers], a sort of Soldiers, that were lightly armed, and so more expedite to pursue and take such as were Thieves. Valg.

† That was the place where their sacred Games and Shews were exhibited.

(b) This happened. After that, when he was come near Proconflus him, the (k) Proconflus ask'd him whether Statius Quadratus; for 'tis truly Printed in the old Latin translation of his Epistle, which the most learned Arch B. Usher published. This Man, as I judge, was the same Person with L. Statius Quadratus, who was Consul in the reign of Antoninus, anno urb. condit. 895. Arifides makes makes mention of this Proconful of Asia, in the first and fourth of his Sacred Orations: Where he also calls him a Rhetorician. I doubt not therefore but he was the same Man with Quadratus the Consul, who, as Philoftratus says, was the master of Varus Sapphila, who was wont to declaim extempore upon any subject given; and was a great Emulator of Favonius Sapphila. In what year he bore the Office of Proconful of Asia, Aristides indeed says not. But that, as it seems to me, may be made out from his Relation. For, in the 4 of his Orat. Sac. Aristides says, that a little after that Plague which rag'd in Asia, Severus was Proconful. Eusebius, in his Chronicon, places that Plague on the 8 year of M. Aurelius Antoninus. Therefore Severus was Proconful of Asia in the 9 of M. Aurelius. When he was Proconful, Aristides writes, that he received Letters out of Italy from the Emperors; to wit, from the senior Augustus and his Son; where by the name of Augustus he understands Marcius; and the Son of the Emperor is Commodus, who was then called Cæsar. Next before Severus, Pollio was Proconful, as Aristides attests in the same place; and immediately before Pollio, our Quadratus was the Proconful of Asia: For so says Aristides in the same Oration. So that Quadratus was Proconful of Asia in the 7 of Marcius's Empire. On which year also Eusebius, in his Chronicon, places the Martyrdom of Poly carp. They are in an Error therefore, who say the Martyrdom of Poly carp happened on the ninth of Marcius. For, whereas 'tis manifest from the attestation of Aristides, that Quadratus (under whom Poly carp suffered) bore the Proconfulat of Asia in the seventh year of Marcius, the death of Poly carp is necessarily to be placed on the same year. Valef.

Al. Aurelius and L. Verus. he were Poly carp; and when he had confessed he was, the Proconful endeavour'd to perswade him to renounce [Christ] saying, Have a reverent regard to thine Age (and some other words agreeable hereto, which 'tis usual for them to speak) swear by the Fortune of Cæsar, change thy mind, say, destroy the Impious: But Poly carp, beholding with a grave and severe countenance the Multitude that was in the Stadium, stretch'd forth his Hand towards them, and sigh'd, and looking up towards Heaven, said, destroy the Impious. When the Governour was urgent with him, and said, Swear and I will release thee, speak reproachfully of Christ; Poly carp made answer, I have served him these eighty and six years; during all which time he never did me injury; how then can I blaspheme my King, who is my Saviour? But when the Proconful was again instant with him, and said, Swear by the Fortune of Cæsar: Poly carp said, Because you are so vain-glorious as to be urgent with me to swear by the Fortune of Cæsar, (as you call it), pretending your self ignorant who I am; bear me plainly and freely making this Profession; I am a Christian: now if you are desirous to learn the Doctrine of Christianity, assign me a Day, and you shall hear it. The Proconful said, perswade the People: I have thought good (answer'd Poly carp) to give you an account; for we are taught to attribute due honour (such as is not prejudicial to our Profession) to Magistrates and Powers which are ordain'd of God; but I judge them unworthy of having an account given them of our Faith. The Proconful said, I have Wild Beasts, to whom I will cast thee, unless you alter your mind. Command them to be brought forth (said Poly carp) for our minds are not to be alter'd from better to worse; but we account that change good, which is from Vice to Virtuous Actions. He said again to him, since you condemn the Wild Beasts, I will give order that you be consumed by Fire, unless you change your mind. You threaten me (replied Poly carp) with Fire that burns for an hour, and soon after becomes extinct; but you are ignorant of that Fire of the future Judgment and eternal Punishment, which is reserv'd for the Impious; but why do you make delays? order (i) which you will to be made use of upon me. When he had spoken these and many other words, he was filled with confidence and joy, and his Countenance was replenish'd with a comely gracefulness: inasmuch that he was not only not overwhelmed with terror at what was said to him, but, on the contrary, the Proconful stood astonish'd; and sent the Cryer to make Proclamation thrice in the midst of the Stadium, Poly carp professeth himself to be a Christian: At which words utter'd by the Cryer, the whole Multitude both of Heathens and Jews who were Inhabitants of Smyrna, in a most furious rage and with a great noise cried out, This is the Teacher of Asia, The Father of the Christians, The Destroyer of our Gods, who gives command to many Men not to sacrifice, nor adore the Gods. Having said these words they cried out and requested Philip the (k) Affarch to let forth a Lion upon Poly carp. But he made answer, that that was not lawful for him to do, because the Amphitheatrical Shows, or the hunting of the Wild Beasts were concluded. Then they all cried out with a joynt consent, that Poly carp should be burnt alive. For it was necessary that the Vision which appeared to him upon his Pillow should be fulfilled; when, being at Prayer, he saw that burning, he turn'd to his Brethren that were with him, and said prophetically, I must be burnt alive. These things therefore were with no less celerity done than they had been spoken; the Multitude immediately brought together Wood and dried Branches of Trees out of their Shops, and from the Baths; but the Jews especially most readily (as it was their usage) assisted in this business. Now when the Pile of Wood for the Fire was made ready, Poly carp, having unloathed himself, and unloos'd his Girdle, endeavour'd also to put off his own Shoes; a thing which before he never committid. because every one of the Faithful continu'd ally strove who should soonest touch his Skin: so that For he was always revered for his godly course of life, even before he came to be gray-headed, presently therefore all the (l) Instru-

is, the common Priesthood of Asia; and those who executed this sacerdotal Office (which consisted in the managing their publick Sports or Spectacles) were termed Affarchs. These Affarchs were elected after this manner: Each City of Asia, at the beginning of every year (that is, about the Autumnal Equinox) had a publick meeting, wherein they appointed one of their own Citizens to be an Affarch; then they sent Deputies to the Common-Council of the Province, who declared to them his name whom they had made choice of at home: After which the Common-Council chose about ten to be Affarchs, out of the number of all those, whom each City had elected to that Office. See Aristides, in Orat. Sac. art. 24. Now the difficulty is, whether all these, who were elected by the Common-Council, executed this Office all together, or whether only one of them was Affarch; *Valef*us thinks there was but one Affarch; his reasons are these: Though more than one were elected by the Senate of Asia, yet that perhaps was done that out of them the Roman Proconful might choose one, as he usually did in the Election of the Treacher: Again, the Senate might elect more than one, because if the first that was chosen Affarch should die, before he had ended his year, there might be another to supply his place: Lastly, that there was but one Affarch every year, is apparent from the Words at the latter end of this Epistle (which Eusebius leaves out in his quotation, but the Learned Reader may see them in Arch-Bishop Usher's Edit. of it) where 'tis said, Poly carp suffer'd under Philip the Affarch, and Statius Quadratus Proconful of Asia. This is the opinion of *Valef*us, and these are his Reasons for it. On the other side, the incomparably learned Usher affirms, that there were more Affarchs than one at the same time; which he collects from Acts 19. 31. with whom agrees the learned Dr. Hammond in his Paraphrase and Notes on that Text, and also Mr. Jo. Gregory of Oxford, pag. 49. of his Works, Edit. Lond. 1665. This Office (says *Valef*us) was very chargeable, therefore the richest Persons were elected to it. Hence 'tis that Strabo affirms, that the Affarchs were commonly chosen out of Tralis, the Citizens whereof were the wealthiest of all Asia.

ments prepared for the fiery Pile were applied to, and put about him; but when they went about to nail him to the Stake, he said, Let me be as I am; for he that gives me strength to endure the Fire, will also grant that I shall continue within the Pile unmoved and undisturbed by reason of my pain, even without your securing me with Nails: So they did not make him fast to the Stake with Nails, but only bound him to it. He therefore, having put his Hands behind him, and being bound, (as it were a select Ram, pick'd out of a great Flock, to be offer'd as an acceptable Holocaust to Almighty God) said; Thou Father of thy well-beloved and blessed Son Jesus Christ; through whom we have received the knowledge of thee! Thou God of Angels and Powers, and of the whole Creation, and of all the Generation of the Just who live in thy presence! I bless thee because thou hast vouchsafed to bring me to this Day and this Hour, wherein I may take my portion among the number of the Martyrs, and of the Cup of Christ, in order to the Resurrection both of Soul and Body to Eterial Life, in the Incorruption of the Holy Spirit; among whom let me (I beseech thee) be this day accepted in thy sight, as it were a Sacrifice fat and well-pleasing to thee, according as thou hast prepared, foreseen, and fulfilled, thou God of Truth who canst not Lye: Wherefore also I praise thee for all these things; I bless thee, I glorifie thee, through the Eternal High-Priest Jesus Christ thy Well-beloved Son, through whom to Thee, together with him, in the Holy Ghost be glory both now and others what then hapned) saw a wonderful sight. For the Fire, composing it self into the form of an Arch or Half-circle (like the Sail of a Ship swell'd with the Wind) immured within a holly space the Body of the Martyr; which, being in the middle of it, look'd not like burnt Flesh, but like Gold, or Silver refined in a Furnace; and forthwith we smelt a most fragrant Scent, as if it had been the smell of Frankincense, or of some other of the precious sweet-scented Spices. In fine therefore, when those impious Wretches saw the Body could not be consumed by the Fire, they commanded

(m) From this passage I conjecture, that Polycarp said this foregoing Prayer of his with a low voice; but pronounced Amen aloud. That this of old was the custom of the Christians (that is, loudly to recound the Amen at the end of the Prayer) the rite now observed in the Church does demonstrate, to wit, that after each Prayer repeated by the Priest, all the People do with a loud voice answer, Amen. Valef.

(n) This Officer's charge was (not to fight with the wild Beasts, as the Bestiarii did, but) to dispatch them, if at any time they were enraged, and like to endanger the Spectators, as sometimes it hapned. They were also called Lancarii. Valef.

in that there was so great a difference shew'd between the Infidels and the Elect: Of which number this most admirable person was one, who was the Apostolick and Prophetical Doctor of our Age, and Bishop of the Catholick Church at Smyrna. For every word which proceeded out of his mouth, either hath been, or shall be fulfilled. But the envious and malevolent Devil, that deadly Enemy to the Generation of the Just, understanding the courageousness of his Martyrdom, and his unblameable Conversation even from his youth, and [perceiving] that he was now encircled in a Crown of Immortality, and had most undoubtedly obtained the glorious Reward of his Victory; the Devil, I say, used his utmost diligence that his Body should not be born away by us Christians, altho' many of us were desirous to do it; and to have (e) been conversant with his sacred dead Body. Some therefore suggested to Nicetas the Father of Herod, but the Brother of (p) Dalcis; to address to the Governour, that he would not give us his Body; lest (as they said) they leave him that was crucified, and begin to worship this Person: And this they spoke upon account of the Sugession and Importunity of the Jews, who very diligently watch'd us when we were about to take his Body out of the Fire: but they were ignorant, that we could never at any time relinquish Christ (who suffer'd for the salvation of all those throughout the World who were to be saved) nor yet worship any other. For we adore him as being the Son of God; but we have a worthy affection for the Martyrs (as being the Disciples and Followers of the Lord) because of their most exceeding great love shewn to their own King and Master; whose (q) Companions and Fellow-Disciples we wish our selves to be. The Centurion therefore perceiving the contentious obstinacy of the Jews, caused the Body to be brought forth, and (as 'tis customary with them) burnt it; and so we at length gather'd up his Bones, more highly to be prized than the most precious Gems, and more refined than the purest Gold, and deposited them in a decent place of burial: whereto being assembled together, the Lord grant we may with joy and gladness celebrate the (r) Birth-day of his Martyrdom, both in memory of those who have heretofore undergone and been victorious in this glorious conflict, and also for the instruction and preparation of such as hereafter shall be exercised therein. Thus much concerning the Blessed Polycarp, who together with (s) twelve Philadelphians was crown'd with Martyrdom at Smyrna: who alone is so eminently famous and memorable amongst all Men, that (and trust) even the Hearthens every-where do make mention of him. (t) Such was the glorious Exit of Usher's Edit. dit. thus

(e) This the Phrase in the Original is this [συναίσιον τοῦ ἀπὸν ἀντὶ σκεπτικῆ] συναίσιον [says Eusebius] of μετὰ τὸν θάνατον, ἢ μετὰ τὸν ἀποθανόντα πρὸς ἀλλήλους συνίσιον, i. e. They are said to communicate, who distribute to one another, and they that partake and receive from one another, whether friendship, or knowledge. Whence it appears that the word [συναίσιον] is applicable to friendship or society, which the Primitive Christians express'd to the Martyrs, &c. departed, when, meeting yearly at the place where their Sacred Reliques were interred, they celebrated the Anniversary Day of their Martyrdom: Thus they maintained a friendship or society (as it were) with the departed Martyr. The following Words of this Epistle do declare the resolution of the Church of Smyrna about the Celebration of the Day of Polycarp's Martyrdom, after this manner, and also the reason of that their so doing.

(p) Or, Alas, for so it is in Bishop Usher's Edit. Valef.

(q) In the learned Usher's Edit. 'tis συναίσιον [that is, Companions; from the verb [συναίσιον] us'd here in the same sense, as we said (note o.) it is sometimes taken to signify,

(r) Ἡμετέραν ἡμετέραν is the original phrase: So the primitive Christians called the days whereon the Martyrs suffered, because at their deaths they were born Sons (as it were) and Heirs of the Kingdom of Glory.

[who together with those of Philadelphia was the twelfth that suffered Martyrdom in Smyrna.] So that those Martyrs of Philadelphia were not twelve in number, but eleven only; and Polycarp was the twelfth. Valef.

(s) Eusebius purposely omitted the conclusion of this Letter, as being unbecomingly to his present design; and because he had inserted the entire Epistle into another Work of his, to wit, into his Book concerning the Sufferings of the Primitive Martyrs: The Learned Reader may see this whole Letter (as before we intimated) put forth by Arch B. Usher, from the conclusion whereof he may observe, (1.) that this Epistle was not written immediately after Polycarp's Martyrdom, but that there was some distance of time between that and the Writing thereof: For the Philomelan, Philometian, hearing a report of the suffering of Polycarp, sent Letters to the Church of Smyna, desiring an account of all Particulars that happened at the suffering of this B. Martyr: Which chose of Smyna willingly undertook, and wrote them this Letter, most part whereof of Eusebius quotes in this Chapter. (a) That Polycarp's Martyrdom is there called Evangelical; and the reason is given, to wit, because Polycarp fled from those who pursued him, (agreeable to the example of our Saviour.) Lastly, 'tis observable therefrom, that Polycarp was Martyr'd the second day of the month Xanthicus, that is, the 7th of the Calendar, of March. Valef. But Arch B. Usher differs (in this particular, that is, concerning the day of Polycarp's Martyrdom) from Valefius, as the Learned Reader may see in his Notes on that Epist. and in his Traſt De Anno Solar. Maced. & Afian.

M. Aurelius and the Admirable and Apostolick Polycarp, whose Story the Brethren of the Church in Smyna have in the fore-cited Epistle recorded: And to the same Writing concerning him are annex'd other Martyrdoms undergone at the same City of Smyna, and at the (u) same Period of Time wherein Polycarp suffer'd. Amongst which number Metrodorus, supposed to be a Presbyter of the Sect of the Marconites, was burnt to death. But the most famous and eminent Martyr of those Times was one Plinius: whose particular Professions, boldness and freeness in speaking, Apologies and most learned Orations in defence of the Faith, made both before the People and in the presence of the Governours; and moreover his affectionate Invitations and Encouragements to those who in time of Persecution fell into temptation, and the consolatory Speeches he us'd to such Brethren as made him Visits during his Imprisonment; and further than all this, the Torments, and besides them the exquisite Tortures he endur'd, his being nailed to the Snake, and his Fortitude amidst the fiery Pile, and lastly his Death which was subsequent to all these miraculous Sufferings; whosoever are desirous to know all these Particulars, we remit them to the Epistle (which contains a most ample account concerning him) which we have inserted into that Collection we made of the Sufferings of the Primitive Martyrs. Moreover, there are extant the Acts and Monuments of others who suffered Martyrdom at Pergamus, a City of Asia, to wit, of Carpus and Papulus, and of a Woman named Agathonica, who after many and most eminent Confessions of our Faith, were made perfect by a glorious Death.

C H A P. XVI.

How Justin the Philosopher, asserting the Christian Religion at the City of Rome, suffered Martyrdom.

AT the same time also Justin, of whom we made mention a little before, having presented (a) a second Apology to the aforesaid Emperors in defence of our Faith, was crowned with Divine Martyrdom. Crescens the Philosopher (whose Life and Manners were answerable to the appellation of a Cynick; of which Philosophical Sect he was a Follower) form'd and contriv'd the treacherous Plot against him; because Justin confuted him often in several Disputes had in the presence of many Auditors, at length by his own Martyrdom he obtain'd the reward of that Truth he was an Assertor of. Thus much this most famous Follower of the Truth (perceiving beforehand what was about to befall him) does, in his fore-said Apology, expressly predict in these famous words; (b) And I also my self do expect to be treacherously betray'd by some one of those called [Philosophers] and (c) put in the Stocks; M. Aurelius and perhaps by Crescens that illiterate Fellow, and one who is a lover of vain-glorious boasting: L. Verus. For the Man is unworthy the name of a Philosopher, because he declares in publick such things as he is altogether ignorant of, and affirms the Christians to be impious and irreligious Persons, merely to please and delight the Multitude; (d) committing herein a great error: For, in that he inveighs against us, having never read the Doctrine of Christ, he is abominably wicked, and much worse than the vulgar sort of Men, who most frequently are cautious in their discourses concerning those things they are ignorant in, and avoid speaking falsely thereof. But if he has read our Doctrine, and understands not the majestic Sublimity thereof; or if he understands it, and behaves himself thus because he would not be suspected [to be a Christian:] then he is far more base and wicked, in that he makes himself the Slave of popular Applause and irrational Fear: For I would have you to know that when I propos'd to, and ask'd him some such questions as these, I perceived and was convinced he indeed understood nothing at all: And that you may know I speak what is true, I am ready (if those our Disputations have not come to your knowledge) to propose the Queries again even in your presence. And this Exercise will by no means be becoming your Imperial Majesty. But if both my Questions, and also his Answers have been made known to you, then it will be apparently manifest to you that he is altogether ignorant of our Religion: But if he understands it, but dares not freely declare himself because of his Auditors; he is no Philosopher, (as I said before,) but is manifestly evidenced to be an affecter of popular applause, and has no esteem for that most excellent (e) saying of Socrates [to wit, That no man is to be preferred before the truth.] Thus far therefore Justin. And, that he was put to death (according to his own Prediction) by a treacherous Plot, of which Crescens was the framer, Tatianus (a man who in the former part of his life had been a (f) Teacher of Rhetorick, was well-learn'd in the Grecian Learning, and obtain'd no small repute by his being conversant therein; who in the original has left his Works many Monuments of his signal Ingenuity) does relate in the (g) Book he wrote which sometimes taken in that signification Eusebius here uses it in; yet by other Writers (and particularly by Tatianus in his Book here quoted by Eusebius, about the end of it) it is used in such a sense, as to comprehend all the Learning of the Grecians, and the liberal Sciences. Valef. (h) This Work of Tatianus is extant at the latter end of Justin Martyr's Works, Edit. Paris. 1636. It is there call'd Tatiani Agrippina contra Grecos oratio. This passage here quoted by Eusebius, occurs p. 157. 158. where the Translator renders these words [ἡμεῖς δὲ καὶ ἐν Μεγαλόπολιν] But we, following Valefius, have translated it thus [in the great City, i. e. Rome.]

against the Grecians in these words: 'And the most admirable Justin said truly, that the fore-said Persons were like Thieves.' Then, interposing some words concerning these Philosophers, he adjoins thus much; 'Indeed Crescens, who had made his Nest in the great City [Rome,] was most notorious for the Sin of Bugging Boys, and above all Men most addicted to Covetousness; and he who exhorted all Men to despise Death, did so mightily dread it himself, that he made it his business to procure Justin to be put to death, (as judging that to be the worst of Evils) because he preach'd the Truth, and manifestly proved, that the Philosophers were Gluttons and Deceivers. And this indeed was the true cause of Justin's Martyrdom.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning those Martyrs, whom Justin makes mention of in his Apology.

THE same Justin, before his own Martyrdom does in his (a) first Apology make mention of some others who suffer'd as Martyrs before him: Which words of his, because they are accommodate to our Subject, I will here recite: He writes thus; 'A certain Woman had a Husband who led a lascivious and libidinous course of life; the herself also had formerly been addicted to lightness and dishonest behaviour; but after she had been acquainted with the Doctrine of Christ, she became modest and chaste, and made it her business to persuade her Husband to live in like manner continently and chastly; adverting him of the Christian Precepts, and declaring to him the future punishment in eternal Flames prepared for such as lead an obscene and disorderly course of life. But he persevering in his wonted Lasciviousness, by such his doings, alienated his Wife's Affection from him.

(a) It should be in his second Apology, &c. as the learned Peravius has conjectured (in his Notes on Hierol. 46. Epiph.) For Eusebius does not recount the Apologies of Justin in the same order elsewhere in they are now Printed. For that which in the ordinary Editions is termed the second, and is dedicated to Antoninus Pius, Eusebius calls the first, as appears from Chap. 12. Book 2. and from Chap. 12. and 18. Book 4. And that, which in the vulgar Editions is said to be his first Apology, is dedicated to the Senate, Justin calls the second, (see Chap. 16. of this Book,) and says (Chap. 16. and 18 of this 4. Book,) it was presented to M. Aurelius Antoninus, after the death of Pius. As to the order of Justin's Apologies I agree with Eusebius, and do grant that to be the latter which in the vulgar Editions, is inscribed to the Senate. But whereas Eusebius says, Justin's former Apology was presented to M. Aurelius Antoninus; I cannot assent to him. For, in the beginning of that Apology Justin says, That the Woman (which was a Christian) being accused by her Husband, presented a Petition to the Emperor [and she presented a Libel to thee, O Emperor:] (See these Words in this Chapter.) Now if that Apology had been presented to the Successors of Antoninus Pius, as Eusebius thinks it was, doubtless Justin would have used the plural number, and said [To you, O Emperors:] For Marcus and Pius were both Emperors together. Again, Justin says, that one Lucius, seeing Ptolemaeus a Christian had away to be put to death, used these Words to the Judge, [These judicious Proceedings are misbecoming both Pius the Emperor, and the Son of Caesar the Philosopher, &c.] (in Chap. 32. of this 4th Book, the reading is better, thus, [And the Philosopher] which is confirmed by our MSS.) Who therefore sees not, that Antoninus Pius is meant in these Words? For his surname [Pius] evidently shews so much; and [the Philosopher the Son of the Emperor] manifestly confirms this our Opinion. Lastly, Urbicus the Prefect (See Note d. in this Chap.) whom Justin there mentions, lived in the times of Antoninus Pius. For he was that Lollius Urbicus, who, being the Emperor's Deputy, appeased the Rebellion of the Britains, as Capitolinus relates in the Life of Antoninus. Apuleius (in the beginning of his Apology) affirms that this Lollius Urbicus was Prefect of the City in the Reign of Pius. These are the reasons by which I am induced to affirm, that the latter Apology of Justin was not presented to M. Aurelius, but to Antoninus Pius: Under which Emperor he suffer'd Martyrdom, and not under Marcus Aurelius, as Eusebius here places his Martyrdom: But, in his Chronicon (whom Georg. Syncellus also follows) he seems to place it in the Reign of Antoninus Pius; and so does Mith. Glycas, in Anad. Valer. Mr. Tho. Lydiate, in his Eminent. Tepp. says Justin suffered under this Emperor Antoninus Pius.

For the Woman at last judg'd a wicked thing for her to co-habit with a Husband who wholly practis'd all manner of lustful courses, contrary to the Law of Nature, and disagreeable to Justice and Honesty; and therefore she resolved to be divorced from him. But the Woman was obedient to the Instructions of her Friends, who advised her to continue married a while longer, in expectation that her Husband would in future alter his mind, and ere long lead a more regular course of life; so the constrain'd her self and continued with him. But after this her Husband, having made a journey to Alexandria, was discover'd to have committed more notorious acts of lewdness: The Woman therefore (fearing, that by her continuing married to him, and by her being his Consort at bed and board, she should be partaker of his Wickednesses and Impieties) sent him that which we call a Bill of Divorce, and departed from him. But this excellent Fellow her Husband (who ought to have rejoiced, because his Wife (who formerly had committed lewdness with Servants and mercenary Fellows, and took delight in Drunkenness and all manner of Vice) did now both desist from those wicked doings, and also desired him to leave them off; which because he would not do she was divorc'd from him) drew up an Accusation against her, and said she was a Christian. And the presented a (b) Libel to thee, O Emperor; wherein she requested liberty might be allow'd her first to set in order her Domestic affairs; after which settlement she promised to put in an answer to her accusation. And you granted the Woman's petitions: but her (heretofore) Husband, being within that space (c) unable to say any thing against her, set upon one Ptolemaeus (whom (d) Urbicus put to death) who had been the Woman's Instructor in the Christian Religion, after this manner: He persuaded a Centurion, who was his Friend, to apprehend Ptolemaeus, and having put him in Bonds, to ask him this one question, Whether he were a Christian? And Ptolemaeus, (being a lover of Truth, and no deceitful Person, nor Falstifier of his own Judgment) confessing that he was a Christian, the Centurion caus'd him to be bound in Fetters, and afflicted him with a long imprisonment. At length, when the Man was brought before Urbicus, he was again ask'd this one question, Whether he were a Christian? And he, assuredly knowing that he should obtain Glory and Happiness by the Doctrine of Christ, again made profession of that Divine and Virtuous Institution. For he that denies himself to be a Christian, declines the Confession of that Religion, either because he is a disavowal as a denier of it, or in regard he knows himself to be unworthy of, and estranged from its Rules and Precepts; neither of which can happen to him that is a true Christian. When therefore Urbicus had given command that Ptolemaeus should be led away to be put to death, one Lucius, (who also was a Christian,) considering the injustice of the Sentence that was pronounced, spake thus to Urbicius; what reason is there that thou shouldst have condemn'd this Man, who is neither Adulterer, nor Fornicator, nor Murderer, nor Thief, nor Robber, and who is not in any wife convicted of any other wicked fact, but only owns and acknowledges the appellation of a Christian? Such Judiciary Proceedings as these, O Urbicius! are misbecoming both Pius the Emperor, and the Son of Cæsar the Philosopher, and also the Sacred Senate. But Urbicius made Lucius no other answer, only said thus to him: You also seem to me to be such an one, and when Lucius had said that he was, Urbicius again gave command that he also should be led away to be put to death. Lucius acknowledg'd himself much obliged to him; for I shall be deliver'd, said he, from such wicked Masters, and go to a gracious God, who is my Father and King. And a third, stepping forth, was also condemn'd to undergo the same Punishment. After this, Justin does pertinently and agreeably introduce those words (which we quoted before) saying, 'And I also my self do expect to be treacherously betray'd by some one of those called Philosophers,' and fo forth.

(c) To wit, which was prefix'd by the Emperor; who had granted the Woman's Petition, in regard it was reasonable and just. Valer.
(d) This Urbicus was Prefect of the City; whose sentence, pronounced against the two Christians Ptolemaeus and Lucius, was the occasion of Justin's writing this Apology. He was called Q. Lollius Urbicus, as an old Inscription at Rome attests. See Apuleius, in defens. sua! Yet, 'tis strange that in all our Copies he is written Urbicus. In Justin he is now and then rightly called Urbicus, to wit, in the beginning of his Apology, and a little after that. Valer.

(a) Or, mind; as it is in the King's MS. Valerius In Robert Stephens Edit. t. i. c. 1. c. understanding.

THIS person has left us many Monuments of his learn'd and most accomplish'd (a) understanding, and also of his sedulous diligence about Divine matters, full of variety of profit; to which we will remit such as are lovers of learning, after we have usefully remark'd such of them as are come to our knowledge. The first therefore of his Books is his Supplication to Antoninus surnamed Pius, and his Sons, and to the Roman Senate, in behalf of our Religion; the second contains another Apology for our Faith, which he presented to Verus (who was Successor to, and bore the same name with, the foresaid Emperor Antoninus) whose times we are now giving an account of. There is also another Book of his against the Gentiles; wherein he treats at large, both of many Questions that are usually disputed both amongst us and the Gentile-Philosophers; and also declares his Opinion concerning the Nature of Spirits; which 'tis of no importance for us here to insert. And further there is another Work of his against the Gentiles come to our hands, which he entitles, A Confutation; and besides these another, concerning the Monarchy of God; which he confirms not only by the Authority of the Sacred Scriptures, but also from the Testimonies of the Writers amongst the Gentiles. Moreover, he wrote another Book, the Title whereof is Palæstina; and another, containing (b) some short Notes concerning the Soul; wherein he propoſeth divers Questions pertinent to the Explication of that Subject, and produces the Opinions of the Philosophers amongst the Gentiles, which he promiſeth to con-

The ancient Gracianus called [Scholia] some short Notes; and distinguish'd them from Exegetics: For Exegetics were long and large Expositions, and explain'd the whole Work of a Writer: But Scholia were put to explain particular Words, or to expound one Sentence. Sometimes Scholia are called short Expositions of more obscure Words and Sentences. Such were Cyrill's Scholia concerning the Incarnation of the only-begotten Son of God, which are now extant, and are nothing else but some short Expositions of the more obscure Questions concerning the Incarnation. And of this sort was Justin's Book of the Soul; to wit, some Questions and Opinions, concerning the nature and origine of Souls; to which were added Justin's Exposition and Demonstration thereof. Jerom calls them Excerptia, which Origen termed σέλα. Valer.

and to set forth his own Opinion thereof in another Work of his. He also compos'd a Dialogue against the Jews, being a Conference which he had at the City of Ephesus with one Trypho the most famous person amongst the Jews at that time. In which Book he manifests, after what manner Divine Grace incited him to embrace the Doctrine of the true Faith; and with what sedulous earnestness he before that set himself about the study of Philosophy, altho' with how great arduousness of mind he was laborious in finding out the truth. Moreover, in the same Book he relates concerning the Jews, how that they formed treacherous Plots and Contrivances against the Doctrine of Christ; and useth these express words to Trypho: 'So far were you from a Repentance of your impious Doings, that you chose out some Men fit for such a design, and at that time sent them forth from Jerusalem over the whole World, to publish this, that there was an impious Sect called Christians sprung up; and to divulge the same reproaches, which all those that are ignorant of our Religion do now fasten upon us; so that, you are not only the Authors of your own Wickedness and Error, but also give the sole occasion thereof to all other Men.' He says also, in the same Work, that the Gifts of Prophecy even in his time shone forth upon the Church. Moreover he has mentioned the Revelation of John, and says expressly it was written by that Apostle. Also he recites several Testimonies of the Prophets, which in his Dispute with Trypho he evinces were cut out of the Bible by the Jews. Several other Works also of his are extant amongst many of our Christian Brethren. Further, the Books of this person were so highly esteemed by the Ancients, that Irenæus quotes some Expressions of his; partly in his fourth Book against Heresies, where he produces these words of his: And Justin says well, in his Book against Marcion, I would not have credited the Lord himself, if he had preached any other God than him, who was the Maker of the World; and partly, in his fifth Book of the same Work, where he quotes these words of his: It was well spoken of Justin, to wit, that before the coming of our Lord, Satan never durst blaspheme God, because till then he did not certainly (c) know his own Condemnation. And let thus much be here necessarily said by us, to incite such as are lovers of Learning, to have an high esteem for the same and accurately to read over, his Books. Thus opinion.

In his Panarium (lib. 1. Heref. 39. pag. 289. Edit. Petav.) he proposeth to us, as a certain Truth, that the Devil, before the coming of Christ, — ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἔδειξε αὐτῷ τὸ ἐλθεῖν, καὶ ἐλπίσκειν ἐν ὁπῶς χάρις καὶ ἄφεσις; and that out of this persuasion of his, he never all that while heid himself refractory towards God; but that having understood by the manifestation of our Saviour, that there was left him no hopes of Salvation, he from thenceforth had grown exceedingly enraged, doing as much mischief as possibly he could against Christ, and his Church. But this opinion (as the learned Petavius has observed in his Note on that passage) Fulgens non probatur, i. e. is not generally approved of, as true.

Who then govern'd the Church of Antioch.

AT that time also Theophilus, the sixth from the Apostles, flourish'd in his Presidency over the Church at Antioch: For Cornelius, Successor to Heros, was the fourth that presided there; after whom Eros, in the fifth remove from the Apostles, succeeded in that Episcopal See.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning the Ecclesiastical Writers who flourish'd in that Age.

IN those times Hegesippus flourish'd in the Church, of whom we have made frequent mention in the foregoing Book; and Dionysius Bishop of the Corinthians; also one Pinytus Bishop of the Cretians. Moreover, Philippus, Apollinarius, and Melito; Musianus also, and Modestus, and lastly Irenaeus. All which Persons wrote Books that are come to our hands, containing the sound Doctrine and true Faith, delivered by the Apostles.

CHAPTER XXII.

Moreover, Hegesippus, in his five Books of Historical Memorials, which are come to our hands, has left a most full and compleat account of his own Faith and Opinion. Wherein he declareth, that travelling as far as Rome, he discoursed with many Bishops, and from them all heard one and the same Doctrine. You may please to hear him ( a ) after some words of his concerning the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians ) continuing his discourse thus : ‘ And the Corinthian Church continued in the true Faith until Primus came to be Bishop there ; with whom I had some discourse in my Voyage to Rome, and was conversant with the Corinthians a sufficient time ; wherein we received mutual refreshment from the true Faith. But arriving at Rome, I ( b ) stay’d there till Anicetus’s time, whose Deacon Eleutherius then was : After Anicetus succeeded Soter, and next to him Eleutherius. Now in every Succession [of Bishops] and throughout each City the Doctrine is conformable to what the Law, the Prophets, and our Lord preach’d.” And the same Author subjoyns an account of the Heresies which were broach’d in his Age, in these words : ‘ And after James the Just had suffer’d Martyrdom (as the Lord had also) for the Preaching of his Doctrine, Simoon the Son of Cleophas ( which [ Cleophas ] was Uncle by the Mother’s side to our Saviour ) was constituted Bishop in his room ; whom all preferr’d to be second Bishop there, because he was the Lord’s ( c ) Cousin-German by the Mother’s side. Upon whether the Learned Knight created this passage from his own or by the authority of some Manuscript, it is to ascertain this Ennodius is very necessary. Eusebius quotes the passage of Hegesippus in chap. 11. of this Book; between which and this here there seems to be some disagreement. For Euse- bius is there, that Hegesippus came to Rome in the times of A- ndreas and staid there till Eletutherius was promoted to that See.

Hegesippus himself does not say so here, only, that he staid until Anicetus was Bishop there. Therefore Hegesippus came out the latter end of Pius's Reign. Vale!

Advers. Luciferian*. But Statius (in Elencho tribueri.) and Origen (Book 1. against Celfus) affirm he lived since our Saviour's incarnation, and was co-temporary with Simon Magus. See Photic Bibliotheca, cap. 23o. Valef.

pinion. From these came the False Christs, the False Prophets, and the False Apostles; who rent asunder the Unity of the Church by their corrupt Opinions brought in against God, and his Christ." Moreover, the same Writer gives an account of the Heresies which were heretofore amongst the Jews, in these words: 'There were divers Sects and Opinions in the Circumcision among the Children of Israel, which were opposite both to the (b) Tribe of Judah, and also to Christ; to wit, the (i) Essaens, the (k) Galileans, the Hamorobaptists, the (l) Maibothaens, Hegzippus the Samarites, the Sadducees, and the Pharisees.' (h) By this passage seems to have
And he writes many other things, of which we thought have partly made mention before, and inserted the Tribe in his Relations in their proper and opportune places and times. Also, he produces several Passages out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews; out of the Syriac [Gospel,] and particularly out of the Hebrew Tongue; whereby he plainly intimates himself to have been converted from being a Jew to the Faith of Christ. He makes mention also of other things as contain'd in the un-and Pharisees, &c. But this is very improvable. Hegzippus said it only in favour of that Tribe, from whence Christ sprang. Valef.

(i) These were the seven Sects amongst the Jews; of which Hegesippus makes frequent mention, as may be seen from some quotations out of him, which occur in the foregoing Books. Iustin (in disputat. advers. Triplicem). Heriffs, Galileans, Helienians, Pharisees, and Baptists. Epiphanius terms them, Scribes, Pharisees, Sadducees, Essens, Nazareans, Hemerobaptists, and Herodians. Valef.

(h) Yuda Galileen was the original Author of this Sed, (says Josephus Antiq. B. 18. chap. 2.) who having joyned Sadduck, a Pharisee, to him, solicited the People to defection, telling them, that God was their only Prince and Master, and no Mortal to acknowledge such; that the requiring a Tax from them, if it were by them paid, was a manifest profession of servitude, and that 'twas their duty to vindicate their Liberty; by which means he raised a great Sedition among the Jews, and was the cause (under pretence of defending the Publick Liberty) of innumerable mischiefes to the Nations. See Joseph. Antiq. B. 18. chap. 2.

(1) They are called also Marboreans and Morboreans; they must be distinguished from those whom Hegesippus mentions a little before; for these here were one of the seven Sects amongst the Jews; but those were propagated from the seven Sects; as were also the Simonians, Posibbeans, &c. Valef.

Now, not only he, but also Irenæus, and all the Ancients, do call the Proverbs of Solomon, the Book of Wisdom that (m) contains the Precepts of all Virtue: and, treating of those Books which are termed The Apocrypha, he relates that some of them were forg'd by certain Hereticks in his times. But we must now proceed to another Writer.

called The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, (in his Preface to the Books of Solomon) his Words are these: Foras Getaneos Jesu filii Sirach libris, et alius pseudographus, qui sapientia Solomonis insinibatur. Quorum proterbum Hebraicum reperi; non Ecclesiasticum, ut apud Latinos, sed parabola; praxantatum, &c.

C H A P. XXIII.

Concerning Dionysius, Bishop of the Corinthians, and the Epistles he wrote.

AND first we are to speak of Dionysius, who had the Episcopal Chair of the Corinthian Church; and liberally and copiously communicated his Divine Labours, not only to those committed to his charge, but also to such as inhabited Countreys remote and at a great distance; rendering himself most servicable and useful to all persons, by those general Epistles he wrote to divers Churches. Of which number one is that to the Lacedæmonians, containing the first Rudiments of, and Institutions in, the true Faith; and moreover an Exhortation to Peace and Unity. Another of them is that to the Athenians, which is excitatory to Faith, and to lead a life answerable to the Precepts of the Gospel: In which Point he reproves the negligence of [the Athenians] who had in a manner apostatized from the Faith, since the time that Publius their Bishop suffer'd Martyrdom, during the Persecutions which then

(a) This Quadratus, I judge, is not the same Person with that Quadratus, the Disciple of the Apostles, mentioned by Eusebius (Book 3. chap. 37.) For the Quadratus last-named was not a Bishop, as it plainly appears from the forecited place of Eusebius. But, that Quadratus (spoken of by our Author at the beginning of this fourth Book) who presented an Apology to Adrian for our Religion, was the Disciple of the Apostles, as Eusebius in his Chron. expressly affirms. Now this Quadratus here spoken of (who was Bishop of the Athenians) must, as I said, be distinguished from Quadratus the Disciple of the Apostles: For this latter lived not beyond the times of Adrian; but he that was Bishop of the Athenians, governed that Church in the times of M. Antoninus, as 'tis evident from Dionysius's Epistle to the Athenians; for he speaks of him, as being his co-temporary: Now Dionysius Bishop of Corinth flourish'd in the Reign of M. Antoninus. Valef.

Gortyna, and to the rest of the Churches in Creet; and commands Philip their Bishop, because the Church under his charge was renown'd for many signal Acts of Fortitude; and admonishes them to use caution against the Deceit and Perverseness of Hereticks: And in the Epistle he wrote to the Church of Amasria, together with the other Churches throughout Pontus, he mentions Bacchylides and Elpisus, as being the Persons that incited him to write: He annexes likewise several Expositions of Holy Scripture, and by name mentions Palma their Bishop. He recommends to them many things concerning Marriage and

Chastity, and commands those that recover from any Lapse whatsoever, (whether Viciousness, or Heretical Error) to be affectionately receiv'd. In the same Volume is contain'd another Epistle to the Gnosians, wherein he admonishes Pinytus the Bishop of that Church, not to impose the heavy Yoke of Continency upon the Brethren, as if 'twere necessary; but to have a regard to the Infirmary of most Men. To which Pinytus returning an answer, does greatly admire and extol Dionysius; but withal exhorts him, that in future he would impart stronger Food, and nourish up the People under his charge by sending again to them some Letters that contain more perfect and solid Doctrine; left being continually accusom'd to such milky expressions, they should grow old in a childish Discipline. In which Epistle, both the Orthodox Faith of Pinytus, and his solicitude for the Proficiency of those under his care; his Eloquence also, and Understanding in Divine matters, is most accurately and to the life represented. Moreover, there is extant an Epistle of Dionysius's to the Romans, supercrib'd to Soter, at that time the Bishop there; out of which 'tis not amiss here to insert some words, wherein he much commends the usage and custom of the Romans, observ'd by them even until the times of the Persecution rais'd in our own (b) Age. He writes thus: "For this hath been (b) your custom even from the beginning [of your Conversion to Christianity] to be divers ways beneficial to all the Brethren, and to send relief to most Churches throughout every City; sometimes supplying the Wants of such as are in necessity; at others, furnishing those Brethren with Necessaries that are condemn'd to work in the Mines. By such charitable Gifts, which from the beginning you have been accusom'd to transmit to others, being Romans, you retain the custom receiv'd from your Roman Fore-fathers. Which usage your blessed Bishop Soter has not only diligently observ'd, but greatly improv'd; being both instrumental, and ready in the conveyance of your Bounty design'd for the Saints; and also comforting with blessed words (as a tender and affectionate Father does his Children) those Brethren that come as (c) Strangers to you." In the same Epistle also he makes mention of the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and manifests that

(c) Dionysius means those Brethren, who usually came from remote Countreys to Rome, to procure some relief for such as in their own Country were in distress, and necessity. Valef.
"twas very anciently customary to recite it publickly in the presence of the Church: for he says, (d) This day therefore, being the Holy-day of the Lord, we have now pass'd over, wherein we fragment read over your Epistle; which (as also the former Epistle of Clement's written to us) we continue to read henceforward, shall abound with most excellent Precepts and Instructions." Further, Clergy, is ther, the same Writer speaking of his own Epistles to be join'd which by some Forgers were corrupted, says thus: "For I wrote some Epistles, being thereto requested by the Brethren; but the Emiliars of the Devil have fill'd them with Darnel; expunging some Passages out of them, and adding other some; for whom a Woe is reserv'd." This no wonder therefore, that some attempt to adulterate the Holy Writings of the Lord, since they have basely falsified such as are of an inferior Authority." Besides these, there is extant another Epistle of Dionysius's, written to Chrysothora a most faithful Sister, to whom he writes what is agreeable, and imparts to her such Spiritual Food as is convenient for her. Thus much concerning the Writings of Dionysius.

C H A P. XXIV.

(a) Concerning this Hermogenes, and his Heresie, see Baronius, ad annum Christi 170. But, I cannot give my assent to him, as to what he affirms, viz. that Hermogenes taught in Asia. Valef. The Heresie of this Hermogenes is related by Theodoret. (Hæret. fab. l. i. cap. 19.)

There are extant of this Theophilus's (whom we declared to have been Bishop of the Antiochian Church) three Books written to Autolycus, containing the first Rudiments of the Faith. He has another Tract also extant, entitled, Against the Heresie of (a) Hermogenes, wherein he quotes Authorities out of the Revelation of St. John: There are besides some other Books of his, wherein are deliver'd the first Principles of our Faith. Moreover, whereas in that Age the Hereticks (like Darnel) did nevertheless corrupt the pure Seed of the Apostolick Doctrine, the Pastors of Churches were every-where very earnest and industrious to chase them away (being as it were Savage and Wild Beasts) from the Sheep of Christ; partly by admonishing and exhorting the Brethren; and partly by encountering valiantly with the Hereticks themselves; whom they either confuted by dint of Arguments and unwritten Questions propounded face to face, or else disproved their Opinions by written Treatises most accurately compiled. That Theophilus therefore did, together with others, engage these Hereticks, is manifestly apparent from that elaborate piece, (not unworthy of himself) which he wrote against Marcion; which Book, together with those others we have recounted, is at this present time extant. Further, Maximinus, the seventh from the Apostles, succeeded this person in the Bishoprick of the Antiochian Church.

ἡρώδης (ὁ ἑρμῆνης) τὸ κενεῖν τὸ σῶμα ἐν τῇ ἡλῷ ἔπειν ἀποδείκναι, & ὁ διὰ τοῦτο τὴν ἐκείνου ἐκ τῶν ὁμῶν ἀναστρέφοντα. i. e. This Hermogenes asserted, that the Body of the Lord was deposited in the Sun: And that the Devil and the Evil Spirits should be turned into Matter. The Seleucian and Hieronymian taught the same; to wit, That the Body of Christ ascended no farther than the Sun; the occasion of which assertion they took from those Words of the Psalmist, Psal. 19. 5. which in St. Jerome's Translation is thus rendered, In sole posuit tabernaculum suum: But in the Psalms used in our Liturgy 'tis thus worded, In them hath he set a Tabernacle for the Sun. See Dr. Hammond on that Text. The same opinion Gregory Nazianzen attributeth to the Manicheans, Epist. 1. ad Cledonium, and S. August. Tract 34. in Job. This opinion is more largely and clearly set down, but without a name, in the Catena patrum on Psal. 18. where 'tis said, that these Hereticks assert, that after his Resurrection, our Saviour deposited his Body in the Sphere of the Sun, to be preserved there till his second coming.

C H A P. XXV.

Concerning Philipppus and Modestus.

Moreover, Philipppus (who, as we are inform'd by the words of Dionysius [even now quoted] was Bishop of the Church at Gortyna) compiled also a most elaborate piece against Marcion: So likewise did Ireneus, and Modestus. But this person last-named did most excellently (even better than the other Writers) detect the Errors and Frauds of the Man, and exposed them to the view of the World. Several others also wrote, whose Labours are to this day with exquisite care preserv'd by many of the Brethren.

C H A P. XXVI.

Concerning Melito, and what he has made mention of.

Also, at that time Melito, Bishop of the Church at Sardis, and Apollinarius Prelate of the Church at Hierapolis, flourish'd and were eminently famous. Each of which Persons did severally dedicate an Apology written in defence of our Faith to the foresaid Roman Emperor, M. Aurelius who reign'd at that time. The Books of each of them, which are come to our knowledge, are these that follow. Two Books of Melito's concerning Easter; one of his,

(a) concerning the true way of Converse, and of the Prophets: another concerning the Church; and a third, concerning the Lord's Day: Moreover, one, concerning the Nature of Man, and another, about the Frame and Composure of Man; and one, concerning the (b) Obedience of the Senses and their Subjection to Faith; and moreover, one Book, concerning the Soul, the Body and the Mind: a Book, concerning Baptism; one, of Truth; one, concerning the (c) Origination and Generation of Christ: his Book of Prophecy; another, concerning Hospitality; and that entitled, The Key: besides one, concerning the Devil, and, of the Revelation of John; and another, about the Incarnation of God; and lastly, his Apology to Antoninus. Now, in his Books concerning Easter, to wit, in the beginning of that Work, he declares the time when he wrote, in these words,

Servilius Paulus being Proconsul of Asia, at that time when Sagaris suffer'd Martyrdom, there arose a great Controversie at Laodicea concerning Easter, which hapned to fall on those days in its due season; at which time I wrote these Books." Clemens Alexandrinus makes mention of this Book, in his Piece concerning Easter; which Book of Melito's was, as he says, the occasion of his composing that Work. Now, in that Book dedicated to the Emperor, he relates what was acted against us Christians in his Reign. For now, says he, that sort of Men who are pious and holy are persecuted, (a thing which was never before done) and molested with new Decrees throughout all Asia. For most impudent Informers, who are desirous to possess themselves of other Men's Goods, taking an occasion from the Imperial Edicts, do openly commit Robberies, and day and night take away the Goods of innocent Persons." And, after some words, he continues thus: Now, if all this be done by your command, let it pass for an orderly and due way of proceeding. For a just Emperor can never decree or authorize any thing that is unjust: and we willingly undergo the Reward of such a death. This request only we humbly make to you, that you yourself would first take

(a) In all our MSS. Copies this title concerning the true way of converse, and of the Prophets, evidently appears to be the title but of one Book. Jerome (in his Book de Eccl. Script. which is almost wholly taken out of Eusebius) entitles this piece of Melito's thus [De vitæ Prophetarum, i. e. concerning the life of the Prophets. Valef.]

(b) Melito wrote a Book upon this Subject, because there were some Hereticks who asserted, that such Men as were carnal, believed by the help of their senses; but those were spiritual believed by reason. So Hieroclius expounded that Text in St. John's Gospel, (chap. 4. 48.) Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe. Which words Hieroclius said, were properly directed to those, who by works and their senses had a notion of obeying, but not of believing their reason. Origen (Tome 13. Enarrat. on St. John's Gospel) mentions, and confutes this Opinion: Where he declares, that neither spiritual nor carnal Men can believe, unless it be by sense. Valef.

(c) In the Map. Med. and Fab. MSS. and in Nicephorus, this Book of Melito's is intitled [de Origine, &c.] i. e. concerning the Origination, &c. which reading, we doubt not but is true. Rufinus, as appears by his Version, and Robertus Stephanus, as may be seen in his Edit. read [de stirpe, &c.] i. e. concerning Faith, &c. The ancient Fathers, who lived before the Nicene Council, meant (by the word [stirps]) not only such creation as is made out of nothing, but also all sort of production on whatsoever, and therefore the divine Origination of the Word. Those Words of the Apostles (Colos. 1. 15.) The first-born of every Creature, they asserted, were to be understood of the eternal Generation of the Son. Valef. But as Dr. Hammond observes in his Notes on that Text; γεννητός i. e. first-born, is used sometimes for a Lord, or Person in power, who hath the privilege of the first-born, dominion over all his brethren: And according to this notion (continues he) 'tis used commonly in Scripture for a Prince, or principal Person. See Psal. 53. 27. Job 18. 13. Or it may peculiarly refer to his Resurrection, in which he was the first-born from the dead. See Hammond on Col. 1. 15.

M. Aurelius and L. Verus. take cognizance of (d) them that are Sufferers of this vexatious Molestation; and then determine impartially, whether they are worthy of Punishment and Death; or deserve to live in peace and quietness. But if this Decree, and this new Edict (which ought not to have been

(d) These words are to be understood of the Christians; which appears from what follows. For Melito defines of the Emperor, that he would first look into and examine the cause of the Christians; and then determine, whether they deserved to be punished, or rather preserved in safety. Valef.

(e) So he terms the Jews, amongst whom the Christian Religion first sprang up. Upon this account Porphyrius (whose Words Eusebius quotes Book 6, chap. 19. of this work) termed the Christian Religion [ἡ ἐκ τῶν Ἰουδαίων] i. e. an audacious Self that had its beginning amongst Barbarians. Valef.

it began to be eminent and conspicuous in Your Provinces; it brought with it most fortunate and prosperous success to Your Empire. For from that time the power of the Roman Empire began to be eminently great, and was much augmented. Of which Empire You by succession are the most acceptable inheritor: that could be wish'd for, and shall so continue, together with your (f) Son,

(f) From this place it is evident, that Melito the Bishop prefixed his Apology to M. Antoninus after the death of Aurelius Verus. For, if Verus had been then living, when Melito wrote this Apology, he would doubtless have mentioned him here; and in stead of these words [together with your Son] would certainly have said [together with your brother]. For L. Verus was the adopted Brother of M. Aurelius. Seeing therefore, Melito does here mention only the Son of M. Antoninus (to wit, Commodus) 'tis manifest, as I said, that this Apology was presented to Marcus after the death of L. Verus. And therefore Eusebius (in his Chronicon) places it on the tenth year of M. Aurelius, to wit, the year after Verus's death. Valef.

no unsuccessful accident hath intervened; but on the contrary such splendour and magnificence hath always attended Your Empire, as is agreeable to the Desires and Prayers of all men.

Of all the Emperors, only (g) Nero and Domitian (induced thereto by the persuasion and advice of some malevolent persons) endeavour'd to fix a calumny and reproach upon our Religion. From whom that false and malicious detraction hapned to be convey'd down to succeeding times, agreeable to the usage of the rude Multitude, which irrationally gives credit to such groundless rumours. But Your pious Ancestors corrected their ignorance; and by frequent Rescripts reproved such as audaciously attempted to be insolent and vexatious towards those of our Religion. Amongst whom Your Grandfather Adrian wrote both to Fundanus Proculus of Asia, and also to many other [Governors of Provinces,] and (h) your Father, even at that time when You were his Colleague in the Empire, wrote to the Cities that they should not raise Tumults, nor commit any Insolencies (here meant) in favour of the Christians, is now extant. 'Tis mentioned in the Rescript of M. Aurelius Antoninus to the Cities of Asia, which Eusebius has set down in chap. 13. of this Book. Valef.

against us; namely to the Larissians, to the Thebaisians, the Athenians and to all the Grecians. M. Aurelius and L. Verus.

But we most confidently perfwade our selves that You (who retain the same Opinion concerning us that your Ancestors had; yea, who are inclined to be much more gracious and mild towards us, and to entertain wiser and discreeter thoughts concerning us,) will do whatsoever we request of you." This Passage is extant in the fore-mentioned Apology of Melito.

The same Author (in that Book of Extracts and Collections written by him) does, at the beginning of that Work, make a Catalogue of those Books of the Old Testament that by general consent are acknowledged as Canonical: Which Catalogue I judg'd necessary to be here inserted: It is word for word thus: "Melito to Onesimus the Brother sendeth greeting. Whereas, because of your love to, and diligence bestow'd about, the Word of God, you have often requested me to make you some short Collections and Excerptions, both out of the Law and the Prophets, about those things that belong to our Saviour, and all the Articles of our Faith; and moreover, you being very desirous to have an accurate account of the Books of the Old Testament, how many they are in number, and in what order they were written; I have made it my business to do all this, and to satisfy your desire herein. For I well know with what an ardour of Faith you are inflamed, and how earnest your desires are after Knowledge; and that, by reason of your love of God, you greatly prefer these before all other things, striving earnestly to obtain eternal salvation. When therefore I travelled into the East, and came into that Country where these things were heretofore preach'd and done, I made an accurate enquiry about the Books of the Old Testament, a Catalogue whereof I have herewith sent you. Their names are these: The five Books of Moses, to wit, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy; Joshua, Judges, Ruth; the four Books of the Kings; the two Books of the Chronicles; the Psalms of David, the Proverbs of Solomon, which is also called the Book of Wisdom; Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, Job, the Prophecies of Isaiah, and Jeremiah: one Book of the Twelve [minor] Prophets, Daniel, Ezekiel, Ezechiel. Out of these I have made some short Collections, which I have divided into six Books." But thus much concerning the Writings of Melito.

Concerning Apollinaris, Bishop of the Hierapolitan Church.

(a) ALtho' several Books written by Apollinaris are extant among many Men, yet these only of his are come to our knowledge; to wit, His Apology to the foreaid Emperor; his five Books against the Gentiles; his two Books concerning the beginning of a new chapter, but this 27. chap. which treats concerning Apollinaris, and the following chap. concerning Musanius, are both annex'd to chap. 26. the title whereof in our said MSS. is this [Concerning Melito, and what he has made mention of, Apollinaris, and Musanius;] which division Robert Stephens followed in the body of this fourth Book. For in the Contents prefix'd before this 4th Book, he follows the King's MS. and makes three chap. here, to wit, one of Melito, another concerning Apollinaris, and a third concerning Musanius; But in the body of that Book he follows the Med. MS. (as he always does in this particular) and has put no distinction of a new chap. here; but hath made all the three chapters into one. We following the authority of the King's MS. have divided them into three chap. and the same was done before, in the Genoa-Impression of Eusebius's History. Valef.

Also, those Books he wrote afterwards against the Heresie of the (c) Cataphrygians, which not long after occasion'd great Disturbances; but at that time it began to make its first appearance, Montanus with his False Prophets then laying the foundation of his Error. And this is what he had to say concerning Apollinaris.

(b) These Words [His two Books against the Jews] are not in the Mat. Med. nor Fulk. MSS. nor in that Copy Rufinus made use of, as appears from his Version; nor yet in Jerom's B. de Eccl. Scriptor. where he reckons up all Apollinaris's Books. But Nicophorus mentions them in his History. Valef. (c) Mr. Tho. Lydiate (in his Emend. Tempor.) says, this Heresie began in the times of M. Aurelius and L. Verus; the Author whereof was Montanus.

There is extant of Musanus's (whom we mention'd a little before) a most sharp piece written by him to some Brethren, who turn'd to the Heresie of the Eneratites; which then first sprang up, and introduced a new and most pernicious false Opinion into the World. Tatianus, as report says, was the Author of this Heresie.

C H A P. XXIX.

Concerning Tatianus and his Heresie.

WE mean that Tatianus, whose words we quoted a little before, treating concerning the admirable Justin; who, we told you, was a Disciple of that Martyr's. Irenaeus evidences this in his first Book against Heresies, where he writes thus concerning this Tatianus and his Heresie. From (a) Saturninus and Marcion sprang those Hereticks called Eneratites, who taught that Marriage was unlawful; rejecting that primitive Institution of God, and tacitly accused him, because he created Male and Female for the Propagation of Mankind. They were assertors also of an Abstinence from the eating those things, that (as they termed them) had life; shewing hereby their Ingratitude towards God who created all things. They deny likewise that the first Man was saved. And this is a Tenet lately invented amongst them, of which impious assertion one Tatianus was the first broker. Who having been an Auditor of Justin, as long as he convers'd with him, disclosed no such false Opinions: But after his Martyrdom, he revolted from the Church, and being arrogant and puffed up

(b) Jerom (in his Book of Scriptor. Eccl.) takes the word [Didascalus] in such a sense as to signify a master of Eloquence. Such an one Tatianus was before his conversion to the Christian Religion, as may be seen from chap. 16. of this 4th Book. But I rather think, that by [Didaskalos] (which is the term in the original) should be meant [an Ecclesiastical Doctor] (which sense of that term the following Words of Irenaeus do confirm; for he says, He was the composer of a new form of Doctrine of his own making. Valef.

ments to disprove the Salvation of Adam. Thus far Irenaeus [concerning the Heresie of the Eneratites which then was brought.] But not long after, one whose name was (c) Severus did consolidate and strengthen the foresaid Heresie, and so was the occasion that the Followers of that Sect were called, by reason of his name, Sewerians. They approve indeed of the Law, the Prophets, and the Gospels, expounding the sentences of Holy Scripture according to a peculiar sense and meaning of their own; but they speak reproachfully of the Apostle Paul, and reject his Epistles; neither do they admit of the Acts of the Apostles. But Tatianus, their first Founder, put together a confused heap of Collections extracted out of the four Gospels, which he entitl'd (d) Diatessaron, i. e. a Gospel made up of the four Gospels: Which Book is at this time extant in the hands of some Men. They say also, that he was so audacious as to alter some sayings of the Apostle Paul's, and to express them in more elegant terms, undertaking to correct the Composition and Order of his Phrases. He left a very great number of Books, among which, his (e) Book against the Grecians is look'd upon to be an excellent piece, and is commended by most Men: In which Work, giving an account of the Series of Times in the former Ages of the World, he has made it evident that Moses and the Prophets amongst the Hebrews, were much more ancient, than all the famous Men amongst the Grecians. Indeed that Book of his seems to possess, be the best and most useful piece of all his Writings. But thus far concerning these things.

before Tatianus, makes mention of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, as Eusebius tells us, chap. 12. of this Book: Papias also quotes a passage out of that Gospel, as our Author asserts about the close of the 3d Book. Valef. (e) That is, his Oration against the Grecians, which is extant at the latter end of Justin Martyr's Works, Edit. Par. 1636. At pag. 171: he begins the proof of this point, viz. the Antiquity of Moses and the Prophets.

C H A P. XXX.

Concerning Bardesanes the Syrian, and those Books of his that are extant.

Further, in the Reign of the same Emperor, when Heresies were numerous in (a) Mesopotamia, one Bardesanes a most eloquent Man in the Syrian tongue, and an excellent Disputant, wrote the some Dialogues against Marcion and several others, who were Authors and Assertors of different Opinions, which he publish'd in his own Country-language; as also many other Works in which his Scholars (for he had very many Auditors, and was a powerful Maintainer of our Faith) translated out of the Syriack into the Grecian language. Amongst which is his Dialogue concerning Fate, written to (b) Antoninus, an incomparable piece. 'Tis said he wrote several other Tracts, upon occasion of the Persecution at that time rais'd against us. This Man was at first a Follower of be Valentinus's; but having mislik'd that Heresie, and confuted many of the fabulous Tenets of the Founder thereof, he was satisfied in himself that he had turn'd to a truer Opinion; but notwithstanding he did not wholly clear himself of the filth of his ancient Heresie. Moreover, at the same time Soter Bishop of the Roman Church departed this Life.

Valentinus in the Churches of Ostrogno. Valef. (b) It's doubtful whether Antoninus the Emperor, or one of that name, who was a follower of Tatianus's, be here meant. It is not likely that Bardesanes should dedicate his Books to the Roman Emperor, which he wrote in the Syriack language. Besides, Eusebius (in his 6 B. de preparat.) does declare that Bardesanes dedicated his Dialogues to his Followers and Friends. Valef.

Of the Ecclesiastical History

The PREFACE.

MOREOVER, SOTER Bishop of the Roman Church having presided there eight years, ended his Life. M. Aurelius and L. Verus. In whose place succeeded Eleutherus, the twelfth from the Apostles. It was then the (a) seven-teenth year of the Emperor Antoninus Verus; at which time a more sharp Persecution being in L. Verus. some Parts of the World raised against us by a Popular Incursion throughout every City; how vast the Number was of such Persons as were dignified with Martyrdom over the whole World, may be conjectured from what happened in one Province. Which things were by accident put in writing and transmitted to Posterity, as being truly worthy of an indelible remembrance. Now the Acts, which contain a most perfect and compleat Account of these things, are set down entire in that Collection we made of the Martyrs; which comprehends not only an Historical Relation of what was done, but also Rules and Precepts of Piety and Holiness: But notwithstanding, we will from thence at present make a Selection of such Passages as are agreeable to the Subject we now have in hand, and here insert them. Other Historians indeed have nobly made it their business to record in their Works warlike Victories, and Trophies erected against their conquer'd Enemies; the Valour of Generals, and brave Children, Country, and Estate: But we, who set forth the History of a Divine Society of Men, will record upon immortal Monuments, inscribed with indelible Characters, the most pious Wars, waged for the obtaining of Spiritual Peace; and the valiant Acts of those Persons who in such Encounters commended more for the Truth than their Country, and for Religion rather than their dearest Relations: publishing for the perpetual remembrance of Posterity, the continued earnestness of those Champions who fought for Piety, their Fortitude in undergoing manifold Torments, the Trophies erected against the Devils, the victorious Conquests obtain'd over invisible Adversaries, and last of all, their Crowns.

and that not by the Edict of the Emperor, but by a tumultuous Insurrection of the Populace against them: Where it lasted to the end of that Emperor's Reign, as 'tis evident from these Words in Melito's Apology [For from that time the power of the Roman Empire began to be eminently great, and was much augmented: Of which Empire you by Succession are the most acceptable Inheritor that could be wish'd for, and shall so continue together with your Son, &c. See chap. 26. B. 4. note (f).] Now, Commodus was by his Father received as his Partner in the Empire, when Melito presented this Apology to the Emperor. His being made Colleague in the Empire, 'tis evident, happened about the latter end of M. Antoninus's Reign: Wherefore the Persecution of the Christians in Asia must necessarily have lasted till that time. But this Persecution was more sharp and violent in Asia, in the Gallias, and in other Provinces, in the seventeenth year of the said Antoninus, as Eusebius does here say expressly. See Baronius, ad annum Christi 179. Valef.

CHAP. I.

How many, in the Reign of Verus, underwent most sore Persecutions in France for Religion; and after what manner they suffered.

NOW France was the Country, wherein the place for performance of the forementioned Combats was appointed. The chief Mother-Cities whereof, (and which be more eminently famous than the other Cities there) are Lyons and Vienna; through both which the River Rhone passes, encompassing with a great and rapid Stream that whole Region. The Churches therefore that were most eminent in those Parts sent an account in writing concerning their Martyrs to the Churches throughout Asia and Phrygia; relating, after this manner, what was done amongst them: for I will insert their very words: (a) The

Vienna and Lyons were joyned together, not only by vicinity of place, but also by the bonds of mutual Love. And seeing they had together been engaged in the same Persecution, they jointly wrote an Epistle concerning their own Martyrs. Besides, both Provinces seem at that time to have been under the jurisdiction of one President; which may be conjectured from hence, because as well they of Vienna, as those of Lyons, are in this Epistle said to have been by the President apprehended, and condemned for the Faith of Christ. These therefore are the reasons why they wrote jointly. For that which some have supposed, (to wit, that then there was but one Bishop of Vienna and Lyons) is easily confuted out of this Epistle, which says that Pothinus was Bishop of Lyons, but not of Vienna. Moreover, those of Lyons do, out of respect, set the name of those of Vienna first, whereas notwithstanding they of Lyons wrote the Epistle concerning the things which were done at their own City. Which respect also may seem to be attributed to the antiquity, and nobility, of the Colony at Vienna. As to the second query, we may understand from this Epistle, that there were many Grecians in the Church of Lyons, as was Aitalus, and Alexander the Phrygian, and Alcihiade, who was by original extract a Phrygian also, as I think: Also Ireneus was born in Asia, and, when he was very young, had, together with Florinus, been an Auditor of Polycarp's at Smyrna; as he himself evidences. The very name also of Pothinus the Bishop shews him to be originally a Grecian. 'Tis no wonder therefore, that those who came out of Asia into the Gallias, should write to their Brethren that were in Asia concerning their Affairs; from whom, as 'tis probable, they had before received that Epistle concerning the Martyrdom of Polycarp, and others. I suppose Ireneus to have been the Author of this Epistle, who at that time was a Presbyter of the Church at Lyons. Valef.

Servants of Christ which inhabit Vienna and Lyons in France, to the Brethren throughout Asia and Phrygia, which have the same Faith and Hope of Redemption with us; Peace, Grace, and Glory from God the Father, and from Christ Jesus our Lord.* Then, having after this by way of Preface premised some words, they begin their Relation with these: 'Now the sore Affliction amongst us, the great Rage of the Heathens against the Saints, and what the Blessed Martyrs endured, we are neither able accurately to express, nor indeed can it be compriz'd in writing: For the Adversary invaded us with his utmost vigour, shewing forth even then his arrival amongst us, and some beginnings of his future cruelty. For he left nothing unattempted, whilst by way of practice he prepared, and before-hand exercised his Ministers against the Servants of God. So that we are

(b) The term in the original is [ἀνέκδοτον] which signifies only private Houses, from which the Christians were then driven, that is, from the Houses of their Friends, Relations, &c. For I agree not with Rufinus, who thought that the Christians were prohibited to inhabit their own Houses.† Valef.

(c) Ἀγορὴ is the term in the original, which signifies any promiscuous or popular assembly; these (setting aside the sacred assemblies, which are otherwise expressed) are principally of two sorts, either (1.) to buy and sell, or (2.) to resort for justice; and the word here used commonly signifies both, or either of these, (1.) a fair or market, (2.) a place of judicature, an hall, or court of judgment. The Romans termed this place Forum; which word they used in the same Latitude that the Greeks did Ἀγορὴ. At this place, and hereafter, we have made use of the Latin term in our Translation; and we therefore put this Note in here, that the English Reader might understand the meaning of it.

* Rom. 8. 'haunted unto Christ; truly demonstrating, *that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us.'

First therefore, they courageously underwent whatsoever [abuses] were cumulated on them by the whole Multitude, to wit, the Shouts against them, the Stripes, the Draggings up and down, the taking away of their Goods, the casting of Stones at them, their being (d) shut up within their own Houses; and all things which an exasperated Multitude do usually undertake against their Enemies and Adversaries: Then, being brought into the Forum by the Tribune of the Soldiers, and the (e) Magistrates of the City, they were examin'd in the presence of the whole Multitude; and, having made their Confession were shut up in prison until the arrival of the (f) President. Afterwards, when they were wherein Imprisonment can have no place. For the Judges, and not the People, had power to imprison those that were guilty. Rufinus therefore translates [ἐν οὐρανοῖς] consilii, i. e. to be shut up. For the Heathens shut up the Christians within their own Houses, and would not suffer them to come abroad. Valef.

(e) He means the municipal Magistrates, who were also called the dumoviri. Although the term ἀνέκδοτον (here used) is usually meant of those Judges which have the power of the Sword; (See Ulpian, in tit. de Jurisdic.) yet it denotes the municipal Magistrates also, who, as the Civilians phrase it, have modicum coercitivum. Valef.

(f) Ἡγεμὼν (the term that occurs here) has a general signification. For all Governors of Provinces are so called, he they Procurators, Proconsuls, or Deputies of Caesar. It may therefore be deservedly questioned of which of these three sorts the Governour of the Province of Lyons was. Indeed, I think he was the Deputy of Caesar. Which I am inclined to suppose, (1.) because there is mention here made of the Tribune of the Soldiers. For that agrees very well with the Deputy of Caesar, who look'd after the Military Affairs. (2.) In the old Inscription, which Gruter speaks of, pag. 427. he is termed Deputy of the Lugdunensis Province. See Gruter, Inscript. pag. 427. Lastly, Spartianus (in Severo) attests, that the Province of Lyons was in the Reign of M. Antoninus governed by Deputies of Caesar. And perhaps in this Epistle of those of Lyons, Severus is meant: For he was Deputy of the Lugdunensis Province under Adrianus. Junius Rufus also (whom Tacitus in the B. 1. of his History calls Governor of Gallia Lugdunensis) was Deputy of this Province; and so was Vitellius Pellio in the times of Adrian. Valef.

were brought before the Governour, (who exercised all manner of cruelty against us) (g) Vettius Epagathus, one of the Brethren, who had arriv'd to an immense degree of love to God and his Neighbour; whose course of life had been so exact and accurate, that although he was a young Man, yet he deserved the Elogy of Zachariah Senior; for he had walked in all the Commandments and Ordinances of the Lord, blameless; double, and was most ready to perform all good Offices towards his Neighbour, being full of the Zeal of God, and fervent in Spirit: This Person, MSS. For I say, being such an one, was not able to bear Vettius for those to unjust proceedings against us, but was a Roman greatly mov'd with indignation, and requested that he also might be heard to make a Defence Cicerō, in behalf of the Brethren, [and to manifest] that and yu- there was nothing of Impiety or Irreligion amongst us. But when those about the Tribunal cried out against him, (for he was an eminent Personage,) and when the Governour refused the request so justly propos'd by him, and only ask'd him whether he also were a Christian; he confess'd it with a most loud voice, and was receiv'd into the number of the Martyrs, being term'd by the Governour the Advocate of the Christians: But he had within himself an Advocate, to wit, the Holy Spirit, in a greater degree than (h) Zachariah had; which he evidently manifested by his abundant love, in that he was well-contented to deposit his own Life for the defence of the Brethren. For he was, and the Priest, is, a genuine Disciple of Christ, following the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. Then others (i) were diligently prov'd and examin'd; and they were illustrious and ready Proto-Martyrs, who with all alacrity of mind accomplish'd the solemn Confession of Martyrdom. Moreover, those who were unprepared, unexercised, as yet weak, and unable to undergo the severity of so great a Combat, were then apparent; of whom about ten in number fell away, which was the occasion of great Grief and immeasurable Sorrow to us, and disturb'd that alacrity of Mind in others who were not yet apprehended; who although they suffer'd all sorts of misery, yet were present with the Martyrs, and departed not from them. At that time we were all in a great Contemnation of Mind, because we were dubious about the [perseverance of such as were to] confess [themselves to be Christians:] nor that we fear'd the Torments that were to be inflicted; but, revolving in our Minds the issue of Affairs, we were fearful lest any one should fall off from

(h) They mean Zachariah the father of the Baptist, whom they call Senior, comparing Epagathus, a young Man, with him. Valef.

(i) ἀνέκδοτον is the term here used. It seems to be a Metaphor taken from Champions, who before they engaged in the Combat, were wont to be examined and proved, whether they were Free-Men, and of the age that Champions should be. And those that were admitted to the Combat, were said ἀνέκδοτον, such as were reprobated ἀνέκδοτον, the examination itself was call'd ἀνέκδοτον, as I collect from this place. Indeed this Epistle is very full of Athletical terms, as 'tis manifest from this place, and as we will shew more plainly hereafter. Valef.

Church of

Vienna and in that of Lyons. But these Words are in an especial manner to be taken notice of, because from thence it appears manifestly, that the Church of Vienna, as well as that of Lyons, had at that time its Bishop. For by ancient Writers it is not called a Church unless it be a Mother-Church, which we call a Cathedral. Ado Viennensis (in his Chronicon) says Justus was Bishop of Vienna at that time; who having been macerated with a long Exile, was at last Crowned with Martyrdom. Valer.

(l) The Story goes, That this Thyestes eat part of his own Son; whom Atreus his Brother (to be revenged of him for committing Adultery with his Wife) made ready and let before him.

from the Faith. Now there were daily taken such as were worthy to fill up their number; so that those who were most eminent in (k) both the Churches, and by whom essential Matters here had been settled, were all pick'd out and apprehended. Some Heathens also, our Servants, were seiz'd upon; (for the President did in publick give command that we should all be diligently search'd out;) which Persons, by reason of the treachery of Satan, being afraid of the Torments which they saw the Saints undergo, the Soldiers inciting them thereto, rail'd lyes against us, and reported that we used the Suppers of (l) Thyestes, and the incestuous carnal Collocation of (m) Oedipus, and such other things as 'tis neither lawful for us to utter, nor to think of, nor to believe, that any such fact was ever committed among men. These Stories being spread abroad, all persons were enrag'd against us; insomuch, that if there were any who before had been moderate towards us by reason of Akinity or Friendship; even these were then greatly displeas'd with, and mightily incens'd against us. Thus was fulfilled that which our Lord had said, that the time should come wherein "nobody ever kills thee, but thou shalt kill him." From thenceforth therefore the Holy Martyrs underwent such Torments as are inexpressible and above all declaration: Satan endeavouring with much earnestness that some slanderous and reproachful words might be utter'd by (n) them also. But the whole rage both of the Multitude, of the President, and of the Soldiers did in a more violent manner fall upon (o) Sanctus of Vienna, a Deacon, and upon Maturus, a person indeed who had been lately baptiz'd, but yet prov'd a courageous Champion of Christ upon Attalus also, by Country a Pergamian, who always was a Pillar and Prop of the Churches here, and lastly upon Blandina; by whom Christ demonstrated, that those things which among Men seem vile, obscure, and despicable, are by God accounted worthy of great honour, by reason of the love shewn to him, which is actually and powerfully manifested, and not in pretence and shew boasted of. For when we were all afraid, and she that was her Mistress after the Flesh (who also was one of the Champions of the Martyrs) fear'd, left, by reason of the Imbecility of her Body, she should not be able with boldness and freeness to make her Confession: Blandina was supplied with so great strength, that those who by turns tortured her all the time from Morning till Evening, became feeble and weak; and confess'd themselves overcome, having nothing further to do to M. Aurelius and L. Verus. her: They admired also that she yet continued to breathe, her whole Body having been mangled and pierced through; and they attested, that one sort of torture was sufficient to have bereaved her of life, much more so many and so great torments. But this blessed Woman, like a courageous Champion, recover'd fresh supplies of strength during her Confession: And it was a refreshment, and an ease to her, and abated the pain of those Torments that were inflict'd on her, to pronounce these words, to wit, I am a Christian, and there is nothing of wickedness ascribed amongst us. But Sanctus, having in an extraordinary, and more than humane, manner, courageously endured all the torments Men could invent, (the impious Wretches hoping by reason of the continuedness and exquisite nature of his torments to have heard some indecent expressions from him,) withstood them with so great a degree of courage, that he declared neither his own name, nor that of his own Country, nor of the City where he was born, nor yet whether he were a Servant or a Freeman; but to all the Interrogatories, he made answer in the Roman tongue, I am a Christian: This he declared time after time successively, in stead of [acknowledging] his Name, his City, his Kindred, or any thing else: neither could the Heathens get any other words out of him. Upon which account the rage both of the President and of the Tormentors against him was exceeding great, and their endeavours to master him were obstinate and earnest. Insomuch that when they had nothing further to torture him with, at last they clapt plates of Brass that were red hot upon the most tender Members of his Body; which Parts of his Body were burnt indeed; but he stood upright without bending of himself at all, was invincible, and continued stedfast and constant in his Confessions; being bedew'd and strengthen'd with that Celestial Fountain of living Water which flow'd out of the Belly of Christ. His Body was a sufficient evidence of what had hapn'd, being all over full of Wounds, and Prints of Stripes, (p) bowed and drawn together, and having lost the external form and shape of a Man; in which Christ suffering accomplished'd therein great glory, vanquishing the Adversary, and demonstrating for the information of others, that there is nothing formidable where the Love of the Father is, nor any pain where the Glory of Christ is present. For when those impious Wretches some few days after began again to torture the Martyr, and suppos'd that if they should make use of the same torments whilst his Body was swell'd, and the (q) Wounds thereof (q) Soud- inflamed, either they might master him, when he could not endure to be touch'd by hands, of the original that he would die under his torments, and so inflict a terror into others; not only no such success (as by thing hapned concerning him, but also, contrary to the opinion of all Men, his Body became erect and was repair'd in these latter tortures) and he recover'd his former shape, and the use of his limbs. So that his being tormented the second time was not a punishment to him, but by the Grace of Christ prov'd to be his remedy. Moreover, the Devil caus'd one Biblis to be brought forth to punishment, (being one of those who had renounced Christ) whom he suppos'd to be by him already devoured, but was further desirous

(n) The Servants of the Christians (before-mentioned) being afraid of the Tortures they were threatened with, had confess'd that they Christians killed Infants, and committed Incest: And here the Devil endeavour'd, that the Christians themselves, which were apprehended, should after the same manner calumniate the Christian Religion. Therefore the Judges tortured them all manner of ways, that they should confess, that they eat Children, and committed Incest. Upon this account Blandina (as hereafter it follows) cried out amidst her Tortures—I am a Christian, and there is nothing of wickedness ascribed amongst us. Valer.

the public place, where the inhumanity of the Heathens was exhibited; (u) a day for fighting with the Wild Beasts being granted purposely upon the account of those of our Religion. And

(u) The meaning of this place is, that the Presidents, or Deputy of the Province of Lyons, granted the People an extraordinary show of fighting with the wild Beasts; a Day being appointed for that purpose, because of the Christians, who were condemned to the Beasts. For the Romans had for days for these Spectacles, which fell on the month of December, as may be seen in the Calendar of Hermartius. Except on these Days, it was unlawful for the Dumviri (on whom the charge of these Shows was imposed) to exhibit these Spectacles of fighting with Wild-Beasts to the People. But those Judges, who had the power of the Sword, and of condemning Persons to the Beasts, exhibited these Shows as often as they pleased, that they might delight the People by destroying of Offenders. Valef.

(x) We noted before, that many Athletical terms were made use of in this Epistle. Amongst which is which occurs here. For the Champions, who were to contend in the Games, were wont to be drawn forth by lot, which, after what manner it was done, Lucian (in Hermotimus) tells us. There was a little Slave Telamon, dedicated to the God that presided over the Games, into which the Lots were cast. Upon two the Letter A was written; upon other two the Letter B, and so on. Then the Champions drew these Lots out of the Box. Those two, who drew forth the Letter A, engaged one with the other, and fought in the first place: And this was the [αἰματόεσι]. In like manner, they that drew the Letter B, engaged one another in the second place. So the Lot and the Urn assigned every one his Antagonist. He that vanquished his Adversary, was not immediately Crowned, but engaged in another encounter with those others who had conquered their Adversaries, until there remained only one Victor over all. Upon which account they drew Lots several times. Hence 'tis, that in the Farnesian Inscription (which Gruter speaks of, pag. 314.) one Alepiades is said to have gotten the victory in many Encounters, πρὸς ἄνδρας καὶ γυναῖκας πρὸς ἀλλήλους, i. e. after the first or second casting of Lots, having vanquished the Antagonists the second, or third time. For this was usual for that reason I mentioned, as often as there were many couples of Champions. For the Conquerors engaged one another, and there was a second and third drawing of Lots amongst them, until the Victory remained to one. And this is that which, in this Epistle, is called πρὸς ἀνδράσιν καὶ γυναῖκας. Valef.

them, that he might persuade those which believe in him, that whosoever suffers for the Glory of Christ hath eternal Communion with the living God. Now when none of the Wild

Beasts would then touch her, she was taken from the Stake, and cast again into prison, being reserv'd for another Combat; that so, having been(y) Conqueror in many Encounters, she might render the Condemnation of the crooked Serpent inexorable; also she encouraged the Brethren: And tho' she was a person of small estimation, infirm, and despicable, yet having cloth'd herself with the strength of Christ that great and invincible Champion, the vanquish'd the Adversary in many Encounters; and after a glorious Combat, was encircled with a Crown of Incorruption. Attalus also was by the Multitude most earnestly required to be deliver'd up to Punishment, for he was an eminent Person, and by reason of the clearness of his Conscience proceeded forthlike a Champion prepared for the Combat, in that he had been perfectly and thoroughly exercised in the Christian Discipline, and always a Witness of the Truth amongst us: And after he had been (a) led round the

Amphitheatrum, (Tables being carried before him, whereon was written in the Roman Tongue, This is Attalus the Christian;) and the People had vehemently swell'd with rage and anger against him; the President having understood that he was a Roman, commanded he should again be committed to custody amongst the rest that were in prison. Concerning whom he wrote to Cæsar, and expected an Edict from him. Now this interval of time was spent neither idly nor unfruitfully by them, but by their patient Sufferance, the immeasurable Mercy of Christ was made apparent: for those Members of the Church that were dead, were by the Living revived; and the Martyrs conferr'd * Kindnesses upon * That is, those who were no Martyrs; and there was a by many great Joy begotten in the Virgin Mother [the Church] the having again received those alive whom by Abortion she had cast forth as dead. Valef.

For through the means of the Holy Martyrs; many of those who had renounc'd the Faith, were newly formed in the Womb, born again, had their vital Heat rekindled in them, and learn'd to confess themselves to be Christians. And having now recover'd life and strength, they came before the Tribunal, (God, who desireth not the death of a Sinner, but is indulgent and kindly invites him to repentance, (a) infusing a sweetness into them) that they might again be interrogated by the President. For Cæsar had signified by his Rescript, that those [who confess'd themselves to be Christians,] should be (b) tortured; but if any renounced the Faith, they should which is used as well in an active as passive sense. 'Tis a Metaphor taken from the wild Olive-tree, which being grafted, grows sweet; of which St. Paul speaks. Valef.

(b) ἁγιστομαρτυρία. Lexicographers differ very much in their giving the signification of this term (which here occurs.) Stephens (in his Theaurus), renders it, justitibus conciliis, i. e. to be beaten with Clubs: Varinus, πρὸς κλαβὰς ἀπομαρτυρία, i. e. to be beaten: The Etymologicum (publish'd by Sylbergius) says it signifies, ἐν ἀσπίδι καὶ πανόλκιμα ἅλα τυμπανία &c. ἵνα ἐκείνους ἀνδράσιν καλέσῃ, not barely to be put to death, but to be kill'd with the Tympanum, which is a piece of Wood call'd a Cudgel: The Reader will find a large and learned account of this term, and of this Engine of Torture, in Dr. Hammond's Note on Hebr. 11. 35. Where he makes it appear, that this sort of punishment was very painful, contumelious, and capital.

be dismiss'd from their Imprisonment. Now, the Publick (e) Assembly here (which is frequented by a numerous concourse of People of all Nations that meet together at it) being newly begun, [the President] order'd the blessed Martyrs to be brought before the Tribunal, making them a Gazing-stock, and by way of Offentation, on producing them as a pompous Shew to the Multitude. When therefore he had again interrogated them, as many as were found to have the Privilege of being Free of the City of Rome, he order'd they should be Beheaded; the rest were cast to the Wild-Beasts. But Christ was greatly glorified thro' those who formerly had renounced the Faith, but then (contrary to the expectation of the Heathens) became to be Confessors: For these Persons were interrogated apart, as being, in all probability, forthwith to be set at liberty; but, having confess'd themselves to be Christians, they were added to the (d) number of the Martyrs. Now, they continued without, who never had the least impression of Faith, nor a sense of the Wedding-garment, nor a thought about the fear of God; but by their Conversation defam'd the way of Truth, that is, were the Sons of Perdition: But all the rest were added to the Church; during whose Examination, one Alexander, by Country a Phrygian, by Profession a Physician, a person who had dwelt many years in the Gallias, and was known almost to all Men by reason of his love to God, and his boldness and fearlessness in preaching his Word, (for he wanted not Apostolick Grace;) standing near to the Tribunal, and by Words encouraging them to a Confession of the Faith, appear'd to those who stood round the Tribunal, as if he endur'd the pangs of Child-birth: Now the Multitude being in a great frame, because those, who had before renounc'd the Faith, did now again make Confession of it, cry'd out against Alexander, as if he were the occasion thereof: And the President (having commanded him to be (e) set before him, and ask'd him who he was, and he having said that he was a Christian) being in a rage, condemn'd him to be cast to the Wild-Beasts. And the day following he enter'd the Amphitheatre together with Attalus; (for the President, to gratify the Multitude, did again deliver Attalus to the Wild-Beasts;) which two persons, having undergone all the Instruments of torment in the Amphitheatre that were invented to torture them with, and endured a great combat, were at last (f) run through with a Sword. Alexander indeed did neither sigh, nor utter any expression at all; but in his heart spake to God, and continued praising of, and praying to him: But Attalus, when he was let in the Iron-Chair, and scorch'd all over, (when the savour of his burnt flesh ascended from his Body) said to the Multitude in the Roman tongue, behold, this that you do, is to devour Men; but we neither devour men, nor practise any other thing that is evil. Being ask'd also what name God had, he answer'd, God has not a name, as Man has. Infine, after all these persons, on the (g) last day of the Gladiators Combats, Blandina was again brought forth, together with Ponticus, a Youth about fifteen years old; (who allow'd every day led in, to see the Tortures of the rest) and they constrain'd them to swear by their Idols: But because they continu'd firm and constant, and contemn'd their Gods, the Multitude was so enrag'd against them, that they neither had compassion on the age of the young Man, nor shew'd any reverential respect towards the Sex of the Woman, but expos'd them to all manner of cruel Tortures, and made them pass thro' the whole Circuit of Torments, now and then compelling them to swear, but were unable to effect that. For Ponticus, being encouraged by his Sister, (inasmuch that the Heathens perceived it was she that encouraged and strengthened him) having courageously undergone all sorts of tortures, gave up the ghost. But the blessed Blandina, the last of all, having like a noble and valiant Mother encouraged her Children, and sent them before as Conquerors to the King; after she had measured over the same course of Combats that her Sons had pass'd through, hastned to them, being glad, and rejoicing at her Exit, as if she had been invited to a Nuptial Supper, and were not to be cast to the Wild-Beasts. And after she had been scourged, expos'd to the Fury of the Wild-Beasts, and set in the

(b) Iron-Chair, at last she was inclosed in a Net, and thrown before a (i) Bull: By which Beast, after she had been very much toss'd (having been all along wholly insensible of the Tortures she underwent, because of her hope and her retaining a firm assent to those things she believ'd, and also by reason of her familiar converse in prayer with Christ,) she also was run through with a sword; and the very Heathens themselves confessed, that there never was any Woman among 'em, which suffer'd so many and so great tortures. But their rage and cruelty towards the Saints was not thus satiated: For the savage and Greek barbarous Nations, having been stir'd up by that (k) fierce Wild-Beast, could not without great difficulty be appeased; but their cruelty was begun afresh, in a new and peculiar manner, against the Bodies of the Saints. For they were so far from being ashamed that they had been vanquish'd by the Martyrs (because they were destitute of human reason and consideration,) that their rage was more enkindled; both the President and also the People (like a fierce Beast) most unjustly demonstrating the same degree of hatred against us: That the Scripture might be fulfilled, (l) He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still; as the reading in the original is here; we now read (m) ὁ ἀδίκος ἀδικησάτω ἄδικον, καὶ ὁ ῥυπαρὸς ῥυπαρευθήτω ῥυπαρῶς, i. e. He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; See the original of the Text.

(h) Θήραν is the Greek term; which Rufinus translates craticulam, i. e. a Grid-iron: It is the same, which before is called the Iron-Chair, on which the Martyrs being let, were broyled, as it were on a Gridiron. Thus the Christians were used before they were cast to the Wild-beasts. (i) Amongst the Sports of an Amphitheatrical show, this was one; a Bull was brought in, to whom (being first enraged) they cast Offenders inclosed in a Net; whom, like Bulls, he toss'd on high. Martial's Verse on this Subject is well known, Taurus ut impoſitas jaſtat ad aſtrapilam. Valef.

and he that is righteous let him be righteous still. For those who had been suffocated in Prison, they cast to the Dogs; watching continually night and day, lest any of us should intert them; then having exposed the pieces of the Bodies, as well what were left undevour'd by the Wild Beasts, as what remain'd unconsumed by the Fire, partly torn, and partly burnt, also the Heads of the rest together with their Trunks, they kept 'em likewise unburied with a guard of Soldiers for the space of many days. And some were full of Indignation, and gnash'd their Teeth at the Dead, being desirous to take some further revenge of them. Others insulted over and derided them, extolling their Idols, and attributing the Punishment of the Martyrs to them. But those that were more mild, and who seem'd in some measure to sympathize with us, upbraided us very much, saying, Where is their God? and what Emolument hath this Religion brought them, which they prefer'd before their own Lives? And such variety was there in the Heathen's behaviour towards us: But we were affected with a great Grief, because we could not hide the Bodies in the earth; for neither was the night assitant to us therein, (m) neither would Money persuade them, nor could our Prayers induce them to grant our request; but they watch'd the Bodies with all imaginable care and diligence, as if they were to gain some great matter, if they should not be buried." After these words, having interposed some other expressions, they proceed, saying; 'The Bodies therefore of Martyrs, having undergone all manner of ignominious usage, and being exposed in the open air for six days space, were afterwards burnt; and being reduced to Ashes, were by those impious Wretches (n) swept into the River Rhone, which runs hard by; that so no Remains of them might be any longer visible upon earth. And this they did, as if they were able to have vanquish'd God, and deprive them of a Resurrection; that so (as they said) they might have no hope of rising again; of which being fully persuaded, they introduce a strange and new Religion amongst us, and, condemning the most exquisite Torments, do readily, and with alacrity of mind, willingly undergo death. Let us now see whether they shall rise again, and whether their God is able to assist them, and deliver them out of our hands.

CHAP. II.

How the Martyrs beloved of God, kindly receiving such as fell away in the Persecution, wrought a Cure upon them.

SUCH were the Calamities which beset the Churches of Christ, in the times of the foresaid Emperor; from which may be conjectured what also was done in the other Provinces. It is worth our adjoining hereto some other words out of the same Epistle, whereby the Meekness and Humanity of the forementioned d Martyrs is describ'd in these very words; 'Who also were so far from lowering and imitators of Christ, (\ Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God*), that altho' they were in such an height of Glory, and had suffer'd as Martyrs not once, nor twice, but often, and had been taken from the Wild Beasts and (a) committed again to

(a) Sir H. Savil, at the Margin of his MS. Copy, has mended this place thus, ἐν τοῖς θύλασις ἐν ἡμέραις τῆς ἐκείνης, ὡς αὐτοὶ ἐν οὐδὲν ἀπαρνησάμενοι, ἰ. c. and had been cast to the Wild-Beasts, and taken from them again: Which Emendation is put in the Margin of the Geneva-Edit. Indeed Christophorus read this place thus, as appears from his Translation; but 'tis uncertain whether he did it by conjecture, or from the authority of some old Copies. Our MSS. alter not the reading here. Moreover, ἐν οὐδὲν ἀπαρνησάμενοι (which is the term in the Original) signifies in this place, to be cast into Prison; in which sense 'tis twice used in the foregoing Chapter. Valf.

Prison; altho' they had the Marks of Fire, the Scars of Stripes, and Wounds all over their Bodies; yet they neither declared themselves to be Martyrs, nor would they suffer us to call them by that name: But if at any time any one of us, either by Letter or in Discourse, term'd them Martyrs, they reprov'd us sharply: For they readily allow'd the appellation of Martyr to Christ, (who is the faithful and true Witness, and the First-begotten of the Dead, and the Prince of the Life of God;) they commemorated also those Martyrs who were already departed this life, and said, those are now Martyrs, whom Christ vouchsafed to assume whilst they were making their Confession, he having seal'd their Martyrdom by their Death: But we are mean and humble Confessors: And with Tears they beseeched the Brethren, entreating them, that earnest Prayers might be made that they might be perfected: They also in reality demonstrated the Power and Efficacy of Martyrdom, using much freedom of speech in their Answers before all the Heathens, and manifested their excellency by their patient Sufferance, Fearlessness, and undaunted Courage: But they refused the appellation of Martyrs given them by the Brethren, having been filled with the Fear of God." Again, after some few words they say: They humbled themselves under the mighty Hand, by which they are now highly exalted: Then also (b) they excused themselves to all Men, but accused none; they looked all Men and bound none; yea they pray'd for those who tormented them, as did Stephen that perfect Martyr, [saying, * Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. Now if he pray'd for those who stoned him, how much more [is it credible that he pray'd] for the Brethren?" Again also, after some other words, they say; 'For this was the greatest encounter they had with the Devil, to wit, upon account of their genuine and sincere Charity; because the Serpent, being strangled, vomited up those alive, whom he supposed he had digested. They did not proudly triumph over those that fell; but bestow'd, on such as were indigent, those good things with which they abounded, having Motherly Bowels of Compassion, pouring forth many Tears for them before [God] the Father. They asked life, and he gave it them; which also they imparted to their Friends; being Victors (c) over all, (c) They went to God: Having always loved Peace, and continually exhorted [us] to it, they departed in peace to God; leaving no Grief to their Mortal-ther, no Faction nor Disfention amongst the Brethren, but Joy, Peace, Concord, and Love." i. e. over all. Valf.

Let thus much be here profitably placed, concerning the Brethren that fell; upon account of the inhuman and merciless Disposition of (d) those, (d) who afterwards behaved themselves most cruelly towards the Members of Christ.

Novatians, who afterwards excluded such as fell in time of Persecution from all hope of Abolution. Valf.

What a Vision appear'd to the Martyr Attalus in his sleep.

Moreover, the same Epistle of the foremention'd Martyrs, contains also another relation worthy to be remembred; which, for the information of the Readers, we will very willingly insert: Thus it is: "For when Alciades, one of the Martyrs, (who led an austere course of life; and in the foregoing part of his life he had fed on nothing at all, but only made use of Bread and Water) attempted to lead the same course of life during his Imprisonment; it was revealed to Attalus (after the first Combat which he finish'd in the Amphitheatre) that Alciades did not well, in his not making use of God's Creatures, and leaving an Example of Scandal to others. But Alciades submitted, fed on all Meats afterwards promiscuously, and gave God thanks: For they were not destitute of the Grace of God, but the Holy Spirit was their Director." These things were after this manner. Now, when of the Church at Lyons) to the foremention'd Bishop of Rome, giving the Man a very good Testimony, as their own words do manifest, which are these: "We pray that you may in all things and always rejoice in God, Father (c) Eleutherus; (c) The King's, Maty, and Fulk MSS. read Eleutherus; as do also Nicophorus and Rufinus. But there are some who call him Eleutherus. Valef. we have entreated Irenæus our Brother and Companion to bring you these Letters, and we beseech you that you would have him recommended, being a Follower of the Testament or Covenant of Christ. For if we knew that place would procure any Man righteousness, we would chiefly have recommended him as being Presbyter of the Church, which degree he is of." What there are need we recount the Catalogue of the Martyrs in the forefaid Epistle; some whereof were persecuted by being beheaded, others were cast for food to the Wild Beasts, and others again died in Prison? Or what need we reckon up the number of the Confessors which till that time survived? For he that is desirous, may easily and fully know all these things, by taking into his hands that Epistle, which, as I said, is inserted entire into our Collection of the Martyrs. And such were the things that happen'd in Antoninus's Time.

C H A P. V.

How God, having from Heaven heard the Prayers of some of our Religion, sent Rain to Marcus Aurelius Cæsar.

Report says, that when (a) M. Aurelius Cæsar, (a) Eusebius Brother to this Emperor, had drawn up his bus is mistaken, who says, that M. Aurelius was Brother to Augustus the Emperor, whereas M. Aurelius Antoninus was one and the same Person. His Adoptive Brother was not named Marcus, but Lucius Ælius Verus, as all Men know. But he, who fought against the German and Sarmatian (to whom God granted a sudden shower to allay his Soldiers thirst,) was not L. Ælius Verus, but M. Aurelius Antoninus, as all Historians do attest, which our Eusebius does confirm also in his Chronicon, where he says this was done in the 14th year of Antoninus, that is four or five years after the death of L. Ælius Verus. Valef.

(b) Melitina is a Country of Capadocia, situate between Comagenes and Catalonia, says Strabo in his 12 Book; who also relates, that that Country had no Cities. But afterwards Melitina became a famous City, which, upon a new division made of the Province, was attributed to Armenia the less; to says Amm. Marcellinus, who always calls it Melitina. Valef. That is, the name of that Legion; he means not the very Persons, which then were in it.

Rain, which fell upon that Army who had pray'd to God, and refresh'd it, when all the Men in it were just ready to perish with thirst. Which Story is related both by those Writers, (who are wholly estranged from our Religion,) whose care it was to commit to writing matters done in those times; and is also set forth by our own Writers. But the (c) Heathen Historians, because they are Heathen Writers, who have mentioned this thing, say the Rain was procured by the Incantations of Magicians: Others assert it to have been done by the Prayers of Marcus the Emperor. So Capitolinus in the Life of Marcus, and Claudian in the sixth Consulate of Honorius. Moreover, they have set forth the very Words of the Prayer, that Marcus used; which are these, Flamme dextera ad te, Jupiter, tendo, que nullius unquam sanguinem fudit; i. e. I stretch forth this right hand to thee, O Jupiter, which never shed the Blood of any Man. Valef.

(a) This Alciades must be distinguished from Alciades mentioned a little before in this Chapter. He, that is first named in this place, was a Companion of the B. Martyrs of Lyons. This Person here was (together with Montanus and Theodotus), a singler of the sect of the Catharists. Concerning whom see Chap. 16, and 17 of this Book. Valef.

arose a Dissention concerning these forefaid persons, the Brethren that were in Gallia did again subjoin their private Opinion also concerning these Men, (which was Religious and most Orthodox,) and annex'd several Epistles of those Martyrs that had ended their lives amongst them; which, being yet in Bonds, they wrote to the Brethren in Asia and Phrygia, and also to (b) Eleutherus then the Bishop of Rome, being (c) Embassadors for the Peace of the Church.

(b) Eleutherus Bishopp of Rome, was first deceived by the Montanists, who craftily hid their Error under the pretence of a feigned Piety. Moreover, being moved thereto by the Letters and Exhortations of the Martyrs of Lyons, he wrote an Epistle to the Churches of Asia and Phrygia, concerning the receiving of the Montanists into the Church. But being soon after admonished by one Praxeas of Asia, he revoked his pastick Letters which he had sent; and following the authority of his Predecessor Anicetus, refused to admit of a new Prophecy. So Tertullian, in his Book, against Praxeas. Valef.

(c) That is, the Brethren of Asia and Phrygia, as well as Eleutherus, were Embassadors for the Peace of the Church. See Book 3. Chap. 24. Note (a).

C H A P. IV.

How the Martyrs, by their Epistle, recommended Irenæus.

BUT the same (a) Martyrs recommended (b) Irenæus (who at that time was a Presbyter of Lyons) to the same Emperor, giving him a very good Testimony, as their own words do manifest, which are these: "We pray that you may in all things and always rejoice in God, Father (c) Eleutherus; (c) The King's, Maty, and Fulk MSS. read Eleutherus; as do also Nicophorus and Rufinus. But there are some who call him Eleutherus. Valef. we have entreated Irenæus our Brother and Companion to bring you these Letters, and we beseech you that you would have him recommended, being a Follower of the Testament or Covenant of Christ. For if we knew that place would procure any Man righteousness, we would chiefly have recommended him as being Presbyter of the Church, which degree he is of." What there are need we recount the Catalogue of the Martyrs in the forefaid Epistle; some whereof were persecuted by being beheaded, others were cast for food to the Wild Beasts, and others again died in Prison? Or what need we reckon up the number of the Confessors which till that time survived? For he that is desirous, may easily and fully know all these things, by taking into his hands that Epistle, which, as I said, is inserted entire into our Collection of the Martyrs. And such were the things that happen'd in Antoninus's Time.

(a) Blasius (in his Apology, Chap. 3. p. 26.) denies that the Martyrs of Lyons wrote to Eleutherus. For he asserts, that the Martyrdom of Pothinus, and the Lugdunensis, happened on the seventh year of Marcus the Emperor, on the year of Christ 167; at which time Soter was Bishop of Rome. The Martyrs of Lyons therefore could not write to Eleutherus who then had not succeeded Soter. But our Eusebius does refute Blasius, saying plainly, "That the same Martyrs recommended, &c. Valef. (b) Valefius, in his Note here, will not allow that Irenæus did actually go this journey to Rome; the Martyrs indeed, says he, had desired him, and he had promised to undertake it; but the heat of the Persecution coming on, and he being fix'd in the Presidency over the Church, could not be spared personally to undergo it. But since Eusebius clearly intimates, and St. Jeron (in Catalogo) and Baronius (at the year of Christ 179) do expressly affirm, that the Martyrs sent him upon this Errand, 'tis safest to grant his journey thither, tho' it must be while he was yet Presbyter, for so they particularly say he was in their Epistle to the Bishop of Rome, part of which our Eusebius has here inserted. See the Learned Dr. Cave's Apollonii; in the Life of St. Irenæus; p. 165. Edit. Lond. 1677.

alienated from the Faith, have mention'd the wonder indeed, but confels not that it was done by the Prayers of those of our Religion. But our Men, in that they are lovers of truth, have delivered what was done in a plain and ingenuous manner. Amongst which number is Apollinaris; who says, from that time that Legion, which by prayer had wrought that Miracle, had a name given it by the Emperor, accommodate to what was done, being call'd in the Roman tongue (d) Fulminata. Tertullian also is a Witness of this matter worthy to be credited, who dedicated to the Roman Senate an Apology for our Faith ( which we have before made mention of;) wherein he confirms this Story by a greater and more manifest Demonstration.

Thus therefore he writes, saying, (e) that the Letters of the most Intelligent Emperor Marcus were extant in his time; wherein he attests, that his Army in Germany, being ready to perish for want of Water, was preserv'd by the Christians Prayers. He says moreover, that this Emperor threaten'd those with death, who attempted to accuse them of our Religion. To which the foremention'd Writer adds these words also: (f) What manner of Laws therefore are these, which the impious, unjust, and cruel persons bring against us? Such Laws as Vespasian did not observe, altho' he had conquer'd the Jews; which Trajan in part dissannul'd, forbidding that the Christians should be sought for; which neither Adrian, (altho' an inquisitive searcher into all things that were curious,) nor he who was surnam'd Pius, did make authentic. But let every one determine, concerning these things according to his own pleasure; we will proceed upon the Series of the subsequent Parts of our History. Pothinus therefore having finish'd his life, (together with those that suffer'd Martyrdom in Gallia,) when he was ninety years old compleat, (g) Irenaeus succeeded in the Bishoprick of Lyons, which See Pothinus presided over. This Irenaeus was, we understand, an Auditor of Polycarp's in his younger years. This person setting down (in his third Book against Heretics) the Succession of the Bishops of the Rome, closes his Catalogue with Eleutherus, (whose Name and Actions we now make our Researches into) because in his time he compiled that elaborate of the same Work: He writes thus.

Christians Soldiers, we do readily give credit to the attestation of Apollinaris and Tertullian; but Apollinaris has not yet persuaded me to believe, that the Legion Melitina was named the Lightning-Legion upon that account. Some may object, that there was indeed a Legion called the Lightning-Legion, before Antoninus's time, but that he gave the Legion Melitina that name also, because of the benefit he received by their means. But, if it were so, it ought to be called the second Lightning-Legion: And yet Dio makes no mention of any such Legion, altho' he reckons up exactly all the Legions enroled by the former Emperors. Moreover, Dio says, that the Lightning-Legion had its station in Cappadocia, which agrees very well with the Legion Melitina. In the Book call'd Notitia Imperii Romani, the prefecture of the 12 Legion, termed Fulminata, at Melitina, is reckoned under the disposition of the Duke of Armenia. Whence 'tis collected that Melitina was not the name of the Legion, but of the Town, wherein the 12 Legion, call'd Fulminata, abode. But 'twas not usual to give the Legions their denomination from the places where they were in Garrison, but from the Countreys wherein they were inrolled. Therefore, what Eusebius says concerning the Legion Melitina, seems to me scarce probable. Besides, Rufinus purposely omitted this name of the Legion, as I suppose, because he knew that Melitina was the name of a Town in Armenia the Less, wherein the 12 Legion, call'd Fulminata, kept guard in his time. But (that I may freely say what I think) it seems not very probable to me, that a whole Legion of Roman Soldiers should at that time be Christians; which yet Eusebius seems to affirm: Who errs in this also, because he has not produced the place of Apollinaris, nor shown the Book wherein he wrote these things. But the Words, with which Eusebius closes this whole Story, do sufficiently shew, that he himself doubted of the truth of this matter: For thus he says, in this Chap. Let every one determine concerning these things according to his own pleasure. Valef.

(g) Baronius has placed the Election of Irenaeus to the See of Lyons at the year of Christ 180. For after the death of Pothinus, which happened in the year 179, he says that See was vacant till the heat of the Persecution was over. Valef. Dr. Cave, in his Chronological Table, says, Pothinus died in the year of Christ 177. to whom succeeded Irenaeus the Year following.

A Catalogue of those who were Bishops of Rome.

THE blessed Apostles therefore, having founded and built the Church, delivered the Episcopal Office to Linus; of whom Paul has made mention in his Epistles to **Timotheus*. A * 2<sup>d</sup> Tim. c. 1. necesse succeeded him; after whom, in the third 4th 21. place from the Apostles, Clement had the Bishoprick allotted to him; who had seen the blessed Apostles, and was conversant with them; and as yet he had the Preaching of the Apostles sounding in his ears, and their Tradition before his eyes: And not he alone; for at that time there were many yet remaining alive, who had been taught by the Apostles. In the times of this Clement, when no small Diffention rose among the Brethren at Corinth, the Church of Rome sent a most compleat and agreeable Epistle to the Corinthians, joyning them together in peace, and renewing their Faith, and the Tradition they had lately received from the Apostles. And after some few words he says, Evarestus succeeded this Clement, and Alexander Evarestus; then Xystus was constituted the sixth from the Apostles: After him Telephorus, who suffer'd a glorious Martyrdom, after him Hyginus; then Pius; after Pius Anicetus: Soter having succeeded Anicetus, Eleutherus is now in possession of the Episcopal Office, in the twelfth place from the Apostles. In this same Order and (a) Succession, both the Tradition of the Apostles in the Church, and also the Promulgation of the Truth, is descended unto us.

(a) Our MSS. Copies read Doctrina; I would rather read [Traditio] Succession; as Christophorus, Sir Henry Savil, and the old Translator of Irenaeus read it. Valef.

That, even to these Times, Miracles were wrought by the Faithful.

ALL this, being agreeable to what we have deliver'd in the foregoing Books of our History, Irenaeus has given his assent to, in those five Books of his, which he entitl'd, The Confutation and Overthrow of Knowledge falsely so called; in the second Book of which Subject he does in these words manifest, that even in his days there remain'd in some Churches examples of the Divine and Wonderful Power of God in working Miracles, saying; 'So far are they from raising the Dead, as the Lord and the Apostles did by Prayer. And frequently amongst the Brotherhood, (the whole Church of one place having with much fasting and (a) prayer requested) the (a) The Max. Med. bert Stephens, apocrypha, Purity. Valef.

Soul of the Defunct has return'd into his Body, and the Man has had the benefit of life confer'd upon him by the Prayers of the Saints." And again, after the interposition of some words, he says; "But if they say, that the Lord wrought such Miracles as these in appearance only, not really, we will bring them to the Oracles of the Prophets, and from thence demonstrate that all things were thus predicated concerning him, and most undoubtedly done by him, and that he only is the Son of God. Therefore they which are his true Disciples, receiving grace from him, do in his name perform all things for the benefit of the rest of Mankind; according as every one of them hath receiv'd the Gift from him. For some of them do certainly and truly cast out Devils; in so much that those very persons, who were cleansed from Evil Spirits, frequently become Believers, and continue in the Church. Others have the fore-knowledge of things future, and Visions, and utter prophetick Predications. Others by the imposition of their Hands heal the Sick, and restore them to their former soundness; and moreover, as we said, the Dead also have been rais'd; who continued with us many years after! What shall we say more? We cannot declare the number of the Gifts, which the Church throughout the whole world having receiv'd from God, in the name of Jesus Christ, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate, does daily perform for the benefit of the Nations: She uses no deceit towards any person, neither does she sell her Gifts; for as she has freely receiv'd them from God, so she freely ministers them to others." And in another place the same Author writes thus: "In like manner as we have heard many Brethren in the Church who had Prophetick Gifts, and by the Spirit spoke all sorts of languages; who also revealed the Secrets of Men, in such cases as 'twas profitable and necessary, and explain'd the Mysteries of God. And thus much [concerning this matter, to wit] that Diversities of Gifts continued with such as were worthy, until those times before-manifested.

C H A P. VIII.

After what manner Irenæus makes mention of the Divine Scriptures.

BUT because in the beginning of this Work of ours, we promised, that we would produce in due place the words of the ancient Ecclesiastick Presbyters and Writers, wherein they have deliver'd in writing the Traditions concerning the Books of the Old and New Testament which came to their hands, ((a) of which number Irenæus was one;) Come on, we will here adjoin his words; and first what he has said of the Sacred Gospels, after this manner: "Matthew published

(a) These words (ἡ τῶν δέ) εὐαγγέλιον ἡν, i. e. of which number Irenæus was one seem to be superfluous, and written in the Margin only, by some Scholiast. But they are in the Mag. Med. Fub. and Savil MSS. Valef.

his Gospel among the Hebrews, written in their own Language, whilst Peter and Paul were preaching the Gospel at Rome, and founding the Church. (b) After their death, Mark the Disciple

(b) Irenæus, in that he affirms here, that The Gospel according to Mark was written after the death of Paul and Peter, does contradict what Eusebius related before at the 15th Chap. of the second Book: Where he says Mark's Gospel was publish'd at Rome, whilst Peter was alive, and approved of by that Apostle. But 'tis no wonder that the ancient Fathers disagree amongst themselves in this matter; seeing we have almost nothing of certainty about the writing of the Sacred Gospels, save that they are four, and written by four several Authors. But when, or for what reason they were written, and whether the Gospel of St. Matthew were first penned in Hebrew, 'tis not very evident. Valef.

and Interpreter of Peter, deliver'd to us in writing what Peter had preach'd. Luke also, the Follower of Paul, compiled in a Book the Gospel preach'd by him. Afterwards John the Disciple of the Lord, he that lean'd on his Breast, publish'd a Gospel, when he lived at Ephesus [a City] of Asia." Thus much the forementioned Author has said in the third Book of the foreaid Work: And in his fifth Book he discourses thus concerning the Revelation of John, and the number of Antichrist's name: "These things being thus, and this number being extant in all accurate and ancient Copies; and those very persons who saw John face to face, attesting the truth of these things, even reason doth teach us, that the number of the Beast's name, according to the computation of the Grecians, is made apparent by the Letters contain'd in it." And after some other Passages, he speaks thus concerning the same John: "We therefore will not run the hazard of affirming any thing too positively concerning the name of Antichrist: For if his name were to have been openly declared in this Age, it would have been express'd by him who saw the Revelation. For it was not seen long since, but almost in our Age, about the end of Domitian's Reign." Thus much is related by the foreaid Author concerning the Revelation. He mentions also the first Epistle of John, and produces many Authorities out of it; as also out of the second Epistle of Peter. He not only knew, but also approv'd of the Book call'd Papias, saying, "Truly therefore hath that Book said which contains this, Before all things believe that there is one God, who created and set in order all things, and so forth." He quotes some words out of the

(c) Wisdom of Solomon, saying in a manner thus; "The Vision of God procures Incorruption, and Incorruption makes us near unto God." He makes mention also of the (d) sayings of an Apostolick Presbyter (whose name he has concealed) and annexes his Expositions of the Divine Scriptures. Moreover, he makes mention of Justin Martyr and Ignatius, quoting also Authorities out of their Writings. The same person has promised to confute Marcion in a separate Volume, by Arguments pick'd out of his own Writings. And concerning the Translation of the divinely-inspired Scriptures, hear what he writes word for word: "God therefore was made Man, and the Lord himself saved us, having given the Sign of the Virgin: But not, as some say, who are so audacious as to traduce the Scriptures; Behold, a young Woman shall conceive, and bring forth a Son; as (e) Theodotion the Ephesian has translated (d) Irenæus, it, and Aquila of Pontus, both Jewish Proselytes: as is (e) Whom the Ebionites having follow'd, say, that Christ was begotten by Joseph." Hereunto, after a few words, he adds, saying; "For before the Romans had firmly compleated their Empire, (the mention of Theodotion.

(c) All the Ancient Ecclesiastick Writers (as before was noted) call that Book the Wisdom of Solomon, which we now call the Proverbs. But that Book entitled now the Wisdom of Solomon, is Apocryphal. Valef.

(d) Ἀποστολικὸν πρεσβύτερον (the term here in the original) does properly signify, the sayings of Wise Men, which are repeated by beari. Valef.

Wherefore we will see, if from hence we can make out the time when Theodotion lived. Epiphanius (in his Book De ponderib.) says, Theodotion flourish'd under Commodus, and then put forth his Translation. The Chronicon of Alexandria follows Epiphanius's Opinion, and says he publish'd that Work in the sixth year of the Emperor Commodus. I judge Theodotion to be somewhat antienter. For, seeing Irenæus has mention'd him in his Books against Heretics, (which Books, 'tis manifest, he wrote when Eleutherius was Bishop of Rome; for he says so in the third Book of that Work,) we must necessarily grant that Theodotion flourish'd before Eleutherius was made Bishop of Rome. Valef.

Mr. Aurelius and L. Verus Macedonians as yet possessing the Government of Asia, (f) Prolemaeus the Son of Lagus, endeavouring with much care and industry to adorn the Library he had prepared at Alexandria, with the Writings of all Men, which were accurately compiled, requested those of Jerusalem, that he might have (g) their Scriptures translated into the Greek Language. They (for till that time they were subject to the Macedonians) sent to Prolemaeus the Seventy Seniors, which were the most skilful persons among them in the Scriptures, and most expert in both the Languages; (h) satisfying the King's desire herein. [Pisology] desirous to make trial of every one of them, and being fearful lest by compact they should agree to conceal the Truth of the Scriptures by their Translation, (i) separated them one from another, and commanded every one of them to write a Translation: And this he did throughout all the Books. When they were come all together into the same place in the presence of Prolemy, and had compared together the Version of every particular person amongst them, God was both glorified, and the Scriptures acknowledg'd to be truly Divine: For they all from the beginning to the end, set down the same things in the same words, and in the same expressions; insomuch, that the Gentiles who were present, acknowledg'd (the Scriptures were translated by the Inspiration of God. Neither need it seem marvellous that God should do this, seeing that in the Captivity of the People under Nebuchadonisor, the Scriptures being then corrupted,) when after seventy years the Jews return'd to their own Country; afterwards, in the times of Artaxerxes King of the Persians, he inspir'd Ezdras the Priest of the Tribe of Levi to recompose all the Books of the former Prophets, and restore to the People the Law deliver'd by Moses. Thus far Irenaeus.

In that of his Successor Philadelphus: Which to me seems very probable. For, seeing Arifobolus, Jocephus, and Tertullian do say in express Words, that Demetrius Phalarus put Pisology upon this business; and it being manifest that the said Demetrius was in great favour with, and authority under, Prolemy the Son of Lagus, and died soon after him, we must necessarily say that this Translation (if it were done by the procurement of Demetrius) was begun in the Reign of Pisology the Son of Lagus. And, seeing that Philadelphus reigned about two Years together with his Father, being made his Colleague in the Kingdom, therefore perhaps 'tis related that this Translation was made under both the Princes. Valef. The Learned Petavius is of the same opinion with Valef, in this matter; as may be seen from his Annotations on Epiphanius's Book De ponderib. pag. 379. Edit. Paris. 1622.

(g) Clemens Alexandrinus says, the 72 Seniors translated all the Books (as well those of the Law, as those of the Prophets) of the Scripture into Greek. To whom agrees Theodoret, in his Preface to his Comment on the Psalms, Olympiodorus, and almost all other Writers. But Arifobolus and Jocephus, both Jewish Writers, do intimate that the Law only was by them turned into Greek. Arifobolus's Words may be seen B. 13. of Eusebius de preparat. and Jocephus's in his Preface to his Antiquities. But to this it may be answered, That the Jews, under the name of the Law, do sometimes comprehend the Prophets also. See Majus's Preface to the Greek Edition of Joshua. Valef.

(h) *Valef*us reads this passage thus [τοιαυτὰς τῶν ὁμῶν ἐκδόσεις], i. e. satisfying the King's desire herein. He says Christophorus read this place so, and Sir Henry Savile in his MS. But the King's, the Mar. Med. and Fut. MSS. (as he says) and Robert Stephens, in his Edit. read it thus [τοιαυτὰ τῶν τῶν ὁμῶν ἐκδόσεις], i. e. God having done according to his own Will. We follow *Valef*us; but leave the Reader to his Liberty.

(i) Clemens the Martyr (in his megalestics to the Gentiles) says the 72 Seniors were by Prolemy put into many Cells; of the ruins of which he saw at Alexandria; Epiphanius (in his Book de ponderib.) says the King placed them two and two in a Cell. These Words of Jerome agree best with Justin's account of this matter. Others there are, who decide this whole Story about the Cells; because neither Jocephus, nor Arifobolus, nor Philo make any mention of them. See Petavius's Annot. on Epiphanius, pag. 378. Edit. Paris; and Mr. Gregory's Discourse (of Oxford) concerning the 70 Interpreters.

Who were Bishops in the Reign of Commodus.

Concerning Pantanus the Philosopher.

AT that time there was a Man, Governour of the School of the Faithful there, who upon account of his Learning was most eminent; his name was Pantenus: For from a very ancient custom there had been an Ecclesiastical School among them, which also continued to our days; and we have been informed that 'tis furnish'd with Men who are very able Scholars, and industrious about Divine Matters. But Fame says, that the foremention'd Pantenus was at that time the most eminent person among them, because he was bred up in the Precepts and Institutions of that Philosophical Sect call'd Stoicks. Moreover, 'tis said, he shew'd so great a willingness of mind and ardency of affection towards the [Publication of the] Divine Word, that he was declared the Preacher of Christ's Gospel to the Nations of the East, and journeyed as far as India. For there were many Evangelical Preachers of the Word even at that time, who inflamed with a Divine Zeal, in imitation of the Apostles, contributed their assistance to the enlargement of the Divine Word, and the building Men up in the Faith. Of which number Pantenus was one, and is reported to have gone to the Indians. Where, as 'tis famed, he found the Gospel according to Matthew, amongst some that had the knowledge of Christ there, before his arrival. To whom Bartolomew one of the Apostles had preach'd, and (a) left them the Gospel of St. Matthew written in Hebrew; which was preserved to the fore-said times. Moreover, this Pantenus, after many excellent Performances, was at last made Governour of the School at Alexandria; where by that Pantenus's Discourses and Writings he set forth to publication the Treasures of the Divine Points.

Turning from India to Alexandria, brought with him that Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew. But Eusebius does not say so. For by that which he adds, [τοῦ αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ δαυιδικῷ γέγραπτο], he means only thus much, viz. That that Copy of Bartolomew's was preserved until Pantenus came into India. So Nicephorus expounds Eusebius's Words, B. 4. Chap. 32. but I assent not to Nicephorus, in that which he says further, to wit, That that Gospel of St. Matthew, which Pantenus found in India, was dilated there by Bartolomew. I rather believe that Copy was brought thither by Bartolomew out of Judea. Further, Jerom (in Catalog.) says, the Gospel of St. Matthew, written in Hebrew, was preserved in the Library of Cæsaria (collected by Pamphilus the Martyr) even in his time. But I doubt 'twas the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which the Nazareans used. For some thought, that this Gospel of the Hebrews was the original Copy of St. Matthew's Gospel; but that's a mistake. Valef.

C H A P. XI.

Concerning Clemens Alexandrinus.

AT the same time flourish'd Clemens at Alexandria, (being laborious together with Pantenus in the Studies of the Divine Scriptures,) who had the same name with that ancient Prelate of the Roman Church, that was a Disciple of the Apostles

Commodus Apokles. He (in his Book (a) of Institutions) makes express mention of Pantenus, as having been his Master. To me he seems to mean the same person also, in the first Book of his Stratagem, where recording, *the most eminent Successors of the Apostolick Doctrine by whom he had been instructed, he says thus: 'Now this Work of mine I have not composed for Ostentation, but these Memoirs I have treasured up, as a Remedy against the Forgetfulness of mine old age; that they may be a true representation and adumbration of those lively and powerful Discourses, which I have had the happiness to hear from blessed and truly worthy and memorable persons. Of which one was Ionicus, [whom I heard] in Greece; another in † Magna Græcia; the first of them was a Celo-Syrian, the other an Egyptian. Others of them lived in the East: of which one was an (b) Affrian, the other in Palestine, by original extract an (c) Hebrew.' The last [Master] I met with, (who yet was the first and chiefest in power and virtue, whom I inquisitively sought out and found lying hid in Egypt) I did fully acquiesce in, and searched no further. These therefore preserving the sincere Tradition of the Blessed Doctrine, which they had immediately received from the Holy Apostles Peter, James, John, and Paul, (like Children from the hands of their Parents, although few Children be like their Parents) are by God's Blessing come down to our time, sowing those Primitive and Apostolick Seeds [of Truth.]

are lost. Yet the Excerpta out of Theodotus, which are extant after his Stratagem, seem to be taken out of his Institutions; which I wonder no Body has taken notice of before. This I conclude to be true, both because in those Excerpta out of Theodotus there are the same things said of Christ, which Photius attests he read in Clement's Books of Institutions; and also because the Author of those Excerpta does, about the end of them, call Pantenus Master. Now Pantenus was Clement's Master, as Eusebius says in this Chapter; whom Clement in his Institutions, does often quote, as Photius relates.

† It was that part of Italy, which since is called Calabria.

(b) Valefius thinks this Person was Tatianus, Justin the Martyr's Scholar; Baronius says 'twas Bardeanes, of whom see B. 4. chap. the last; but he was no Affrian; for he was of Edessa, the chief City of Osroëna.

(c) Baronius says, this was Theophilus Bishop of Cæsarea; but I rather think him to have been Theodotus; which I conjecture from hence, because the Epitome of Clement's Institutions is entitled, [ἐκ τῶν Θεοδοῦ τοῦ ἀρχιεπισκόπου ἐκ τῆς ὁδοῦ τοῦ ἁγίου, i. e. [the Epitome of Theodotus his Oriental Doctrine.] For Clement calls that the Oriental Doctrine, which he learned from his Masters in the East. I have two Arguments to persuade me, that Clement does not here mean Theophilus of Cæsarea; (1) Theophilus was contemporary with Clement, for he flourished in the times of Peter Bishop of Rome, as we are inform'd by our Eusebius. (2.) None of the Ancients ever said that Theophilus was a Hebrew, or, which is all one, a Jew. Valef.

C H A P. XII.

Concerning the Bishops of Jerusalem.

AT that time Narcissus, Bishop of the Church at Jerusalem, flourish'd, a Man very famous amongst many even at this time: He was the fifteenth in succession from the Siege of the Jews under Adrian. From which time we have before manifested, that the Church of the Gentiles was first constituted there, after those of the Circumcision; and also that Mark was the first Bishop of the Gentiles that presided over them. After whom the (a) Successions of the [Bishops] there do shew that Cassianus had the Episcopal Chair; after him Publius; then Maximus; and after these Julianus;

(a) The most famous Churches, especially those which were founded by the Apostles, did with great care keep the Successions of their Bishops laid up amongst their Archives, recording their names, and the day of their deaths, in a pair of Writing-tables. These our Eusebius had diligently examin'd, as appears from this place; and he has digested the Bishops of the principal Sees from the authority of these Tables only. Wherefore, the Successions of Bishops, which are recounted in the History and Chronicles of Eusebius, are highly to be prized, as being the ancientest and most certain. Valef.

then Caius; to whom succeeded Symmachus; then Commodus another Caius, and again Julianus the Second: Moreover Capito, (b) Valeus, and Dolichianus; last (b) Before of all this Narcissus, who in a continued Series of this Valeus, Succession was the thirtieth from the Apostles. the names of two Bishops are wanting, to wit, Maximus, and Antoninus, which were omitted by the negligence of the Transcribers. For, seeing Eusebius affirm'd Narcissus to have been the fifteenth Bishop of Jerusalem from Mark, and the thirtieth from the Apostles; that can't be unless you add two Bishops here. Eusebius indeed, in his Chronicon, after Capito the twenty-sixth from the Apostles, reckons Maximus, and Antoninus; after these Valeus, and Dolichianus; and then Narcissus. Georg. Synellus and Nicetophorus do agree with Eusebius; only between Julianus and Capito they insert one Helias, whom Eusebius does not admit of. Valef.

C H A P. XIII.

Concerning Rhodon, and the Diffusion of the Marcionites, which he has made mention of.

ABOUT the same time also Rhodon, born in Asia, (who, as himself relates, had been instructed at Rome by Tatianus, whom we mention'd before,) wrote many Books, and together with others engaged against the Heresie of Marcion. Which, he relates, was in his time divided into several Opinions. He has recorded the Authors of this Diffusion, and with exquisite diligence confuted the Lyes invented by every one of 'em. Hear therefore what he has written in these words. 'Wherefore also they disagree amongst themselves, because they are assertors of an Opinion which is ill put together. For Apelles, one of their Gang, ((a) who boasts of his age, and pretends to lead a more abstemious and strict course of life,) confesses there is but one Principle; but says, the Oracles of the Prophets proceed from an opposite Spirit, being induced to believe this by the responses of a Virgin, possessed with a Devil, by name Philumena. But o' senectus theirs of them, (in like manner as does Marcion himself, the (b) Mariner) assert, there are two Principles; of which number are (c) Potius, and making an Basiliscus; and these Followers of that * Wolf of advantage Pontus, being unable to find out the distinction of things, (which neither could he do,) have given themselves over to raffiness, and have firmly and without any thing of demonstration of firm'd there are two Principles. Others again (differing) from these, and running themselves into worle [Affertions,] suppose there are not only two, but also three Natures. Of which a more fort Synerus was the Ringleader and first Founder, as the Defenders of his Doctrine do say. The same Author writes that he discours'd with Apelles; he says thus; 'For the old Man Apelles, having had a conference with us, was convinc'd that he could boast of his Continency; who was rejected by Marcion, because he was a Fornicator, and afterwards retreated to Alexandria, as Tertullian affirms in his Book of prescription. Wherefore let us see whether the word [apelles] in this does not signify something else here; it sometimes denotes the Office of a Decurio, or Captain over ten hombres; for these Commanders are by the Græcians called πολιτάρχαι, or πολιτάρχων, as I have observed in my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus. Alas, a Man may conjecture, that this place should be written thus, τὸν παλαιὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ πύργου, i. e. his venerable hoary barren and old age. For Apelles was commonly called old Man; and so Rhodon terms him in this Chapter. Eusebius favours our conjecture, B. 6. Chap. 39, where speaking of Alexander the Bishop, he uses this very phrase. Valef.

(b) The King's MS. and Stephens Edition do here insert these two Words [ἐν αἰσῶνι, the Mariner] but they are wanting in the Max. Med. and Fak. MSS. Indeed Tertullian, in his Book of prescription does testify that Marcion was at first a Mariner. Ubi textus, says he, Marcion Ponticus naucularius, Stoice studiosus ? Valef.

(c) The King's MS. and Robert Stephens's Edition call this Man's name Potius; the Max. Med. Fak. and Swail MSS. term him Potius; so does Refutatio, in his Version; and Theodoret B. 1. Hæret. Fab. Valef.

* He means Marcion; see B. 4. Chap. 11.

Commodus. he maintain'd many things that were false; upon which account he said Faith should in no wise be too severely inquired into, but, that every one should persevere in what he believ'd. For he asserted, that those who hoped in [Christ] crucified should be saved, provided they be found doing of good works. He concluded the [Question] concerning God, to be to him (as we said before) the most obscure thing of all. For he affirm'd there was but one Principle, as our Religion asserts." Then, having set forth his whole Opinion, he subjoyns these words; "But when I said to him, whence have you this Demonstration, or for what Reason can you affirm there is but one Principle, tell us? He answer'd, That the Prophecies confuted themselves, because they utter'd nothing that was true: for they disagree, and are false, and opposite to themselves; but, how there was but one Principle, he profess'd he knew not, but was induc'd only to think so. After this, when I conjured him to speak the truth, he swore he spoke what was true, to wit, that he knew not how there could be one unbegotten God, but he believ'd it. I laugh'd, and reprehended him, because he stiled himself a Doctor, and knew not how to make good what he taught." But, in the same Book which he dedicated to Callistus, the said Rhodan doth confess that he himself was instructed at Rome by Tatianus. Moreover he says, Tatianus compiled a Book of Questions; wherein Tatianus having promised to explain the dark and obscure Passages of the Sacred Scriptures, this Rhodan professes he would set forth the Solutions to his Questions. There is also extant of this Person's a Comment upon the six Days Work of the Creation. Indeed, this Apelles utter'd many impious expressions against the Law of Moses, in many Books speaking irreverently of the Divine Scriptures, and using his utmost diligence to confute, and (as he thought) to overthrow them. But thus much concerning these things.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the False Prophets of the Cataphrygians.

Moreover, that Adversary of God's Church, (who hates Goodness, and makes Mischief his chiefest delight,) omitting in no wise any ways or methods of Treachery towards Men, caus'd new Heresies to grow up against the Church: The Followers whereof crawled, like venomous Serpents, all over Asia and Phrygia; and boasted that Montanus was the Paraclete, and that the two Women, Priscilla and Maximilla, his Companions, were his Prophetesses.

* That is, the Holy Ghost; whom St. John, in his Gospel, does several times call ὁ Παράκλητος, Comforter. See Jo. 1. 6.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the Schism of Blasius raised at Rome.

Others also sprang up at Rome, whom Flavianus, degraded from being a Presbyter of the Church, headed. Blasius was in like manner entangled in the same (a) Error. Which two Persons drew away many from the Church, and incited them to embrace their Opinion; each of the term them severally endeavouring to introduce Innovations against the Truth.

(a) Rufinus and Chrysostom supposed the term them severally endeavouring to introduce Innovations against the Truth. Rufinus takes it in such a sense as to signify, a discharging; and thought that Blasius, as well as Flavianus, was degraded from being a Presbyter. Valf.

CHAP. XVI.

What has been committed to memory concerning Montanus, and his False Prophets.

Moreover, that Power, which is the Defender of the Truth, rais'd up Apollinaris (Bishop of Hierapolis, whom we made mention of before,) and together with him many others, who at that time were eloquent and learned Men, as it were a strong and inexpugnable Defence against the said Heresie of the Cataphrygians. By which persons we have a copious Subject left us for this our History. (a) One of the said persons therefore, in the Preface to his Work against the Cataphrygians, does in the first place shew that he assailed them with unwritten Arguments: For he begins after this manner; "Having a sufficient while since been enjoy'd by thee, beloved (b) Avrician Marcellus, to write a Book against the Heresie (c) of Miltiades, till now I have in a manner continued doubtful and uncertain; not that I wanted ability both to confute Falsehood, and also to give evidence to the Truth; but I was fearful and cautious, lest to some I should seem by writing to add to, or (d) make a further determination about the Doctrine of the New Covenant of the Gospel: To which nothing must be added, nor any thing taken away from it, by him that resolves to lead alive agreeable to the Gospel itself. But, being lately at Ancyra [a City] of Galatia, and finding it was A (e) filled with the noise of this New (not, as they call it, Prophecy, but, as it shall be demonstrated,) False Prophecy; as well as I was able, (God assisting me,) I discours'd (f) frequently in the Church many days, both concerning these very things, and also about other [Points] propos'd by them: Inasmuch that the Church did greatly rejoice, his Book was confirm'd in the Truth; but the Adversaries were at that time confuted; and (g) the Enemies of God made sorrowful. When him to be and afterwards thinks 'twas Rhodan. Apollinaris of Hierapolis was not the Author of this Book, 'tis from hence manifest, because he wrote against the Cataphrygian Heresie when it newly arose, as Eusebius attests at the end of Book 4. But this unknown Author compiled his Books after the death of Montanus, Maximilla, and Theodotus, as appears by the fragments of them quoted in this Chapter. See Hallaxius in his Notes on the Life of Apollinaris, chap. 3. Valf.

(b) In the Greek Menology at the 22d of October, mention is made of the Holy Avercius, (b) Nicephorus calls him Book 4. Bishop of Hierapolis, a worker of Miracles. Hallaxius put forth this Person's Life in Greek, Tome 2. concerning the famous Writers of the Eastern Church. Valf.

(c) Why this Author without a name, calls the Heresie of the Cataphrygians, the Sect of Miltiades, rather than of Montanus, 'tis hard to be determined. For he means not here that Miltiades, of whom Eusebius speaks in the following Chapter. For he wrote for the Catholic Truth against the Cataphrygians. The Learned Langus, who translated Nicephorus, at this place put in Alcibiades in stead of Miltiades. Indeed Alcibiades is by Eusebius (B. 4. Chap. 3.) named amongst the principal Abettors of the Cataphrygian Heresie. Therefore we must either read Alcibiades here, or Miltiades there. Valf.

(d) The King's MS. and Nicephorus (Book 4. Chap. 23.) in stead of [ἡ πόλις, i. e. throughout Pontus] reads it [ἡ πόλις τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, i. e. the Church of the place,] to wit, Ancyra. Valf.

(e) Διατεταραχμένη That is, filled with the noise of, &c. For the whole Church of that place founded with the rumour of this New Prophecy, inasmuch as, by reason of the strangeness of this great matter, all Men talk'd of it. Hence it appears, that the gift of Prophecy was in those times rare and unusual in the Church; seeing that the Prophecy of Montanus which then arose, stir'd up at that time such Commotions in the Church. Which certainly had not happened, had the gift of Prophecy been then common in the Church. Valf.

(f) Sir Hen. Savil (in the Margin of his Copy) made it ἡμεῖς, i. e. continually, daily; So Christopherson read it. Valf.

(g) The reading of the Ek, and MS. is ἑαυτοῦ, i. e. the Enemies of God. So he calls the Montanists, because they were the introducers of a new Paraclete, or Holy Ghost. Valf.

Commodus. sorrowful. When therefore the Presbyters of that place requested me to leave some written Record of what had been spoken against those Adversaries to the Word of Truth; (b) Zoticus Oreanus our Fellow-Presbyter, being then present also; (c) I did not indeed do that; but promised, that (by the assistance of the Lord,) I would write here, and send it quickly and carefully unto them. Having said these words and some others after these in the Preface of his Book, he proceeds, and sets forth the Author of the foregoing Heresie after this manner. 'This their stubborn Contention therefore against the Church, and this new Heretical Separation [from it] had this original. There is said to be a certain Village in that (i) Myfia [which borders upon] Phrygia, called by the name of Aradaba. There, they lay, one of those who had newly embrac'd the Faith, by name Montanus, (when Gratus was

(1) There were heretico-heretic two Myfia's, (so also two Phrygia's), says Strabo, B. 22. The one called the Greater, which Strabo calls Olympene; the other the Less, which Protemy calls Hellepontia. Both of them bordered on Phrygia. Whence arose the Greek Proverb [ἡμεῖς καὶ οὐρανὸν] concerning which see Euseb. Hist. p. 171. Edit. Westelman. There was also another Myfia in Europe, which the Latines call Myfia, but the Greeks always Myfia. To distinguish this Myfia therefore from the other, 'tis filled here [ἡ ἐν ἡμετέροις μυσία i.e. That Myfia which borders on Phrygia; or Myfia in Asia. In the Map, MS. this Town is called Aradaba. Valef.

Proconsul of Asia,) by reason of his immoderate desire after, and love for, the chief place, gave the Adversary an entrance into himself, and was fill'd with the Devil; and being on a sudden possess'd with a furious and frantick temper of Mind, became perfectly mad, and began to utter strange and barbarous expressions, foretelling what was to come; [a thing which is] contrary to the Order and Institution of the Church received from ancient Tradition, and [propagated] by a continued Succession. Now, of those who at that time were at the hearing of his counterfeited Expressions, some with indignation rebuked him, as being moved by, and possess'd with, a Devil and a Spirit of Error, and as being a disturber of the Multitude: They prohibited him also to speak; [for] they were mindful of the Lord's * Premonition and his Menaces, [whereby we are commanded] with vigilancy to beware of the coming of false Prophets. But others, as if they had been inspir'd by the Holy Ghost and with the gift of Prophecy, conceiv'd also very high thoughts of themselves, and being unmindful of the † Lord's Premonition, provok'd that insatiable, flattering and seducing Spirit [to speak;] and being excited and deceived by it, forbad it should any more be silenc'd. By this Art, or rather by this Method of Subtlety and Mischief, the Devil plotted Destruction against those that were disobedient to [the Lord's Premonition;] and, being undeserv'dly honour'd by them, he excited and enkindled their Minds, foolish and strange expressions; and those who delighted in and boasted of that Matter, that Spirit pronounced blessed, and put them up with the greatness of the Promises. Sometimes also, making use of conjectural and credible Arguments, he condemn'd them publicly, that so he might also seem a (l) reproving [Spirit.] Those few, who were deceiv'd, were Phrygians. But this insolent Spirit taught them to revile the whole Church under Heaven, because this Spirit their of false Prophecy receiv'd neither honour from, nor found any way of entrance into it. For when the Faithful throughout Asia had met often and in many places of Asia upon this account, and had enquired into this new Doctrine, and determined it to be prophane, and reject'd this Heresie, they were expell'd out of the Church, and interdicted Communion [with the Faithful.]

(k) Ἀποκατασταθῆναι. 'Tis a metaphor taken from Women, who leaving their Husbands Beds, go by health to that of the Adulterer. For [κοιταῖσθαι] to sleep, is often used for these adulteries, as it occurs frequently in Sacred Writ. Valef.

Having related thus much in the beginning [of his Work] and subjoyn'd, throughout that whole Book, a confutation of their Error: In his second Book he says these words, concerning the Death of the foremention'd Persons. 'Whereas therefore they have termed us the Murderers of the Prophets, because we have not admitted of their prattling and lying Prophets, (for these, they say, are those whom the Lord promised to send his People,) let them answer us for God's sake, Is there any one of those, (most excellent!) who even from Montanus and his Women began to speak, that hath been persecuted by the Jews, or slain by the Impious? nor one: Is there any one of them who has been apprehended and crucified for the Name [of Christ?] None at all. Neither hath any of their Women been scourg'd in the Synagogues of the Jews, or stoned; [Not one of them] anywhere or in any wife: yea, Montanus and Maximilla are said to have died another manner of death. For, 'tis famed, both these Persons, incited thereto by that furious Spirit, hang'd themselves; not together, but each of them at the time of their death, as 'tis strongly reported. And so they died and put an end to their Lives after the same manner that the Traitor Judas did. In like manner, also common Fame says, that that admirable [Fellow] Theodotus, who was, as it were, the

(m) Amongst the Montanists there was a certain Chief, into which those of their Party put Money, which was for the maintenance of the Prophets. Theodotus was the first that look'd after the Chief; whom this Author does therefore call the Procurator of their Prophecy. Montanus with his Prophetesses was otherwise; a great Cozen, who under a pretence of Offerings, scraped much Money together. He usually gave Salaries to the Preachers of his Doctrine. 'Twas necessary therefore he should have his Treasury, who was to oversee and look after it, who also might deliver out the stipends to such as Montanus ordered should be paid. Valef.

(n) Ἰστακισμὸς, signifies, to be seized with a false extasy or trance. For there are true extasies; such was Peter's, Acts 10; and Paul's, when he was caught up to the third Heaven. There are also false extasies amongst Heretics, which this Author does elegantly call ἱστακισμὸς. These false extasies differ little from madness, because the Devil is the procurer of them: But those which proceed from the Divine Spirit do not at all disturb the state of the Mind, but are calm and pleasant, as Eusebius says (in Heref. Cataphog.) Valef.

thus; 'And let not the Spirit in Maximilla say to]

Commodus [to me,] (a) as 'tis related in the same Book of Asterius Urbanus, I am driven as a Wolf from the Sheep. I am now a Wolf. I am the Word, the Spirit and the Power: But let him evidently manifest and prove that Power in the Spirit; and let him by that Spirit compel those that were then present, to confess that they try'd and conferr'd with that babbling Spirit; [I mean] those approved Men and Bishops, Zoticus of the Town Comanes, and Julianus of Apamea: Whose Mouths (p) Themison and those of his Party having stop'd, would not suffer that lying Spirit to be reprovd by 'em. Again, in the same Book, (having interposed some words to confute the false Prophecies of Maximilla) he evidences both the Time when he wrote these things, and also mentions her Predictions, wherein he had foretold there would be Wars and Commotions; the falsehood of which [Predictions] he reprehends in these words: "And has northis Lye been already made apparently manifest? For to this day 'tis more than thirteen years since this Woman died; and yet there has not been either a particular, or an universal War in the World. Yea rather, by the Mercy of God, the Christians have had a firm and lasting Peace." And thus much out of his second Book. Out of the Third I will also add some few words, where he says thus to those who boasted, that many, even of their [Party] had suffer'd as Martyrs. "When therefore they can return no answer, having been confuted in all Passages we have mention'd, they endeavour to lye to the Martyrs; saying they have many Martyrs, and that is a certain and undoubted evidence of that Power, by them called the Prophetick Spirit. But this, in my judgment, is much more untrue. For some Followers of other Heresies [do boast] they have many Martyrs, and yet we shall not, I think, upon this account embrace their Opinion, nor confess they have the Truth amongst them. Those also who first follow'd the Heresie of Marcion, called Marcionists, say, they have very many Martyrs of Christ, and yet they do not in truth acknowledge Christ himself." And after some few words, he subjoyns hereunto, saying, "Wherefore also, as often as those of the Church, being called to [undergo] Martyrdom for the true Faith, have by accident hapned into company with some of those of the Phrygian Heresie, who are call'd Martyrs, they dissent from them, and having avoided all Communion with them, are perfected by a glorious Martyrdom; for they are unwilling to give their assent to the Spirit of Montanus and his Women: And that this is true, 'tis manifest from what has been done in our Times in [the City] of Apamea, situate on [the River] Meander, by Caius and Alexander of Eumenia, who suffer'd Martyrdom.

cited some words of those [Hereticks,] he pro-ceeds, saying: "Having found all this in a certain Book which they wrote in answer to a Book of our Brother (a) Alciabiades, wherein he proves that a Prophet ought not to speak in an ecstasy of mind, I epitomiz'd them." A little after this, in the same Book, he enumerates the Prophets of the New Testament; amongst whom he recounts one Ammias, and Quadratus, and he says thus; (b) But a false Prophet in false Ecstasie, (whose Concomitants are Licentiousness and Audaciousness,) takes his beginning indeed from a voluntary Ignorance, but ends, as I have said, in an involuntary Madnes of Mind: They shall not be able to show any of the Prophets, either under the Old, or New Testament, who was inspir'd after this manner [by such a Spirit.] They shall not boast of Agabus, nor of Judas, nor of Silas, nor of the Daughters of Philip, nor of Ammias in Philadelphia, nor of Quadratus, nor of many others which do not at all belong to them." Again, after some few words, he says thus; For if, as they say, Montanus's Women succeeded in the gift of Prophecy after Quadratus and Ammias in Philadelphia, let them show us, who amongst them have been the Successors of Montanus and his Women. For the Apostle is of opinion that the gift of Prophecy ought to continue in every Church until the last Advent [of our Lord.] But they are unable to shew [any Prophet,] although this is now the fourteenth year since the death of Maximilla." Thus far he. Now that Miltiades, whom he mentions, has left us other Monuments of his Diligence about the Divine Scriptures, both in the Books he compos'd against the Gentiles, and also in those against the Jews; having prosecuted each Subject particularly in two Volumes. Moreover also, he made an Apology for the [Christian] Philosophy, which he protels'd, [and dedicated it] to the (c) Pretendents of the Provinces (a) Jeram, Rufinus, and other we observed the name [Miltiades] was put for [Alciabiades]. On the contrary, here [Alciabiades] is crept in to the Text of Eusebius, in heat of [Miltiades], but Nicephorus 'tis [Miltiades]; and neither he, nor Christophorus, understood this place. Valef.

(b) Rufinus, and Baronius, were mistaken, in that they supposed these following Words were taken out of Miltiades's Book. For this nameless Author quotes nothing out of Miltiades's Book, but only out of the Cataphrygian's answer to Miltiades's Book; Which thing Translators understood not. Now the meaning of this place is this; There is a great difference between the true Prophets, and the false. For the true Prophets, who were filled with the Spirit of God, did foretell things future in a quiet and serene temper of Mind. But the false Prophets, as was Montanus, uttered what they said in a raging and mad temper of mind. Indeed this was the chief objection of the Ecclesiasticks against the Montanists, who boasted they were inspir'd with a Prophetick Spirit, because they Prophesied in an extasie. But we read that no Prophet, either under the Old or New Testament, did ever Prophecy in an extasie. Therefore Miltiades wrote a Book against them, which was thus entituled [ὅτι τὸ πλὴν ἀποστολὴν τοῦ ἁγίου λαλοῦν, ἢ οὐκ ἔστιν ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῆς ἐκστασεως τοῦ νοῦ]. I. e. a Prophet ought not to speak in an extasie of mind. See Epiphanius, adv'rs' Heres. Montanist. Chap. 2, & 4; and Christophorus, Homil. 29. on the 1 Epist. Corinth. Valef.

Translators thought Miltiades dedicated his Apology to the Roman Emperors, called here [κατοικίας ἀποστολῆς]. But because at that time there was only one Roman Emperor, (to wit, Commodus), I judge the Governors of Provinces are here rather meant. For the term [ἀποστολῆς] Miltiades dedicated his Apology, as did Terullian afterwards; who calls this Miltiades, the Rhetorician of the Church. Valef.

C H A P. XVII.

How Apollonius also confuted the Cataphrygians, and whom he has made mention of.

C H A P. XVII.

Concerning Miltiades, and the Books he compos'd.

IN the same Book he makes mention of one Miltiades, a Writer, who also wrote a Book against the fore said Heresie: Having therefore

Apollonius also, an Ecclesiastick Writer, employing himself about a Confutation of that called the Cataphrygian Heresie, which in his time

Commodus was prevalent in Phrygia, composed a peculiar Volume against them, wherein he does both word by word disprove the false Prophecies vented by them, and also lays open the Life and Manners of the Founders of that Heresie; [shewing] how they behaved themselves. Hear what he says, in these very words, concerning Montanus: "But who is this new Doctōr? His Works and Doctrine do demonstrate: This is he who has taught a Dissolution of Marriages: Who has imposed

(a) Montanus instituted three Lenten every Year, and besides them, two Weeks of Abstinence, wherein nothing but dry Meats were to be eaten. So Tertullian in his Book, De jejunio, and Jerom, in his Epistle to Marcella, Apollonius objects here against Montanus, his instituting Fasts by a Law, not that it is a fault to observe Fasts; or as if 'twere not lawful for some in the Church to proclaim Fasts: For the Apostle St. John appointed a three days Fast at Ephesus, because he betook himself to the writing his Gospel. But Montanus had no power to proclaim a Fast, being an Heretic, an uncommunicated Person, and no Prophet. Apollonius therefore does detestably blame him, because of his own Head, not by Apostolick Tradition, he instituted Fasts. Valf.

"monstrated therefore, that these principal Prophets, for the time they were filled with the Spirit, forsook their Husbands: How falsely then do they speak, who term (b) Prisca a Virgin? Then he goes on, saying; "Does not the whole Scripture seem to you to prohibit a Prophet to receive Gifts and Money? When therefore I see a Prophet receive Gold and Silver, and rich garments, how can I choose but abhor her?" Again, after some words, he says this concerning one of those whom they call Confessors: "Moreover, Themison, who has cover'd himself with a (c) specious pretext of avarice, (he who would not bear the (d) sign of confession, but rid himself of his Bonds by a great sum of money, whereas upon that account he should in future have behav'd himself submissively,) does [notwithstanding] boast himself to be a Martyr, and has been so audacious, as, in imitation of the Apostle, to write a General Epistle, for the instruction of those who have behaved themselves more like true Believers than he, but does [therein] defend the Tenets of his own vain Doctrine, and speaks impiously of the Lord, his Apostles, and holy Church." Again, he writes thus concerning others, who amongst 'em have been honour'd as Martyrs: "But that we may speak of no more, let the Prophets answer us concerning Alexander, who terms himself a Martyr, with whom the feasts, whom many of them pay a reverence to: Whose Robberies and his other audacious Facts (for which he has been punish'd) we need not speak of, since they may be seen in that place where the Publick (e) Re-

(a) The Montanists covered their Avarice under the pretext of Religion, and (specious term of Oblivion, as Apollonius says a little before in this Chapter. Valf.

(b) Christopherson thought the Crisis was meant here: But doubtless Apollonius means bonds, which Thimison could not endure for Christ's sake. For that which he calls [the sign of Confession] here, in the next Words he terms [the sign] Bonds. Valf.

"and has been so audacious, as, in imitation of the Apostle, to write a General Epistle, for the instruction of those who have behaved themselves more like true Believers than he, but does [therein] defend the Tenets of his own vain Doctrine, and speaks impiously of the Lord, his Apostles, and holy Church." Again, he writes thus concerning others, who amongst 'em have been honour'd as Martyrs: "But that we may speak of no more, let the Prophets answer us concerning Alexander, who terms himself a Martyr, with whom the feasts, whom many of them pay a reverence to: Whose Robberies and his other audacious Facts (for which he has been punish'd) we need not speak of, since they may be seen in that place where the Publick (e) Re-

(c) O πικρὸν ὄμμα in the term in the original. At Athens there was an House so called, behind the Temple of Minerva Polias, wherein the publick Treasury was

"gifters are kept. Which therefore of these two forgives the other's Sins? Does the Prophet [pardon] the Martyr's Robberies, or does the Martyr [forgive] the Prophet's Avarice? For whereas the Lord has said, * Provide neither gold, nor silver, neither two coats, these persons, wholly on the contrary, have committed heinous Sins, in possessing themselves of things that are forbidden: For we will evidence, that those which they call Prophets, and Martyrs, have extorted Money not only from the Rich, but also from the Indigent, from Orphans and Widows; And if they are confident [of their Innocency] herein, let them stay, and decide the matter with us concerning these things; that so, if they shall be convinced, for the future they may leave their Vicioulness: For the Fruits [that is, the Deeds] of a Prophet, must be approved: For a Tree is known by its Fruits. That therefore those who are desirous may know the truth concerning Alexander, Judgment was pass'd upon him at Ephesus by Amilius Frontinus the Proconsul [of Asia] not for the name [of Christ], but the Robberies he had audaciously committed, being at that time an (f) Apostate from Christ. Then, (f) πᾶσι after he had counterfeited [a Profession of] the epistola, Name of the Lord, and deceived the faithful [Brethren] there, he was dismiss'd; but his own Church, where he was born, admitted him not, because he was a Thief. Those who are desirous to know all matters concerning him, may have recourse to the Publick Registry of Asia, [where they will find them]. And yet the * Prophet does pretend himself ignorant of this Man, whom he has convers'd with for many years. Having evidently shown what this Man is, we have also by him declared the Imposture of the Prophet. We are able to demonstrate the like in many other things. But if they have any confidence in themselves, let them undergo the Test." Again, in another place of the same Work, he adds these words concerning those Prophets they boast of: "If they deny that they Prophets have received Gifts, let them confess this, [to wit,] if they be convinced that they have taken Gifts, they are not Prophets: And then we will produce infinite Demonstrations hereof. "Is necessary that all the Fruits of a Prophet should be approved of: Tell me, does a Prophet (g) colour [his Hair?]? Does a Prophet paint his Eye-brows with * Strybium? Does a Prophet make it his business to dock and adorn himself? Does a Prophet play at Tables, and at Dice? Does a Prophet put money to usury? Let them confess ingenuously whether these things are lawful or no? But I will demonstrate they are done amongst them." The same Apollonius does relate in the same Work, that at the time of his writing that Book, it was (h) forty years since Montanus (b) undertook [to vent] his forg'd Prophecy. And

Apollonius places Apollonius after the Author without a name, of whom he speaks in the foregoing Chapter: For because that anonymous Author says he wrote his Book fourteen Years after the death of Montanus and Maximilla; and in regard Apollonius does here say Montanus broach'd his new Prophecy forty Years before he wrote; therefore Eusebius supposed Apollonius to be a later Writer than that anonymous Author: In which, as I judge, he is much out. For Apollonius wrote his Book whilest

(g) The Greeks call that Crisis τὸ κρίμα, which the Latines term, Crisis tingere seu unguere, to die, or make the hair red. To do which they made use of Ales which had been put into Lye, as Varro says. See Eusebius in the word κρίμα. Valf.

ingenuously whether these things are lawful or no? But I will demonstrate they are done amongst them." The same Apollonius does relate in the same Work, that at the time of his writing that Book, it was (h) forty years since Montanus (b) undertook [to vent] his forg'd Prophecy. And

Apollonius places Apollonius after the Author without a name, of whom he speaks in the foregoing Chapter: For because that anonymous Author says he wrote his Book fourteen Years after the death of Montanus and Maximilla; and in regard Apollonius does here say Montanus broach'd his new Prophecy forty Years before he wrote; therefore Eusebius supposed Apollonius to be a later Writer than that anonymous Author: In which, as I judge, he is much out. For Apollonius wrote his Book whilest

whilest Montanus, and his mad Prophetesses Priscilla and Maximilla, were yet alive, which appears from these passages [Let the Prophetess answer us concerning Alexander, who terms himself a Martyr, with whom the seafish, &c.] And again, [And yet the Prophet does pretend himself ignorant of this Man whom he has converted with for many Years.] Eusebius quotes in this Chapter. Apollonius therefore does not say, forty Years were past from the death of Montanus, when he wrote this Book; but only, that Montanus had set a-broach his false Prophecy forty years before he went about to write this Book against him. Let us suppose therefore Montanus to be thirty years old when he set up to be a Prophet; he could not be above 70 years old when Apollonius wrote his Book against him. Neither had he Maximilla and Priscilla for his Companions, as soon as ever he began his Heresie; but, as I judge, they were ensnared by him a long while after. Valf.

Commodus, again, he says, that Zoticus (whom the former Writer made mention of) resolv'd to oppose Maximilla, who then feign'd herself to Prophesie at Pepuza, and attempted to reprove the Spirit she was moved by; but that she was forbidden by those that were her Favourers. He makes mention also of one Thrasus, who at that time was a Martyr. Moreover he says, as from Tradition, that our Saviour commanded his Apostles, they should not for the space of twelve years depart from Jerusalem: He quotes Authorities also out of the Revelation of John; and relates that John, by the Divine Power raised a Dead Man to Life at Ephesus. And he says many other things, whereby he sufficiently and fully sets forth the Deceit of the foresaid pernicious Heresie. Thus much Apollonius.

Serapion's [Opinion] concerning the Heresie of the Cataphrygians.

BUT Serapion, (who, as report says, was about this time Bishop of the Church of Antioch after Maximinus), makes mention of the Writings of Apollinaris against the foresaid Heresie. He mentions him in that Epistle he wrote to (a) Cariacus and Ponticus; wherein, refusing the same Heresie, he subjoins these words: "And that you may see, that the Operation of that dissenting Party call'd the (b) New-prophecy is abominated (c) by all the Brotherhood in this World, I have sent you also the Letters of Clautius Apollinaris of most blessed memory, who was (d) Bishop of Hierapolis in Asia." In that same Epistle of Serapion's, are contained the Subscriptions of several Bishops: One of whom has subscribed thus; I Aurelius Cyrenius Martyr wish You health: Another, after this manner, Elis Publius Julius Bishop of (d) Develtum, a Colony of Thracia: As

(a) Eusebius in his 6th Book, Cha. 12. calls these Men Ponticus and Cariacus.
(b) Serapion in Catalogo calls them Cirinus, and Ponticus.
Valf.
(c) So the Ancients termed the Prophecy of Montanus and his Associates; as may be seen from Tertullian, de Jejunio; Serapion, in Catalogo; Firmilian, in his Epistle to Cyprian; and the old Author quoted by our Eusebius, Chap. 16. of this Book. Valf.

(d) The reading of the Mar. Med. Fuk. and Sevil MSS, agrees with our Translation, to wit, [by all the Brotherhood in the World.] The King's MS. and Robert Stephens read it thus [by all the Brotherhood in Christ, over the whole World.] Valf.

(d) Develtum, or Develtum, a Colony in Thracia, is mentioned by Geographers, and in the old Coins, which John Trifan put forth. Anchialus also, hereafter named, is a City of Thracia, sufficiently known. But why should the Subscriptions of the Bishops of Thracia be put to the Epistle of Serapion Bishop of Antioch? If I may make a conjecture, I suppose the Bishops of Thracia had written an Epistle to the Churches of Asia and Phrygia against Montanus's Prophecy; wherein they gave their Opinion thereof, after the same manner that those of Vienna and Lyons did, as our Eusebius related before. That these subscriptions were put to the bottom of some Epistle, 'tis apparent from Cyrenus's Subscription here mentioned. But 'tis no way likely that those Bishops did subscribe Serapion's Epistle; (1) Because Eusebius does not say so, but only that the Subscriptions of many Bishops were contained in Serapion's Letter, as was also Apollinaris's Epistle to the said Serapion. For Serapion did this with good advantage, that he might confute the Heresie of Montanus by the authority of many Bishops. (2) How could the Bishops of Thracia subscribe the Letter of a Bishop of Antioch? 'Tis most probable therefore, as I said, that the Bishops of Thracia had with a joint consent written to the Churches of Asia and Phrygia. Valf.

God liveth who is in Heaven, Sotas of blessed memory, Commodus, who (e) was at Anchialus, would have cast out Priscilla's Devil, but the Hypocrites would not suffer (e) That is, Bishop him. In the said Letters are extant the Subscriptions of many other Bishops, written with their own Hands, who were of the same Opinion with these. And of this sort were the Matters appertaining to the said [Hereticks.]

This Sotas the Bishop, hearing of this new Prophecy, sailed out of Thracia into Phrygia, where having seen Priscilla, not filled with the Holy Spirit, but actuated by the Devil, he undertook to call him out of her by Exorcism. Not only Sotas, but also many other Bishops went at that time into Phrygia, to examine that new Prophecy, says the anonymous Author, chap. 16. of this Book. Moreover, we may observe, that Sotas was dead when Elis Julius wrote this; which is shown by the word [was dead] a term which the Greeks use when they speak of a dead Person: Had Sotas been alive, he would doubtless have confirmed this thing by his Subscription. The same term Serapion uses, when he speaks of Apollinaris, who also was then dead. Valf.

What Irenaeus wrote against the Schismatics at Rome.

(a) Irenaeus composed several Epistles against those at Rome who adulterated the Law of the Church. He wrote one to Blasius concerning Schism; another to Florinus concerning (b) Monarchy, or, that God is not the maker of Evil. For Florinus seem'd to be a maintainer of that Opinion: Upon whose account, (being afterwards led into the Error of Valentinus), Irenaeus compiled that Work of his, [entitled,] (c) Concerning the Number Eight. In which Piece he intimates himself to have liv'd in the first Succession after the Apostles. There also at the close of that Work, we found a most profitable (d) Note of his, which we judged useful to be inserted into this our History: It is thus; 'I adjure thee (who shall transcribe this Book) by our Lord Jesus Christ, and by his glorious coming to judge the Quick and Dead, that you compare what you shall transcribe and correct it diligently according to that Copy whence you shall transcribe it; and that in like manner you transcribe this Adoration, and annex it to [thy] Copy.' And let us much have been profitably said by him, and related by us, that we may always have [before our eyes] those ancient and truly holy Men, as the best pattern of a most accurate Care and Diligence. Moreover, in that Epistle (we spoke of) which Irenaeus wrote to Florinus, he makes mention of his being conversant with Polycarp, saying, 'These Opinions, (O Florinus!) that I may speak sparingly, do not appertain to found Doctrine.' These Opinions are different from the Church, and drive those who

(a) Here we begin the 20 Chapter, following therein Rufinus, Majestas, and Christophorus. The King's, the Mar. and Fuk. MSS, begin the Chapter from the words [And of this sort were the Matters, &c.] which are the close of the foregoing Chapter. Valf.

(b) The ancient Christians did frequently use this term; as often, as they disputed against the Gentiles, under which title they put forth many Books, to shew that there was one God, the Maker and King of all things, which term [to wit, Monarchy] they ascribed to God the Father; but [dyavocis, i. e. the Dispensation, and Administration] they assigned to the Son and Holy Ghost; Tertullian, (in his Book against Praxeas), and Tatianus, (adversus Græcos). There is a Book of Justin the Martyr's, now extant, which has this title. Moreover, from this title of Irenaeus's Book we may conclude, that Florian adhered two Principles, and embraced the Opinions of Carlo and Marcion, affirming one to be the Author of Good, the other of Evil. Valf.

(c) See Irenaeus, and Epiphanius, concerning a work of Valentinus, which bears this title. Valf.

(d) Synopsis is the term in the original. Those Notes which were set at the Margin of MSS, that the Reader might understand something remarkable occurred there, were properly so called. Therefore we translate it [adnotationes, i. e. a note.] This note is now to be found in many Greek MSS, express'd only by the two first Letters, thus [en] which do signify [ennotatio, i. e. note.] This Adoration of Irenaeus's did I would please Eusebius, that he put it at the beginning of his Chronicon. Valf.

Commodus, who give their assent to them into the greatest Impiety; these Sentiments even the Hereticks, who are without the Church, have not dared to publish at any time; these Opinions the Presbyters, who liv'd before our Times, who also were the Disciples of the Apostles, did in no wise deliver unto thea. For I saw these (when being yet a Child I was in the Lower Asia with Polycarp, behaving thy self very well in the Palace, and endeavouring to get thy self well-esteem'd of by him. For I remember the things then done, better than what has happen'd of late. For what we learn'd being Children, increases together with the Mind itself, and is closely united to it. Inasmuch, that I am able to tell even the place where the Blessed Polycarp sat and discours'd; also his (e) Goings-out and Comings-in; his Manner of Life; the Shape of his Body; the Discourses he made to the People; the familiar Converse which, he said, he had with John, and with the rest who had seen the Lord, and how he rehear'd their Sayings, and what they were which he had heard from them concerning the Lord; concerning his Miracles, and his Doctrine: According as Polycarp receiv'd them from those, who with their own Eyes beheld the Word of Life, so he related them, agreeing in all things with the Scriptures. These things, by the Mercy of God bestow'd upon me, I then heard diligently, and copied them out, not in Paper, but in my Heart; and by the Grace of God I do continually and sincerely ruminate upon them. And I am able to protest in the presence of God, that if that Blessed and Apostolick Presbyter should have heard any such thing, he would presently have cried out, and (f) stopp'd his Ears, and according to his usual custom would have said; God forbid! For what times hast thou reserved me, that I should suffer such things! And he would have run out of the place, where he was either sitting or standing, should he have heard such words as these. And this may be manifested from those Epistles of his, which he wrote either to the neighbouring Churches to confirm them, or to some Brethren to admonish and exhort them. Thus far Irenæus.

(f) It was the custom of the Primitive Christians, when they heard any impious Expression in a familiar Discourse, which was disagreeable to the rule of the Catholic Faith, forthwith to stop their Ears, and run away. See Irenæus (B. 3. Against Heresies, Chap. 4.) and Jerom, B. 1. against Rufinus. Valef.

How Apollonius suffer'd Martyrdom at Rome.

AT the same time of Commodus's Empire, our Affairs were converted into a quiet and sedate posture; Peace, by the Divine Grace, encompassing the Churches throughout the whole World. In which interim the saving Word [of God] allured * very many of all sorts of Men to the religious Worship of the universal God. So that now many of those at Rome, who were very eminent both for Riches and Descend, did, together with their whole Households and Families, betake themselves to [the attaining of] Salvation. But this could not be born with by the envious Devil, that hater of Good, being by nature malicious. Therefore he (a) arms

* Or, every Soul of all sorts of Men. For that's the import of the Greek, if it be exactly rendered. Valefius translates it Ex omni genere hominum quousque plurimum, i. e. very many of all sorts of Men.

(a) As the devil, i. e. he sought himself, 'tis a Metaphor taken from Champions, who, being to engage, strip'd themselves, and studied by various Arts and Subtilties to vanquish their Adversaries. Valef.

himself again, inventing various Stratagems to gainst us. At the City of Rome therefore, he brings before the Judgment-seat (b) Apollonius, a Man who was at that time one of the Faithful, and very eminent for his Learning and Philosophy; a man not having stirr'd up (c) one of * his Ministers, who Perion was fit for such [a wicked Enterprise] to accuse this Person. Now this Wretch, having undertaken this Accusation in an unreasonable time, (for this according to the (d) Imperial Edict, the Informers against those that were [Christians] were to be put to death; and his Legs forthwith broken, and was put to death, Perennis the Judge having pronounc'd this Sentence against him. But the Martyr, most beloved by God, (after the Judge had (e) earnestly beseech'd him by many entreaties, and requested him to render an account [of his Faith] (f) before the Senate,) having made a most (g) elegant defence before the Senate, all for the Faith he profess'd, (b) was, as it were, by a Decree of the Senate, condemn'd to undergo a capital Punishment. For by an ancient Law 'twas establish'd amongst them, that (i) those [Christians] who were once accused before the Judgment-seat, should in no wise be dismiss'd, unless they receded from their Opinion. Moreover, he that is desirous to know Apollonius's Speeches before the Judge, and the Answers he made to the Interrogatories of Perennis, the Oration also which he spoke before the Senate in defence of our Faith, may see them in our Collection of the Sufferings of the ancient Martyrs.

(d) He means the Rescript of Marcus, mentioned Chap. 13. B. 4. See that place, and the Notes upon it. Rescript thought the Edict of Trajan, (which Eusebius mentions B. 3. Chap. 33.) or the Rescript of Adrian, see Chap. 9. B. 4.) to Minucius Fundanus, was here meant, Valef.

(e) The Judges, who interrogated the Christians that were brought before them, were wont to persuade and entreat them to have a regard for their own Safety, by embracing the Worship of the Heathen Gods. There are infinite Examples hereof in Terrentian, Eusebii, &c. Valef.

(f) From this passage I am induc'd to think that Apollonius was of the Senatorial Order, as Jerom has said. Who upon the information of some desperate Fellow (whose name is unknown) was brought before Perennis, the Prefect of the Prætorium, (i. e. the Officer to whom the oversight of the Soldiers was committed) as being a Christian; being ask'd by the Judge what Order he was of, and making answer that he was of the Senatorial Order, Perennis commanded him to give an account of his Faith before the Senate. Which when Apollonius had with much Eloquence done, by the sentence of the Senate he was put to death. Why may we not therefore believe Jerom, (who in his Book De Eccl'ia Scriptura, and in his Epistle to Magnus) has said in express terms, that Apollonius was a Senator? And although Eusebius does not expressly say so; yet from this Relation of his thus much may be collected. Besides, Jerom might have read the Acts of Apollonius's suffering, to which Eusebius does here refer us. In which Acts, 'tis probable, Apollonius was called a Roman Senator, and was said to have been brought by his Servant. These Acts were written at Rome in Greek, by Men that were Grecians, after the same manner as the Acts of the Lugdunian Martyrs were written in Greek. Valef.

(g) Jerom (in his Book De Scriptura Eccl'ia) misunderstanding this place of Eusebius, has accus'd Apollonius, amongst the Ecclesiastical Writers. But Eusebius only says, that Apollonius made a most elegant Oration before the Judges in defence of the Faith he profess'd, not that he wrote an Apology. Scaliger takes notice of this mistake of Jerom's in his Animadvers. Eusebiana, p. 208. But he has there alter'd the reading of part of this place in Eusebius, thus [But the Martyr, most beloved of God, after he had beseech'd the Judge by many entreaties, that he might be allowed to give an account of his Faith before the Senate.] Which Emendation is contradicted by all our MS. Copies, and by reason itself. Valef.

(h) All Translators have rendered this place without taking any notice of the particle [et] in their Versions; supposing it to be useless. Which, as I judge, is not true: (1) Because the Senators were not Judges, neither had they Jurisdiction. (2) Perennis, who was the Judge in this Cause, had removed the Cause to the Senate, not that the Senate should give Judgment upon him, but that Apollonius should give them an account of his Religion: He honoured the Senate so far, that he would not condemn a Senator, before the Senate had had cognizance of his Crime. When therefore the Senate had heard Apollonius, their answer was, That the Man should be judged according to the Law. After this Apollonius was punished with death, by the sentence indeed of Peregrinus himself, but by the decree of the Senate, because the Senate had heard him, and given their consent that he should be condemned. Valef.

(2) He means the Retriopt of Trajan, which Eusebius mentions Book 3. Chap. 33. at the latter end. See the place and the note upon it. Valef.

What Bishops flourish'd at that time.

Commodus. Moreover, in the Tenth Year of Commodus's Reign, Eleutherus, having executed the Episcopal Office (a) thirteen years, was succeeded by Victor. In the same year also, Iulianus having completed his Tenth Year, Demetrius undertook the Government of the Churches at Alexandria. At the same time likewise Serapion, (whom we spake of a little before,) flourish'd, being the eighth Bishop from the Apostles of the Antiochian Church. At Cæsarea in Palestine presided Theophilus; and in like manner Narcissus (whom we made mention of before) at that time had the publick Charge over the Church at Jerusalem. At Corinth in Achaia, (b) Bacchylus was then the Bishop, and at the Church of Ephefus, Polycrates. Many others, 'tis likely, besides these were eminent at that time; but we, as it was meet, have only record'd their names, by whose Writings the Doctrine of the true Faith has been derived down to us.

C H A P. XXIII.

Concerning the Question then moved about Easter.

AT the same time no small Controversie being rais'd, because the Churches of Asia supposed, (as from a more ancient Tradition,) that the *fourteenth day of the Moon ought to be observ'd as the salutary Feast of Easter, and Serapion, [to wit] the same Day whereon the Jews MSS. is were commanded to kill the Lamb, and that they ought always (b) on that Day, (whatever Day of the Week it should happen to be,) to put an end to their Fasting: When as [notwithstanding] 'twas not the usage of the (c) Churches of Asia may be taken in a threefold sense; sometimes 'tis taken for the third part of the World, sometimes for a Province, divided into nine Jurisdictions, which was governed by a Roman Proconsul; at other times 'tis more strictly taken for that Region which lies by the River Meander. In these words of Eusebius, 'tis, in my judgment, to be taken in the second sense, to wit, for a Province which a Provincial governed. Valef.

* That is, the fourteenth day after the appearance of the New Moon: For the religious part of the Jewish Calendar was concerned in their appearances of the New Moon, the reports whereof were made by the Country-People. See the whole manner hereof described particularly, by the Learned Doctor Culworth, in his excellent Discourse concerning the true Notion of the Lord's Supper, pag. 67. See also Mr. Jo. Gregory of Oxford, in his Discourse concerning Upper-rooms, pag. 14, &c.

(c) The Learned Arch-Bishop Usher, in his Dissertation prefixed before Ignatius's Epistles, Chap. 9. says, that the Asiaties, who celebrated Easter with the Jews, on the first Day of unleavened Bread, passed over that Day with Mourning and Fasting; after which Day was ended, they concluded their Lent-fast. Which opinion Eusebius does here contradict, in that he affirms expressly, that the Asiaties, did put an end to their Fasting on the 14th day of the first Month, although it were not Monday. Valef.

(d) Here Eusebius does plainly declare that the Asiaties only did at that time celebrate Easter with the Jews; but that all the other Churches observed that Festival on another Day. Wherefore I dissent from Beallæus, Arch-Bishop Usher, and others, who suppose that the Syrians, Mesopotamians, and Cilicians, did then keep Easter at the same time with the Asiaties. 'Tis evident that the Syrians and Mesopotamians, were then right in their Sentiments about this matter, which appears from their Councils here mentioned by Eusebius; For Officiana is a part of Mesopotamia: But afterwards they fell to the Jewish Observations of this Festival, and that before the Nicene Council, as Augustinus enforces. On the contrary, the Asiaties forsaking their former Error, embraced the founder Opinion in their observation of Easter; which they did before the Nicene Council, as appears from Constantine's Epistle, which Eusebius relates, B. 3. Chap. 13 and 19. of Constantine's Life. Valef.

over the rest of the World to do after this manner: Which usage, being received from Apostolic Tradition, and still prevalent, they observ'd, [to wit,] that they ought not to add put amongst an end to their Fasting on any other day, save the Antient, at that of the Resurrection of our Saviour: Upon this account Synods and Assemblies of Bishops were convened. And all of them with one consent did by their Letters inform the [Brethren] after was the Council of every-where of the Ecclesiastical Decree, [to wit,] that the Mystery of our Lord's Resurrection were to be observed to conclude the Fasts before Easter. There is at this time extant the Epistle of those who then were assembled in Palestine, over whom (d) Theophilus Bishop of the Church in Cæsarea, of Ephefus and Narcissus [Bishop] of Jerusalem, presided. In days, like manner, another [Epistle] of those [assemblies] at Rome concerning the same Question, as may be having Victor the Bishop's name prefix'd to it: (e) Alfo [another] of those Bishops in Pontus, over whom (f) Palmas, as being the most ancient, presided. Alfo [an Epistle] of the Churches in Gallia, which Irenæus had the oversight of. Moreover of those in Osbroonia and the Cities there; and (g) a private Letter of Bacchylus, s, Bishop of the Corinthian Church; of many others also; all which having utter'd one and the same Opinion and Sentiment propos'd the same Judgment; and Easter this we have mention'd, was their only definitive Determination.

(e) The Bishop of Cæsarea, (before the Nicene Council, and a long time after,) had the Dignity and Honour of a Metropolitan, and presided in all the Councils of Palestine, as being Bishop of the chief See. Nevertheless, the Bishops of Jerusalem had a respect shown them; then being the Apostolic Church, which first had a Bishop. Therefore the Bishops of Nicene See were not under the Bishops of Cæsarea, but were Autonomous, i. e. were, as to their privilege, independent of the See of Cæsarea. See the seventh Canon of the Nicene Council. Valef.

(f) He was Bishop of Amastri in Pontus, of whom Longinus Bishop of Corinth makes mention, in his Epistle to the Church of Amastri, which Epistle our Eusebius speaks of B. 4. Chap. 23. There was one, which bore the same name, (to wit, Palmas) of the Consular Order, whom Asinius commanded to be killed; to this Spartianus. Moreover, Eusebius says, this Palmas presided, as being the most ancient Bishop, not that he was a Metropolitan, but Amastri, was Metropolitan of the Cities of Pontus. But in the Ecclesiastical Councils the Precedency was different, according to the diversity of times and places. The plainest and most reasonable cause of Precedency was, that the antientest Bishop should take place of the rest. Afterwards the Bishops of the Metropolitan Churches had that honour given them. Valef.

(g) Jerem (in his Book De Scriptis. Eccliosophis) expounds this place, as if Bacchylus had convened a Council in Achaia, apart by himself. For in this sense he takes the term [Asia], here used by Eusebius. But there may another sense be given hereto, to wit, that Bacchylus wrote a private Epistle in his own Name concerning Easter, not a Synodical Letter, as the rest did. Eusebius (Book 6. Chap. 11.) calls a private Letter [Asia]. Valef.

C H A P. XXIV.

Concerning the Disagreement [of the Churches] throughout Asia.

OVER those Bishops in Asia, who stilly maintain'd they ought to observe the ancient usage heretofore deliver'd to them, presided Polycrates: Who, in the Epistle he wrote to Victor, and the Roman Church, declares the Tradition derived down to his own Times in these words: We

Commodus * We therefore observe the true and genuine * Day; having neither added any thing to, nor taken any thing from, [the uninterrupted usage deliver'd to us.] † For in Asia the Great Lights are dead, who shall be raised again in the Day of the Lord's Advent, wherein he shall come with glory from Heaven, and raise up all his Saints, [I mean] Philip, one of the Twelve Apostles, who died at Hierapolis, and his two Daughters, who continued Virgins to the end of their lives; also his other Daughter, having whilst she lived been inspired by the Holy Ghost, died at Ephesus. And moreover, John, who leaned on the Lord's Breast, and was a Priest, wearing a (a) Plate of Gold, and was a Martyr, and a Doctor: This [John, I say] died at Ephesus. Moreover also, Polycarp Bishop at Smyrna and Martyr, and (b) Thraless of Eumema, Bishop and Martyr, who died at Smyrna. What need we mention (c) Sagaris Bishop and Martyr, who died at Laodicea? And moreover (d) Papirius of blessed memory, and (e) Melito the Eunuch, who in all things was directed by the Suggestion of the Holy Spirit, who lies at Sardis, expecting the [Lord's coming to] visit him from Heaven, when he shall be raised from the Dead? All these kept the Day of Easter on the fourteenth day of the Moon, according to the Gospel: In no wise violating, but exactly following the Rule of Faith. And moreover, I Polycrates, the meanest of you all, according to the Tradition of my Kinsmen, some of whom also I have follow'd: For (f) seven of my Relations were Bishops, and I am the eighth; all which Kinsmen of mine did always celebrate the Day [of Easter] when the People [of the Jews] (g) removed the Leaven. I therefore, Brethren, who am sixty five years old in the Lord, and have been conversant with the Brethren dispersed over the World, and have read the whole Scripture through, am not at all terrified at what I am threatened with. For those

(a) Sec B. 3. Chap. 31. Note (h) but the Jewish use of this plate of Gold can't be mentioned here; for John was neither High-Priest amongst the Jews, nor yet of the sacerdotal race. Polycrates mentions 3 things of John; 1. That he was a Priest; 2. a Martyr; 3. a Doctor, or Evangelist. Now as he was a Doctor of Christ, and a Martyr for him; so also must he be understood to be a Priest of Christ. 'Tis probable that first Christian Priests, in imitation of the Jewish High-Priests, did wear a plate of Gold, as a Badge of Honour. Epiphanius (in Hæres. Nazæariorum) says, James the Brother of our Lord, who was ordained the first Bishop of Jerusalem, wore such a plate of Gold on his Forehead. The same is said of Mark the Evangelist, in a MS. concerning his Suffering. Valef.

(b) This is Thraless the Martyr, whom Apollonius mentions in his Book against the Cathartians; whose Words our Eusebius quotes Chap. 18. of this Book; Rufinus says he suffered Martyrdom at Smyrna. Valef.

(c) Melito Bishop of Sardis makes mention of this Martyr, in his Book concerning Easter; in those Words which our Eusebius quotes B. 4. Chap. 26. This Sagaris was Bishop of Laodicea in Asia; in whose times the Question concerning Easter was raised at Laodicea. Valef.

(d) In the May. Med. and Ful. MSS. this Man's name is thus written, [Papius, Papirius.] 'Tis a Roman name. Polycrates does not say where this Papirius was Bishop. But I find in Simeon Metaphrastes, (in the Life of Polycarp) that this Papirius was Successor to Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna. Valef.

(e) Polycrates does here stile Melito, an Eunuch, that is, in our Saviour's explication, one of those, who make themselves Eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake; who are content to deny themselves, and to renounce the lawful Pleasures and Comforts of the World, for the service of Religion. Ierom (De Scriptor. Ecclesiasticis) attests that this Melito was by many accounted a Prophet. Valef.

(f) Rufinus thought that seven of Polycrates's Ancestors, or Relations, were Bishops of Ephesus. But Polycrates does not say they were all Bishops of Ephesus; we may suppose they were Bishops in several Cities of Asia. Valef.

(g) In the King's, and May. MSS. this place is plainly written thus, [ὅταν ἡ λαὸς ἡμεῖς ἐξέλθῃ] i. e. when the People removed the Leaven. So Rufinus read this place, as appears by his Version; viz. Qui omnes in observantiam hunc diem ad conveniunt cum illo quo fermentum Iudaorum populus auferit; i. e. All which so observed this Day, that it might agree with that wherein the People of the Jews removed their Leaven.

I wonder why Robert Stephens read it [ὅταν ἡ λαὸς ἡμεῖς ἡμεῖς, when the People prepared, &c?]. For on the 14th Day of the first Month, the People did not prepare, but cast away their Leaven. See Exod. 12. 18. Valef.

'who were greater than I, have said, * We ought Commodus to obey God rather than Men." To these words, * Acts 5. speaking of all the Bishops who were present with him when he wrote, and were of the same Opinion with him, he adjoyns thus much, saying; I could make mention of the Bishops who are present with me, whom you (b) requested me to convene, and I have called them together; whose names should I annex [to this Epistle,] they would be very numerous; all which Persons having visited me, (who am a mean Man) did by their consent approve this Epistle; well knowing that I have not born these hoary Hairs in vain, but have always led my life agreeable to the Precepts of the Lord Jesus." After this, Victor the Bishop of Rome, did immediately attempt to cut off from the common Unity the Churches of all Asia, together with the adjoining Churches, as having given their assent to heterodox Opinions; and (i) by his Letters he publicly declares, and pronounces all the Brethren there to be wholly excommunicate: But this pleased not all the Bishops: Therefore they perfwade him to the contrary, [advising him] to entertain thoughts of Peace, of Unity, and Love of Christians among one another. Moreover their Epistles are now extant, whereat in they have sharply reproved Victor. Among whom Irenæus, having written a Letter in (k) the name of those Brethren in Gallia, whom he presided over, does indeed maintain, that the Mystery of our Lord's Resurrection ought to be celebrated only on a Sunday; but does in many other words seasonably advise him not to cut off the whole Churches of God for observing an ancient Custom derived down to them by Tradition: To which words he adjoyns thus much; 'For the Controvercie is not only concerning the expressly, [ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἐπεισάμεθα, i. e. we endeavoured to cut off from the Communion, &c.] (2) The Epistles written to Victor by Irenæus and other Bishops, do shew, that the Sentence of Excommunication was not then pronounced by Victor; for thus Eusebius writes concerning Irenæus's Letters, [ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἐπεισάμεθα, i. e. we endeavoured to cut off whole Churches, &c.] (3) Phoebus (in Biblioth. Chap. 120.) writes that Irenæus wrote many Letters to Victor, perswading him not to excommunicate any one for their dissent about the observation of Easter; therefore, before Irenæus wrote, Victor had excommunicated no Body: Now, it cannot be supposed that Victor did it after the receipt of Irenæus's Letters; for then Eusebius would have made mention of it; but he intimates the contrary to all this, calling Irenæus [ἐνεργημάτων, i. e. Peace-maker, because his Letters restored Peace to the Church. These are Valef's reasons. On the contrary Socrates, (B. 5. Chap. 22.) Sozomenus in his life of Irenæus, pag. 668; and Dr. Cave in the Life of Irenæus, pag. 168. are of opinion, that this Sentence of Excommunication was actually pronounced by Victor. Their main Argument for this, is grounded on these Words of Eusebius, which here follow [ὅτι ἐκείνην τὴν ἡμέραν ἡμεῖς ἐξέκομμεν ἀπὸν τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἀνακαταλύσαντες ἀλλήλους] which we have thus rendered [And by his Letters he, i. e. Victor, publicly declares, and pronounces all the Brethren there to be wholly excommunicated.] Which, whether it does not outweigh all that *Valef*us has said to the contrary, is left to the determination of the Learned Reader.

(k) This Epistle therefore of Irenæus's was a Synodical Epistle; because 'twas written in the name of the Churches of France, the chief City whereof then was Lyon. This Epistle is mentioned by Eusebius, in the foregoing Chapter: For I judge it to be one and the same Epistle, because 'tis unlikely there should be two Synods convened in so short a time, to determine of one and the same matter. Valef.

Commodus. Day; but also concerning the very (1) Form of the (m) Fast: For some suppose they ought to (n) Fast (o) one day, others (p) two, others more; (q) others computing forty [continued].

Hours of the Day and Night make [that Space] a two-fold distinction in the Church; the first, concerning Easter-day; the second, about the form of the Fast; i.e. how many Days were to be kept as a Fast; for so he explains himself in the following Words. For all, as well those who celebrated Easter on the Sunday, as those who, with the Jews, kept that Festival on the fourteenth day of the Moon's appearance, did agree in this, to wit, that they failed before Easter. Which Fast, as well as the Fast of Easter, they had received from Apostolick Tradition: See Eusebius, Book 2, Chap. 17. And the Notes there. Valf.

(m) Amongst the ancient Christians there were three kinds of Fasts: the first was the Fast on Wednesdays and Fridays, which ended at the 9th hour of the Day, (i.e. at three a-Clock in the afternoon), after the end of the Station, or Holy Communion. The second sort was the Lent-Fast, which ended about the evening. The third sort was the strictest of all, and called to the Cock-crowing; which was therefore by the Greeks called [ἡ νύκτα], in Latin Supperfast. Epiphanius (in his Expositio fidei Catholicæ, at the end of his books, against Hæreses) does plainly distinguish these three sorts of Fasts. So does Dionysius Alexandrinus, in his Epistle to Basilius. But now, it may be demanded, which of these three sorts of Fasts Irenæus does here speak of? 'Tis manifest, he means not the first sort; for he evidently speaks of a whole days Fast: Some suppose, says he, they ought to fast one day, &c. Dionysius Alexandrinus and Epiphanius, (in the places before-mentioned) seem to be of opinion, that Irenæus means the third sort of Fasts. Valf.

(n) These Words of Irenæus are variously understood. Belarmine thinks he speaks of Lent. Cardinal Perron supposes he speaks of the Week that precedes Easter: Which opinion is confirmed by Dionysius Alexandrinus and Epiphanius, in the places before-cited. Valf.

(o) Without doubt Irenæus means, the Friday of the Great Week; (i.e. the 1st Week before Easter;) on which day was kept a public Fast, says Tertullian, in his Book De Orat. and in that De Jejunio. Valf.

(p) To wit, on the Preparation-Day, (which we call Good-Friday,) and on the Great-Sabbath (i.e. the Saturday before Easter.) For on these two days all Persons, except the sick, were wont to Fast, says Tertullian, in his Book De Jejunio. Valf.

(q) The Kings Alaric and Fat. MSS. do read and point this place thus, [ἡ νύκτα], ἡ νύκτα ἡ νύκτα, τὴν νύκτα ἐκείνην ἐκείνην τὴν νύκτα ἐκείνην. And Mugulus has faithfully translated it thus, [Alii quadragesima hora diurna et nocturna computant, diem suum statuant], whom we follow in our Version of this place; having rendered it thus, [others computing forty-continued] hours of the day and night make that [space] their day [of Fasting]. This reading is doubtless the true: For Irenæus having said that some Fast one day, others two, others more; what need is there of his adding this [others fast forty days] when-as in those Words of his [others fast more Days] forty days, are comprehended? Besides, if the slop be put at [ἡ νύκτα], forty, (as 'tis in the Sext Mss., and in Rufinus and Christophorus's Translations) to what shall the following Words [ἡ νύκτα], ἡ νύκτα, &c.] be referred? If they be referred to those that Fast forty Days, (as 'tis certain they must) then 'twill necessarily follow, that those who Fast forty Days during that time do eat nothing at all, being that they account their Fast must be continued all the Hours of the Night, as well as the Day. Having made out the true Reading of this place, we come to explain the meaning of it. Irenæus therefore says, that some Failed forty continued Hours of the Day and Night. Some think this Fast of forty Hours was kept by them in memory of that space of time which was between the Death of Christ and his Resurrection: Which space of time contained about forty Hours; to wit, from the sixth Hour of the Preparation-Day (that is, between 12 and 3 a-Clock on Good-Friday) to the dawning of Easter-Day: But I suppose 'twas kept in honour and memory of Christ's forty Days Fast in the Wilderness. Three things may be collected from these Words of Irenæus. (1.) That the Fast before Easter was usually observed in the Church from the very times of the Apostles. (2.) This Fast was celebrated in honour and memory of Christ's Fast: (3.) That the space of time, allotted for this Fast, was various and different. But we ought always to remember that Irenæus does here speak of the Fast of Superfastion; (See Note (m) in this Chap.) which the Christians usually observed throughout the Great-week; (i.e. the Passion-week;) The Fast in which Week being once admitted, the Fast of Lent must also be admitted: For the Week before Easter is part of Lent. Sometimes indeed we see the Fast of this Week is distinguished from the Lent-Fast; (as in Epiphanius's Expositio fidei, &c.) but 'tis not so distinguished, as if it did not really belong to Lent; by 'tis distinguished from it, as the part is from the whole. The reason of this distinction is twofold; (1.) it was kept with a more strict Fast, to wit, the Fast of Superfastion; (as we shewed before, Note (m).) (2.) This Week does properly belong to Easter. For the feria (or Days) of it have their denomination from the following Sunday, as shall hereafter be manifested. Hence 'tis called the Great-week, as shall hereafter be termed Christophorus does give in his 30. Familiæ or Geniæ. This Week began from the second feria, (i.e. Monday,) says Cyril in Homil. Paschal. and Epiphanius in Actianis. Valf.

their (r) Day [of Fasting:] and this variety in Commodus. observing [the Fast] has not been begun in our (r) In the Age, but a long while since, in the Times of our Original Ancestors: (r) Who being (as 'tis probable) 'tis [to] not so diligent in their Presidencies proposed that as a Custom to their Successors, which was introduced by simplicity and unskillfulness. And yet nevertheless the maintenance of mutual Peace towards one another, which also we retain. Thus the variety of the Fast commands the content of the Faith. Hereto he adjoins a Relation, which I will suitably insert in this place; it is thus: 'And the Presbyters, who, before Soter, presided over that Church which You now govern, I mean Anicetus, and Pius, Hyginus, Trophimus, and Xystus, these Persons, [I say,] neither observ'd it themselves, nor did they permit those (r) with them [to observe it]. Never- (r) In Tacitus and Herodotus's theles, although they themselves observ'd it not, yet they maintain'd Peace with those that did; as came to them from those Churches wherein it was observ'd. But the (n) Observation of it, 'tis amongst those who kept it not, seem'd to have ended much more of contrariety in it. Neither were any Persons ever excommunicated upon account of this Form [of the Fast:] But the Presbyters, then, so your Predecessors, who observ'd it not, † Rufinus reads this the Eucharist to the [Presbyters] of those Churches which observ'd it not: And when (x) Polycarp of blessed memory came to Rome in by his the Times of Anicetus, and there had been a Version. small Controversie between them concerning (w) The some other things, they did straightway mutually embrace each other; having not desired to be contentious with one another as is this; about this (y) Head: For neither could Anicetus perfwade Polycarp not to observe it, because he had always kept it with John the Disciple of our Lord, and the other Apostles with whom he had been conversant: Nor did Polycarp induce Anicetus to observe it, who said, he ought to retain the usage of the Presbyters that were his Predecessors. These things being thus, they received the Communion together. yet is often as he that observes the custom is conversant amongst those who observe it not, this diversity will be much more apparent. Valf.

† The Bishops were wont, in the time of the Festivity of Easter, to send the Eucharist to other Bishops, in the name of Eulogia. This custom was at length forbidden in the Council of Laodicea, Chap. 14. Valf.

(x) Though the exact time of Polycarp's coming to Rome cannot precisely be defined, yet will it in a great measure depend upon Anicetus's Succession to that See, in whose time he came thither. Now 'tis evident, that almost all the ancient Catalogues place him before Soter, and next to Pius, whom he succeeded. This Succession Eusebius (in his Chronicon) places on the year of Christ 154; (a computation doubtless much truer than that of Baronius, who places it on the year 167;) and agreeable to this the Chronicle of Alexandria places Polycarp's coming to Rome in the year 158; in the 21 of Antoninus the Emperor. See Dr. Cave's Life of St. Polycarp, pag. 115.

(y) Valentinus (in his Note on this place) denies that Polycarp came to Rome concerning the difference about the Paschal Solemnity; for it was, he says, some other Controversies, that brought him thither. But Irenæus's express words are (if our Eusebius has rightly represented them, in B. 4. Chap. 14.) That Polycarp came to Rome and [disput'd] Anicetus [de] n[on] c[on]suetudine dei t[em]p[or]is n[on] m[ag]is h[ab]uerat, i.e. upon account of a certain Controversie concerning the day when Easter was to be kept. 'Tis true, Irenæus says (in this Chapter) there was a difference between them [de]i c[on]suetudine, i.e. concerning some other things; but this does not hinder, but that the other was his main Errand to Rome.

Comm. d. 1. And Anicetus permitted Polyarp, (to wit, out of an honourable respect to him) to (2) consecrate the Sacrament in his own Church; and they parted peaceably one from another; as well those who observ'd it, as those who observ'd it not, retaining the Peace and Communion of the whole Church." Indeed, Irenæus, being truly answerable to his own name, was after this manner a Peace-maker, and advis'd and assert'd these things upon the account of the Peace of the Churches: The same person wrote not only to Polyarp, but sent Letters also, agreeable hereunto, to several other Governors of Churches, concerning the said Controversie which was then rais'd in his own Church.

CHAP. XXV.

How all with one consent unanimously agreed about Easter.

Moreover, those [Bishops] of Palestine, (whom we mention'd a little before) to wit, Narcissus and Theophilus; and with them Cassius Bishop of the Church at Tyre, and Clarus [Bishop] of that at Ptolemais, together with those assembled with them, having treated at large concerning the Tradition about Easter, deriv'd down to them by succession from the Apostles, at the end of their Epistle they adjoin thus much, in these very words: 'Make it your business to send Copies of this our Epistle throughout the whole Church, that so we may not be blamed by those, who do easily seduce their own Souls: We also declare to you, that they celebrate Easter at Alexandria on the same day that we do: (a) For Letters are convey'd from us to them, and from them to us; so that we observe the Holy Day with one consent and together.

(a) The Acts of this Synod of Cæsarea are extant in Bede, in his Book concerning the vernal Equinox; which some look upon to be false; but I think they are in no wise to be despised. Baronius accounted them to be genuine. Valesius.

CHAP. XXVI.

How many [Monuments] of Irenæus's Polite Ingenie have come to our hands.

(a) BUT, besides the fore-mentioned Works and Epistles of Irenæus's, there is extant a most concise and most necessary Book of his against the Gentiles, entitled Concerning Knowledge. And another, (which he dedicated to a Brother, whose name was Marcellinus, [containing] a (b) Demonstration of the Apostolick Preaching: And a Book of Variations (c) Tracts, wherein he makes mention of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and that called The Wisdom of Solomon, and quotes some Sentences out of them: And thus many are the [Writings] of Irenæus, which came to our knowledge. But Commodus having ended his Government after he had reign'd thirteen years, Severus obtain'd the Empire, Pertinax having not govern'd full out six Months after the Death of Commodus.

(a) The reading in the original is, ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ. Valesius thinks it should be ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, a Demonstration. (b) Rufinus translates it [dialogos, dialogues]. Jerom renders it [Tractatus, Tracts]. It may be taken to signify Sermon or Discourse to the People: For in that sense our Eusebius takes the word διακρίσεις in his 11. Chap. 10. and in the 36 Chap. of that Book he calls Origen's Εὐαγγέλιον [Evangelium]. Valesius.

C H A P. XXVII.

How many also of [the Works of others] who their Followers have come to our knowledge.]

I NDEED, very many Monuments of the virtuous and laudable diligence of those Ancient and Ecclesiastick Men which then [flourish'd] are to this day preserv'd amongst men: But [the Works] of those, whom we our selves could (a) discern to be such, are, Heracitus's [Comments] upon the Apocalypse (which is Apoc.), and the [Book] of (b) Maximus concerning the term that Quellion fo much talk'd of amongst Here-ticks, whence evil proceeds: And concerning this, that Matter is made: Also Candidus's Piece, on the six Days Work; and that of Apion upon the same subject. In like manner Sextus's Book concerning Quellion, i. e. the Resurrection; and another Piece of Arabianus's, to discern, and of very many more; whose Times wherein they lived, because we want assistances from the proof thereof, we can neither commit to writing, nor yet (c) declare any memorable Passages [of their's, in this our History]. There are also come to our hands the Books of many others, which by some very names we are unable to recite: All those which were indeed Orthodox and Ecclesiastick [Persons], as the Interpretations of the Sacred Scripture [produced] by every one of them do demonstrate; but yet they are unknown to us, because what they have written has not their name prefix'd to it.

Maximus, Sec. Rufinus and Jerom, instead of Heracitus, read Heracitus. Our Historian does here relate, first the Ecclesiastick Writers of that time, whose names he knew: Afterwards he mentions those, whose Books were still extant; but their names were unknown.

(a) The Title of Maximus's Book was ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, concerning Matter: It was compos'd by way of Dialogue. Eusebius quotes a most excellent piece of it in his last Chap. of his 7 B. Preparat. Evang. where he gives the Author this Elogium: *Μαξίμου δὲ τῆς χάριτος ἀδελφεὸς καὶ ἀνὴρ ἀπλὸς, καὶ λόγιος, ἐκείνου ἀντιπροσέταται ὁ τοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ ἰ. e. Maximus, a Person in no wise obscure for his Christian Life and Conversation, wrote a seasonable piece, entitled, Concerning Matter. Valesius.*

(c) Eusebius does usually quote some passages out of those Author's Works, which he mentions: So he did, as we see, out of Irenæus, Clement, Heracitus, Papias, and others; whenever he knew the time of the Author's Writing. But in these Writers, whom he mentions in this Chapter, Eusebius says he could not perform this, because he could not certainly know the times they lived in, but was in want of Arguments and Proofs thereof. Valesius.

C H A P. XXVIII.

Concerning those, who from the beginning were Defenders of Artemon's Herefie; what manner of persons they were as to their Morals, and how that they were so audacious as to corrupt the Sacred Scriptures.

I N AN elaborate Piece of one of those Authors, compos'd against the Herefie of Artemon, (which Herefie Paulus Samosatensis has again attempted to revive in our Age,) there is extant a certain Relation very accommodate to the History we now have in hand. For the (a) Book now cited, evincing that the foresaid Herefie, which affirms our Saviour to be a meer Man, was an Innovation of a late date; (because the Introducers of it had boasted it was very ancient,) after many of [Arguments] brought to confute their blasphemous Lye, has this Relation word for word: 'For whereof is it they affirm that all the Ancients, and the very unknown Apostles, received and taught the same things, was the Little Labyrinth of this Book (Chap. 48.) relates that Crim was the Author of this Book. But Theodoret (B. 2. Aleret. Fabul.) confirms Nicéphorus's opinion, and mentions this very Story of Theodoretus the Tameer, and Nicetas the Bishop, attesting he had taken it out of the Books called The Little Labyrinth. Valesius.

which they now assert; and that the Preaching of the Truth was preserved till the times of Victor, who from Peter was the thirteenth Bishop of Rome; but from the times of his Successor Zephyrinus the Truth has been adulterated. Peradventure this saying of theirs might seem probable, did not in the first place the Sacred Scriptures contradict them, and then the Writings of some Brethren ancienter than the times of Victor, which Books they wrote in defence of the Truth, against the Gentiles, and against the Heresies of their own times. I mean the [Writings of] Iustin, Miltiades, Tatianus, and Clement, and of many others: In all which Books the Divinity of Christ is maintained. For who is he that is ignorant of the Books of Irenaeus, Melito, and the rest, which declare Christ to be God and Man? The

(b) Hence it appears, that 'twas an ancient custom in the Church to compose Psalms and Hymns in honour of Christ. Pliny (in his Epistle to Trajan) mentions this usage amongst the Christians; as we have already observed, at B. 2. Chap. 17.

therefore this Ecclesiastical Opinion has been manifestly declared for so many years since, how can it be that the [Ancients] should have preach'd that Doctrine, which these Men assert, until the times of Victor? How can they choose but be ashamed of framing such Lies of Victor; when as they know for certain that Victor, excommunicated Theodotus the Tanner, the Founder and Father of this Apostasy which denies God, who first asserted Christ to be a meer Man? For if Victor were (as they say) of the same Opinion with that, which their Blasphemy does maintain, why did he proferibe Theodotus the Inventor of this Heresie? And such was the face of Affairs in the times of Victor: To whom, having presided in his publick Charge ten years, Zephyrinus was made Successor about the ninth year of Severus's Empire. [Further,] the Person that compiled the foresaid Book concerning the Author of the new-mention'd Heresie, relates another thing which was done in the times of Zephyrinus, in these very words: I will therefore advertise many of the Brethren of a thing done in our Age; which had, it hapned in Sodom, would, I suppose, have put those Inhabitants in mind of [Repentance.] There

(c) Perhaps this Person was that Cassius Natalis, who by a dispute of Orbasius Januarius's before Minucius Felix at Rome was converted to the Christian Faith; as Minucius Felix relates, in his Dialogue. Indeed, the name, the time, and the profession of this Person do all agree to make this probable. Valef.

(d) The Antiq. Med. Eux. and Savil MSS. read [ἐκ τῆς βασιλείας], i. e. in the election. The King's MSS. and Rob. Stephens read [ἐκ τῆς βασιλείας], i. e. in the election. Valef.

Disciples of Theodotus the Tanner, who before had been excommunicated, as I said, by Victor then Bishop, for this Doctrine, or rather Madnels. Natalis was persuaded by them to be elected a Bishop of this Heresie, upon the consideration of a Salary, whereby he was to receive of them monthly an hundred and fifty pence. Being therefore become one of their Associates, he was by Visions [in his sleep] frequently admonish'd by the Lord: For our compassionate God and Lord Jesus Christ was unwilling that he, [who had been] a Witness of his own Sufferings, should perish whilst he was under Excommunication. But after he was regardless of the Visions [in his sleep,] being beguiled with the Bait of Primacy among those [of the Sect,] and of filthy lucre, (which is the destruction of many Men,) at last he was scourged by the Holy Angels, and sorely beaten all night long: Infomuch that he arose very early, and having put on sackcloth, and besprinkled himself with Ashes, in great haste, and with Tears in his Eyes, he cast himself down before Zephyrinus the Bishop, falling down not only before the Feet of the Clergy, but of the Laity also; and with his Tears moved the compassionate Church of the Merciful Christ: And after he had used much intreaty, and shown the

(e) Prints of the Stripes he had received, with much difficulty he was admitted into the Communion [of the Church.] Hereunto we will also annex some other words of the same Writers concerning these [Heresicks;] They are these: 'They have impudently adulterated the

(e) Valef says those Stripes are meant here, which Natalis had undergone for the confession of Christ; Quas, says he, pro Christi Confessione perdidit: Indeed Natalis is called ἐκκλησιαστής, a Confessor, at the beginning of this Story; and afterwards ἀσκητής, a Martyr or Wineist: But perhaps the Author might mean here the Stripes, which the Story says he receiv'd from the Holy Angels.

Sacred Scriptures; they have rejected the Canon of the Primitive Faith; and have been ignorant of Christ: They are not inquisitive after that which the Holy Scriptures say, but bestow much labour and industry in finding out such a Scheme of a Sylogism, as may confirm the System of their Impiety: And if any one proposes to them a Text of the Divine Scriptures, ther a (f) Connex, or Disjunctive Form of a Sylogism may be made of it: Leaving the Holy Scriptures of God, they study Geometry; being of the Earth they speak of things terrestrial, and are ignorant of him who

(f) These are Logical terms: συμπεπληρωμένη is properly such a Proposition, as this [if it be day, there is light;] ἀνελκυσμένη is such an one as this [either it is day, or it is night;] See Diogen. Laert. in Zenone. Valef.

(g) comes from above: Therefore amongst some (g) He of them Euclid's Geometry is with great diligence studied; Arifotle and Theophrastus are admired; and in like manner (b) Galen is by others of them even adored. What need I say that these Persons, (who make use of the Arts of Infidels for the Confirmation of their Heretical Opinion, and by the Craft of Atheists adulterate the sincere Authority of the Divine Scriptures,) are most remote from the Faith? Hence 'tis that they have advant of our Saviour; which this ancient Fathers usually speak of not as future, but present. Valef.

(h) Galen wrote Books concerning the forms of Sylogisms, and concerning the whole System of Philology, as appears from the Catalogue of his Works. From this place 'tis evident, that Galen is a very ancient Author, which may be collected not only from the Testimony of this Writer, but from many others, who have made him contemporary with Arifotle, Theophrastus, and Plato. See Alexander Aphrodisi. B. 3. Topic. at the beginning. Valef.

impudently laid their hands upon the Divine Scriptures, saying they ought to be corrected; he that is desirous may be informed that I speak not this fallily of them. For would any one examine the Copies which they have gotten together, and compare them one with another, he would find that they disagreed very much. For the Copies of (i) Asclepiades (i) Some agree not with those of Theodotus. Many call him such Copies as these may be procured; because Galen and his Disciples have with much labour and curiosity written the Corrections (as they call and Ruffinus them, that is, the Corruptions) of every one not true of their [Masters.] Again, the Copies of him, Asclepiades.

A little after this instead of [Apollonius] we read [Apollonides] as did Rufinus and Nicephorus. Valef.

Hermo-

Severus. Hermophilus agree not with these now mentioned; and those of Apollonides differ one from another. For he that shall compare them, will find that those Copies first put forth (k) by him do very much disagree from his other [Copies,] which he did afterwards again wrest and deform. How much of Audaciousness there is in this wicked Fa<sup>a</sup>, 'tis probable they themselves are not ignorant: For either they don't believe the Divine Scriptures to have been dictated by the Holy Spirit, and then they are Infidels: Or else they account themselves wiser than the Holy Ghost; and what are they then but Mad-men? For they cannot deny this audacious Fact to have been done by their own selves, because [the Copies] have been written out by their own Hands: (l) Neither did they receive such Copies as these from those who were their Instructors; nor yet can they shew the Copies out of which they transcribed these things. But some of them have not indeed vouchsafed to adulterate the Scriptures, but did they having wholly rejected both the Law, and the Prophets, (m) by a lawless and atheistical Doctrine under a Pretext of Grace, they are fallen into the deepest Pit of Destruction." And let thus much be after this manner related concerning these things.

(1) Sir H. See in Margin of his MS. had made it by him. Our other MSS. read it as it is, by them. But the former reading is the best. For the Author speaks only of Apollonides here; affirming that he put forth two Editions of the Sacred Scriptures, the latter of which differed very much from the former. Valef.

they shew the Copies out of which they transcribed these things are wanting in the King's MS. I think them not very necessary: But they are in the Mar. Med. and Fuk. MSS. and in Rufinus's Version. Valef.
(m) Evangel. or Ev. i.e. by or, by reason of, is here to be understood. These Hereticks, under a pretence of the Grace given by the Gospel rejected both the Law and the Prophets: Upon which account he calls their Doctrine Lawless and Atheistical. Valef.

Concerning the Persecution under Severus.

Moreover, when Severus stirr'd up Persecution against the Churches in every place throughout all the Churches; noble Martyrdoms were performed by the Champions of Religion; but [the number of the Martyrs] at Alexandria far exceeded the rest, the (a) choicest of the Champions having been convey'd thither out of all Egypt and Thebais, as to the noblest Stadium of God; who in reward of their most patient suffering divers sorts of Torments, and several ways of death, were encircled with Crowns from God: Amongst whom Leonides, said to be the Father of (b) Origen, was beheaded, and left his Son very young. And here 'twill not be unreasonable briefly to relate what Zeal and Affection he bore to the (c) Gospel from this time of his Childhood, and for this reason especially, because his fame is much celebrated by all Men.

(a) Alexis, i.e. the choicest, 'tis the nearest signification of the word, but does not fully explain it, for the word imports some thing more. See Viger. Idiot. pag. 195.
(b) 'Tis a critical dispute whether the Greek word be ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, or ἐπίσκοπος with an Aspirate, or a Τένυς; Some say 'tis ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, because it is derived from ἀρχή mature and ἐπισκοπή natu. i.e. born in a fit season: And for this reason the Med. Mar. and Fuk. MSS. always write it with an Aspirate. Valef.
(c) ὁ ὁρὶς ἁγίου, Eusebius always uses both for the Gospel, and the Christian Religion, as in Chap. 2. and 5. of this Book, and this Rufinus renders Divina legis studia; Christophor. Sacrarum litterarum studium; and Masculus translates it Divinum Doctrinam. Valef.

CHAP. II.

Concerning Origen's Virtuons Course of Life from a Child.

NOW should any one undertake accurately and at his leisure to commit to writing this Man's Life, he must say much, and a strict Collection of all Passages concerning him, would require even a particular Subject; but our aim at present is to abbreviate most things, and in short, and, as well as we can, we will give an account of some few Passages concerning him; relating what things have been manifested by some Epistles, or by the Discourse of those his Scholars, who were alive till our times. The Passages concerning Origen (as one would say) even from his Cradle seem to be worth remembrance. Severus therefore being in the tenth year of his Reign, and Latus being Governor of Alexandria and the rest of Egypt; Demetrius also having lately taken upon him the Episcopal Office over the Churches there, after Julianus; when the Flame of Persecution now raged grievously, and many thousands were crown'd with Martyrdom, such a desire of Martyrdom possess'd the Soul of Origen being yet very young, that he would expose himself to Dangers, and was very ready and willing to rush forward and leap into the Combat: So that now he was not far from death, had not the Divine and Celestial Providence, for the good of many, hindred and restrained his willingness to die, by his Mother's means. First therefore he intreated him like a Suppliant, and beseech'd him to take pity of her Motherly love: But when she saw him more intent upon his purpose, and when he understood his Father was apprehended, and imprison'd, he was wholly possess'd with a desire of Martyrdom: Wherefore he hid all his Cloaths, and by this means necessitated him to abide at home. But he, seeing he had no way left, (the alacrity of his Mind surmounting the ripeness of his Years,) could not be at rest, but compos'd a most perswasive Epistle concerning Martyrdom, and sends it to his Father, in which he thus exhorts him word for word, saying, [Father,] take heed: Let not your care for us make you change your Resolution. Let this be noted as the first Token of Origen's acuteness of Wit from his Childhood, and of his most sincere Zeal for Religion. For he had already got no small stock of knowledge in the Doctrine of the Faith, continuing whilst he was yet a Child, to exercise himself in searching the Holy Scriptures; about which he was not a little laborious; his Father having taken great care, both in instructing him in the Libeover, (who carefully miniftr'd to a very famous Man, one of that Heretical Se&ct then at Alexandria, but by birth an Antiochian.) Him the fore-said Woman having adopted for her Son, kept him with her, and shew'd kindness to him in a most special manner. But Origen, though forc'd to converse with the said [ Heretic ], yet from that time shew'd powerful Proofs of his sound Opinion concerning the Faith. For when great Multitudes of People, not only Heretics, but also them of our Religion, flock'd to Paul ( for this was the Man's name ) because he seem'd to be a person of great eloquence; [ Origen ] could never be induc'd to assist him in prayer : Always from a Child observing the Canon of the Church, and abominating the Doctrines of Heresies, ( as he himself in express words somewhere says : ) and having been educated in the Greek Learning by his Father at first, after his death he devoted himself wholly and more earnestly to the study of the Liberal Sciences; so that he was furnish'd with an (b) indifferent skill in the Art of Grammar; and having profess'd this Art soon after his Father's death, he got plenty of Necessaries, considering the age he then was of.

How Origen being very young Preach'd the Word of Christ.

(a) Willst he yet applied himself to his School, (as he in his Writings recordeth,) no one residing at Alexandria (b) to teach the Principles of Christianity, but all being driven away by the threatening Persecution: Some of the Heathens resorted to him, to hear the Word of God. Of which number he notes Plutarchus to have been the first; who when he had lived a virtuous secular life, was crown'd with Divine Martyrdom. The second was Hennicus, Plutarchus's Brother, who having under him shew'd many instances of a Philosophical and severe course of life, was honoured with the Bishoprick of Alexandria after Demetrius. He was now in the eighteenth year of his age, when he was Master of the Catechetical School; in which he made great proficiency, in the Persecutions during the time of Aquila's Prefecture over Alexandria. At which time he purchased to himself a famous name amongst all them who were well-affect'd towards the Faith, for the singular friendship and alacrity which he shew'd to all the Holy Martyrs known and unknown. For he convert'ed not only with such as were in

(b) This word μαθησάμενος signifies originally, instructed, to found: The preposition [απὸ] makes it, being a verb Nominative, to have an Adverb signification, and he is properly said απὸ μαθησάμενος, who tells us any thing right or would teach us by way of instruction: Hence it signifies to teach the Rudiments, or first Grounds of an Art, but peculiarly to teach the Principles of Christian Religion, which we call Catechizing in English, fifty years out of the Greek. Some say, Heathen Authors knew not this use of this word, but they mistake, for Lucian uses it in this sense, to teach the Rudiments of any Art. Stephan. Lexicon.

(c) Μὴ τὴν βίαν, i. e. after he had led a pious secular life: The word βίαν is by Christians used to signify secundum vitam agere. For βίη is seculum, as Cryostom uses it in his 25<sup>d</sup> Homily on the Epistle to the Romans, where he calls βιαντες them whom we call Laics, to distinguish them from the Clergy, in these words; οὐκ οὐδὲν ἄλλο τὸν βιαντήσαντα ἀπὸ τοῦ κληρικοῦ, ἢ τὸν ἐκ τῆς πόλεως εἶναι καλεῖσθαι. In this sense must the word here be understood; one of Virgin's Disciples lived a pious secular life, being a Laic, the other was a Clergyman Laic.

much that he troubled his Father by asking him, what was the true meaning of such a sentence of Scripture inspired by God. He seeming before his face reproved him, admonishing him not to search into any thing above the capacity of his years, nor [to enquire] any further than the plain meaning [of Scripture.] But he privately with himself rejoiced exceedingly, and gave the greatest thanks to God the Author of all Good, that he vouchsafed to make him the Father of such a Child : And 'tis reported, he has often flood by the Child as he slept, and laying his Breast bare, would kiss it with reverence, as if the sacred spirit of God had been enshrind in it, and accounted himself bliss'd for his happy Off-spring. These and such-like they record, were the Passages concerning Origen in his Childhood : But when his Father was now crown'd with Martyrdom, he is left desolate (together with his Mother and younger Brothers, six in number,) being no more than seventeen years of age : Moreover, his Father's Estate having been confiscate, he was brought into extrem want of necessary Subsistence, together with his Relations, but God thought him worthy of his Providence. And he obtains entertainment and rest from a Woman, who was very rich in respect of her Estate, and very eminent otherways : More-

Seruus. Bonds, nor with them who had been examined until their last Sentence, but with those Blessed Martyrs also, who, after that was pronounc'd, were led to Execution; making use of great boldness he went to meet Dangers: So that the furious Multitude of the Heathens standing round, were frequently not far from stoning of him, when he boldly came forth, and with great freedom of Speech communed with the Martyrs, and kiss'd them, had he not once miraculously escap'd, having the Right Hand of God for his assistance. The same Divine and Heavenly Grace at other times again and again (so that 'tis impossible to say how often,) preserv'd him from them who then laid wait for him, because of his exceeding Cheerfulness and Confidence in Preaching the Doctrine of Christ: Indeed, so great was the Hostility of the Infidels against him, (because such Multitudes were instructed by him in the things which appertain to the Holy Faith,) that having made a (d) Concourse, they set Soldiers to watch about the House in which he abode. And the Persecution against him waxed so hot daily, that all the whole City of Alexandria could no longer secure him; he removes indeed from House to House, but is driven from all places, because of the Multitude which through him were made Profelytes to the Divine Doctrine. For his common Actions contain'd the most admirable Rules of the truest Philosophy: Indeed, (as the common saying is) such as his Doctrine was, such was his manner of Life; and such as his manner of Life was, such he demonstrated his Doctrine to be: By this means especially, together with the Divine Power assisting him, he induc'd many to a zealous imitation of him. But when he saw many Scholars now flocking to him, (the exercise of Catechising being committed solely to him by Demetrius, who was Bishop of the Church,) supposing the teaching of Grammar disagreeable to his Studies in Divine Learning, he forthwith breaks off his Grammar-School, as unprofitable and contrary to the Sacred Learning. Then entering into a prudent Consideration with himself, how he might not stand in need of assistance from others, he sold all the Volumes he had of (e) Ancient Heathen Writers, which were most elaborately compiled, and was content with four * Oboli a-day, that were brought him by the Buyer. For many Years he persevered in this Philosophical Course of Life, depriving himself of all (f) Matter [which might nourish] youthful Lusts; both undergoing no small labour of severe Exercise in the Day-time, and also assigning to himself the greater part of the Night for his Study in the Holy Scriptures, patiently persevering in the most Philosophical Life imaginable. Sometimes he inured himself to the Exercises of Fasting; at other times to Hours measur'd out for his repose; which he would by no means enjoy upon a Bed, but made it his business to take it on the bare Ground, for he thought those Evangelical Words of our Saviour ought most especially to be observ'd, which exhort us not to (g) have two coats, nor to (h) wear shoes, nor to be sollicitous about the cares of the time to come. Moreover, with a Courage far greater than his Age, he patiently endured both Cold and Nakedness, and came to that height and extremity of Want, that he made those of his Acquaintance admire exceedingly. And he caus'd Grief in many, who entreated him that they might communicate of their Estates to him, because they saw him bring such Labours on himself for the Gospel's sake, but he remitted nothing of his Patience. 'Tis reported he walk'd upon the Ground barefoot many years, in no wise wearing any Shoes. And also for many years he abstain'd from the use of Wine, and from all other things, except necessary Sustainance; so that now he fell into a great danger of spoiling and turning his (i) Stomach. He deserv'dly excited most of his Scholars to imitate him; shewing them, who look'd upon him, such Examples of a Philosophical Life; inasmuch that now, not only the (j) Vulgar unbelieving Heathens, (k) but also they who were Learned Philosophers, were (l) through him brought to submit themselves to his Doctrine. And it came to pass that they who received by him in the bottom of their hearts sincerely the Faith of the Gospel, were famous in the time of the then Persecution: So that some of them after apprehension, finish'd their lives by Martyrdom.

by his means; and reads only τὸ δὲ πρῶτον διδασκαλίας, by his doctrine; which is the better reading; for the place seems to be corrupted, this [τὸ δὲ πρῶτον] creeping out of the Margin into the Text; or out of the line following into this place. The King's, and the May. MSS. alter [nothing here, but the Fok. MS. reads τὸ καὶ πρῶτον διδασκαλίας. Valef.]

C H A P. IV.

How many of those who had been instructed by him became Martyrs.

THE first of them was the aforementioned Plutarchus, whom (when he was led to Execution) * he of whom the Discourse is, accompanied to the last hour of his life, and again wanted little of being kill'd by the Men of his own City, as seeming the Cause of Plutarchus's Death. But then also the Providence of God preserv'd him. Next to Plutarch, the second of Origen's Disciples, that was a Martyr, was Serenus: Who by Fire gave a trial of the Faith which he had received. Heraclides was made the third Martyr of the same School. The fourth after him was (a) Heron: Both which Persons were beheaded, the former of them while he was yet learning the Principles of Christianity, the latter when he was newly (b) baptiz'd. Besides these, another Serenus, different from the former, is declar'd the fifth Champion of Piety [who came out] of this School: Who, 'tis reported, was punish'd with the loss of his Head, after a most patient sufferance of many Torments. it shall be [Herai's] in one word, not [Isais], two words; which concludes I found confirmed by the Kings, and Euseb. MSS. Rufinus agrees hereto, who translates this place thus, ad q. mulieres plurimas, in quibus Herai quendam Catechumena. 'Tis a proper name derived from Isais, who is called in Greek Herai. Whence comes Isais Herai's, the name of an Egyptian Philosopher, concerning whom See Suidas. The Greeks celebrate the memory of this Herai's on the fourth, or rather the fifth day of March, as 'tis in the Martyrology set forth by Caesius. I am not certain whether this Person be the same with the Isis, the Alexandrian Virgin, who in the Roman Martyrology is said to have suffered Martyrdom (together with some others) at the City Antioch on September 22. In Cardinal Sirletus's Martyrology, at the fifth of September, these Words occur; Natalis B. Martyris Rhaidis, que igne consumpta est i. e. the birth-day of the B. Martyr Rhaidis, who was burnt. This is the same whom Eusebius mentions here. Therefore there were three Herai's; the first is the mentioned in the Menologium, at the fifth day of March. The second Herai's is the Catechumena, of whom mention is made in the Martyrology, on the fifth of September: The third Herai's the Egyptian Virgin, born at a place called Tamma; whose Father's name was Peter, a Presbyter: She suffered Martyrdom when she was twelve years old, as 'tis in the Menologium, at the 23d of September; where she is called Herai's: In the Roman Martyrology she is termed, Isais. Valef.

Concerning Potamiana.

LET Basillides be reckon'd the seventh among the, who lead the most renown'd Potamiana to Execution, concerning which Woman, even yet there is a famous report amongst the Inhabitants of those Countries, for that she combated many times with her Lovers, in defence of the Chastity and Virginity of her Body; for which she was famous: (For besides the Vigour of her Mind, there flourish'd in her a Comeliness of Body:) Who, having suffer'd many things for her Faith in Christ, at last, after grievous Torments and horrible to be related, was together with her Mother Marcella consumed by Fire. Moreover, they say that the Judge, (whose name

(a) This Aquila was Governor of Egypt, as Eusebius before relates in the 2d Chapter: At which time Origen was in the eighteenth year of his age. Valef.

(b) The Gladiators were commonly noted to be lascivious wicked Men; therefore Aquila threatened to deliver her to them, thinking she, who had such special care of her Chastity, would rather revolt from her Faith, than hazard the Purity of her Body, by being put into their Power.

in good part the Man's commiseration shewn towards her, exhorts him to be of good courage, for when she was gone hence she would entreat her Lord for him, and within a little while she would make him a requital for what he had done for her. When she had spoken these things, they say the valiantly underwent death, not fear-

ding Pitch being leisurely, and by little and little, pour'd upon all the several Members of her Body, from the Sole of the Foot, to the Crown of the Head: such was the Combat fought by this famous Virgin. But not long after, Basillides upon some occasion being defired by his Fellow-Soldiers to swear, avouch'd 'twas not lawful for him to swear at all; for he was a Christian, and he openly confess'd it. At first they thought he only spake in jest, but when he constantly maintain'd it, he is brought before the Judge, and after he had made profession of his Steadfastness before him, he was put into Bonds: And when some of the Brethren in the Lord came to him, asking him what was the cause of this sudden and unexpected change, he is reported to have said, that Potamiana, three days after her Martyrdom, stood by him in the Night, put a Crown about his Head, and said, she had increased the Lord for him, and had obtain'd her request: And within a little while the Lord would take him up to himself. After these things the Brethren imparted to him the (d) Seal of the Lord; and the (d) Sabbath Day after, being famous for his Testimony of John, the Lord, he was beheaded: They relate, that many more throughout Alexandria came thick at that time to the Doctrine of Christ; to wit, such as Potamiana had avouch'd to in their sleep, and (e) invited them to be converted to the Gospel: But for these things let thus much suffice. (c) Rufinus translates this place so as to make Potamiana Origen's Scholar; neither dare we contradict him in that. For although Eusebius does not mention it particularly, yet we may gather so much from this his Narration; for, reckoning up the Martyrs which were of Origen's School, he adds to them Basillides and Potamiana; whence 'tis collected these two also were his Disciples; and though we cannot for certain say Basillides was, yet 'tis probable Potamiana might be one of them. Valef.

Concerning Clements Alexandrinus.

(a) Clement, who succeeded Pantænus, was (a) There Master of the Catecherick-School at Alexandria till this time. So that Origen when he connexion was a Boy was one of his Scholars: Moreover, betwixt this Clement, committing to writing the Subject of that Work of his, entitled Stromateis, in his first Volume explains the Series of Times, and determines his Computation at the Death of Commodus was then not then the Cate-chist at Alexandria; but Origen writes in the foregoing Book. And Cairn in his little Labyrinth, reckons him among the Ecclesiastical Writers which writ in the time of Vittor; the Words of Cairn are at the end of the 5th Book: Therefore Rufinus rightly places this and the following Chapter in the 5d Chapter of this Book, where he speaks of Demetrius the Bishop's committing the Office of Catechizing to Origen. Valef.

Concerning Judas the Writer.

AT this time also lived Judas another Writer, who commented upon the Seventy Weeks in Daniel, and puts an end to his Computation of the Times at the Tenth year of Severus's Reign. His Opinion was, that even at that time the coming of Antichrist, which was so much talk'd of, drew nigh. So great a Disturbance did the raising of the Persecution then against us cause in many Men's Minds.

AT this time while Origen perform'd the Office of Catechizing at Alexandria, an Act of an unripe and youthful Mind was committed by him, but which withal contain'd a most manifest token of Continence and true Faith: For he taking these words [*Some * Eunuchs there are of Heaven's sake*] in the more simple meaning, unadvisedly like one of his juvenile years, thinking it both his duty to fulfil our Saviour's words, and also [considering] that during his youthful years he was to converse not only with Men, but Women, about the things which appertain to God; that he might exclude the Infidels from all suspicion of obscene flanders, his Mind was full bent to perform really our Saviour's words, taking great care that it might escape the knowledge of many of his Familiars: But it was impossible for him, altho' he was desirous, to conceal such a Fact. But when Demetrius understood it, as being then Governour of the Church there, he both greatly admires him for his boldness, and also, (having commended his alacrity of Mind, and sincerity of Faith,) forthwith encourages and excites him to a more diligent Employment about the Duty of Catechizing: For such at this time was [Demetrius'] opinion of this Act: But no long time after, when he saw Origen do well, and that he was famous, and well-reported of by all Men; being affected with the Frailties of Mankind, he endeavour'd by Letters, sent to all the Bishops in the World, to describe what was done as a most absurd action. (a) For the Bishops of Cæsarea and Jerusalem, the most approved and most famous of all the Prelates in Palestine, judging Origen worthy of Dignity and the highest pitch of Honours, had by Imposition of Hands ordain'd him Presbyter. Therefore when he had ascended to great Honour, and had purchas'd a name amongst Men in all places, and no small fame for his Virtue, and Wisdom; Demetrius, being furnish'd with no other Accusation, made a great and malicious complaint against that Act which he had done in his youth. Daring also to involve the Bishops in his Accusations who had promoted him to the Office of a Presbyter. These things were done a little after. But then Origen (b) freely and without any Impediment perform'd his Office of teaching the Divine Doctrine to all that came to him by Day or by Night; laboriously spending all his time either in his Priest. In which thing no small injury was done to Demetrius, both by the Bishops, and Origen; by Origen because he had yielded to be ordained by foreign Bishops; and by the Bishops, because by doing this they had manifested the Episcopacy of Alexandria into their Church. Moreover, there arises a difficult not to be pass'd by, viz. Why two Bishops together should ordain Origen? By this means he has power to sit in two Churches, and to communicate with other Priests. See the 22. and 27. Chapters following; where this conjecture is confirm'd. 'Twas the Order, when either Deacons or Priests were ordained, some Bishops should be present, that the Ordination might be more solemn, (says Innocentius in his Epistle to Marcellus the Bishop of Thence, in Biblioth. Chap. 11. 8. says that Theodotus solemnized the Ordination, but Alexander gave his approbation. Chrysostomus also says there were the names of the Bishops; Theodotus was Bishop of Cæsarea, and Alexander of Jerusalem. Valef.

(b) Αὐτοῦτος (the word here) has several significations; Rufinus explains it thus, When a Man has free power to do a thing, all impediments being removed; which explanation he so belies, for, before Origen made himself an Eunuch, for fear of a scandalous Report, he had taken care to be cautious of conversing with Women, and teaching them; but when he had unman'd himself, as he did, he might do it freely without suspicion. Valef.

in Divine Learning, or upon them who came to him. (c) After Severus had held the Empire eighteen years, his Son Antoninus succeeds him. At this time there liv'd one (d) Alexander, one of their number who had behav'd themselves manfully in the Persecution, and also by the Providence of God had been preserv'd after their Combats during their Confessions; him we before manifested to have been Bishop of the Church in Jerusalem. Now because he was famous for his Confession of Christ in the time of the Persecution, he is promoted to the afore-mention'd Bishoprick, whilst Narcissus, his Predecessor, was yet alive.

(d) Concerning this Alexander, Eusebius, in his Chronicle, in the 12. year of Severus's Reign, which was the second year of this Persecution, writes thus; Alexander was accounted famous for his confession of the Name of the Lord. Valef.

C H A P. IX.

Concerning the Miracles of Narcissus.

THE Inhabitants of this Diocese report many Miracles of this Narcissus, by tradition deriv'd from a continued succession of the Brethren: Amongst which they relate such a like Miracle as this done by him. 'Tis reported that on the great Vigils of Easter the Minister's Oil fail'd them, for which great pensiveness of Mind having seiz'd the whole Multitude, Narcissus gave command to them who took care of the Lights, that they should draw Water out of the Well which was nearest at hand, and bring it to him; which being forthwith done, he pray'd over the Water, and commanded them to pour the Water into the Lamps with a sincere Faith in the Lord. When they had done this also, contrary to all reason and expectation, by a miraculous and Divine Power, the Nature of Water was chang'd into the (A) Flames of Oil. Some small Specimen of this Miracle then done, has been preserv'd amongst many of the Brethren for a long time, even from that to our Age. They also relate several other things worth remembrance concerning this Man's Life. Amongst which there is such a Story as this: Some vile Fellows who could not endure this Person's Vigour, and his Perseverance in leading of a pious Life, fearing lest when they were caught they should suffer Punishment, because they were conscious to themselves of many evil Actions, they resolv'd to prevent him by catching up a Plot against him, and utter a grievous Calumny against him. Then, that they might persuade the Hearers to credit them, they confirm'd their Accusations with Oaths: One of them swore it was true which he said, or he wist'd he might be consum'd by Fire; another, if 'twas not true, that his Body might be wasted by some terrible unhappy (b) Disease.

(a) Εὐε δὲ αὐτὸς ἀποκρίσας, into the nature or quality of Oil; we should rather read it αἰῶνας, the flames of oil. Rufinus translates it thus, aque natura in olei pinguedinem versa, and in Altera's Book 'tis so corrected in the Margins of the Pat. MS. also reads αἰῶνας. Valef.

(b) Εὐε δὲ αὐτὸς ἀποκρίσας, into the nature or quality of Oil; we should rather read it αἰῶνας, the flames of oil. Rufinus translates it thus, aque natura in olei pinguedinem versa, and in Altera's Book 'tis so corrected in the Margins of the Pat. MS. also reads αἰῶνας. Valef.

But Langus calls it morbus fontis, the falling-sickness. Chrysostomus, morbus fevus & scilicet, an imposture, or cruel and filthy disease; which comes nearest to Rufinus's Version: For by this morbus Regius he means the Leprosy, as appears by what follows. For in the 10. Book and 25. Chapter he speaks thus of Eugenius; vir corpore & animo Leprosus, & under this, extending words Regio corrupta. Gregorius Nyssenus also in his first Book against Pamphilus certainly affirms he was a Leper, pag. 307. Οὐδὲν αὖτε ἐν οὐκ ὀνόματι λέγειται, ἀλλ' ἐν τῷ πᾶσι τῷ κατὰ τὸν νόμον διαγνωσθέντι, καὶ πρὸς τὴν ἐκείνου ἐκ τῶν ἰατρικῶν ἀποδείξεων λαμβανόμενον. He who goes into another Man's house not in natural abhorrence they who are found here towards those who are infected. Hieronymus in the Life of Isidore speaks thus of his scholar Albanus, Post aliquantum temporis computuit morbo Regio. Valef.

Antoninus; and the third, that he might be deprived of his Sight: But none of the Faithful gave heed to 'em, altho' they swore thus, because Narcissus's Continency was always resplendent amongst all Men, and his Course of Life most eminently virtuous and pious: But he being in no-wise able to endure the Wickedness of what had been said against him; and, besides this, for a long time being desirous to embrace a Philosophical Life, retir'd from the whole Congregation of his Church, and liv'd many years, lying hid in Solitudes and in obscure Fields. But the great Eye of Justice could not quietly wink at what was done; but was quickly revenged upon these wicked Men by those Curfes

(c) Kαὶ ἐπεὶ ἐπαυροῦντο. The interpreters seem not to have rightly understood this place. Eusebius's meaning is this, those persons liv'd in Solitudes, but not against themselves, against Narcissus, but against themselves, alluding without doubt to that of the Psalmist, be'th' myself to myself. For credit often falls upon the Author's own head, tho' he intends it for another. Valj.

(d) Συμφοῦν son's Body was totally infected from the bottom of his Heart to his Head with the Disease he punish'd himself with. But the third, seeing the End of the two former, and fearing the unavoidable Vengeance of the All-seeing God, (e) publicly confess'd to all what they had plotted together in common amongst themselves; and he pin'd away with to great complaints, repenting of what he had done, and never ceas'd weeping so long, till he lost both his Eyes. And these suffer'd such Punishments for their lying Accusation.

CHAP. X.

When Narcissus was retired, it being altogether unknown where he was, 'twas the Opinion of the Bishops of the bordering Churches that they should proceed to the Ordination of another Bishop. This Man's name was Dionysius. To him having prestid no long time Germanus was Successor. Gordius succeeds him, in his time from some place or other Narcissus again appear'd, as risen from death to life, and is immediately invited by the Brethren to his Bishoprick; all Men admiring him much more both for his Retreat, and also for his Philosophick [Course of life:]. But above all for the Reveng which was vouchsafed him from God [upon his Accusers.]

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Alexander.

Narcissus being no longer able to officiate by reason of his very great Age, the Providence of God by Revelation made known to him in a Vision by Night, and call'd the fore-mention'd Alexander Bishop of another Church to be Co-adjutor in the Discharge of his Office. By this Revelation therefore, as if he had been warn'd by some Oracle from God, Alexander made a Journey to Jerusalem from Cappadocia (where he had Antoninus, before been honour'd with a Bishoprick,) upon account both of praying there, and also of seeing the places: The Brethren there received him most kindly; and would not permit him to return home, because of another Revelation, made known also to them by night, and at a voice most plainly utter'd to some who were the most eminent for Piety amongst them: For it told them if they went out of their Gates, they should meet him who was predestin'd by God to be their Bishop. When they had done this with the common consent of the Bishops who govern'd the Churches round about, they forc'd him of necessity to continue there. Indeed, Alexander himself, in his own Epistles to the Antiochians which are preserved amongst us till this time, makes mention of Narcissus's Presidency together with him; writing thus word for word, at the end of that Epistle: "Narcissus salutes you who before me govern'd this Episcopal See, and he now is my (c) Associate in Prayer, being an hundred and sixteen years old, and exhorts you to be of the same mind with me." These things were thus done. Now when Serapion was dead, Arsilepiades succeeded in the Bishoprick of the Church of Antiochia. And he also was famous for his Confessions in the time of Persecution. Alexander also makes mention of his Consecration, writing thus to the Antiochians; "Alexander the Servant and Prisoner of Jesus Christ, sendeth greeting in the Lord to the Blessed Church of the Antiochians. The Lord made my Bonds ease and light in the time of my (d) imprisonment, when I heard that by Divine Providence Arsilepiades (a Man most fit by reason of the worthiness of his Faith) was intrusted with the care of the whole Church of the Antiochians." He of Persepolis signifies that he sent this Epistle by Clemens, writing thus in this manner, at the End. "I have sent while he these Lettersto you, (my Lords and Brethren) was in prison, by (e) Clemens a blessed Presbyter, a virtuous person, and approved Person, whom ye have known, and shall know better; who, while he was ed to the here, by the Providence and Care of God confirm'd and increas'd the Church of the Lord."

(a) Μὴν τὸν ὁμοθυμῶντες. Christophorus, and Asclepiades after the reading thus ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἐπαυροῦντο which also Nicophorus follows; but the reading ought not to be alter'd. Rufinus very well corrects this Story of Eusebius's (which he makes something obscure) thus. He says that that Revelation concerning Alexander was sent by God to Narcissus and other holy Men; but the voice was heard by all Men: Here Rufinus, like a good Interpreter, lightly corrects what the Author says amiss, Valj.

(b) Nicophorus and Isidorus write that Narcissus also was aged; which without doubt he did. Here are two things contrary to the Canon of the Church committed in the Election of Alexander, first his Translation from one Bishoprick to another; secondly, that he was joy'd as an assistant to another Bishop while he was yet alive, which was always forbid in the Council of Sardis. Valj.

(c) Συνεπιστάμενος μετ' ἐμοῦ ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ. Rufinus and Christophorus do not translate this place well; but Hieronymus renders it truly according to the sense, though not word for word, he translates it thus: Narcissus salutes you who before me govern'd the Bishoprick, and now governs the same in Prayers with me. Alexander's meaning was undoubtedly this; That, Narcissus only assisted him in Prayers, but in no other part of the Office of Bishop. Which makes him add, that he was an hundred and sixteen years old, signifying thereby that he performed the Office, and Narcissus being very old had only the Title, and Name of Bishop. Valj.

(d) Ἐν τῇ ἐπιφυλάξει. (d) Ἐν τῇ ἐπιφυλάξει. Alexander writes thus in this Epistle to the Antiochians. "The Lord made my Bonds ease and light in the time of my imprisonment, when I heard that by Divine Providence Arsilepiades (a Man most fit by reason of the worthiness of his Faith) was intrusted with the care of the whole Church of the Antiochians." He of Persepolis signifies that he sent this Epistle by Clemens, writing thus in this manner, at the End. "I have sent while he these Lettersto you, (my Lords and Brethren) was in prison, by (e) Clemens a blessed Presbyter, a virtuous person, and approved Person, whom ye have known, and shall know better; who, while he was ed to the here, by the Providence and Care of God confirm'd and increas'd the Church of the Lord."

(e) Hieronymus (in Catalogo) conjectures this to be Clemens Alexandrinus. Clemens Alexandrinus certainly liv'd till the times of Severus, and travelled into these Countreys, as he witnesses in the first Book of his Stromatean, he was also a familiar Friend of Alexander the Bishop, for to him he dedicates his work concerning the Canon of the Church, as Eusebius writes in the 13 Chapter of this Book. Valj.

C H A P. XII.

Concerning Serapion, and his Books that are extant.

IT IS likely that other Monuments of (a) Serapion's Studiousness and Learning are preserved amongst other Men; but those [Writings] only came to our hands which he wrote to one Dominus, a Man who in time of Persecution fell from the Faith in Christ to the Jewish Superstition: And what he wrote to Pontius and Caricus, Ecclesiastical Men; and other Epistles to other Persons. Another Book also was composed by him, concerning that Book intitled The Gospel according to Peter; which Book he wrote to confute the Errors in that, for some Men's sakes in the Church of (b) Rhodse, who, taking an occasion from the forefald Gospel, inclined to Heterodox Doctrines. Out of which Book 'twill not be unfit to set down some few words, in which he sets forth the Opinion he had concerning that Book, writing thus: 'For we, my Brethren, do admit of Peter and the other Apostles, as of Christ himself; but, like wise Men, we reject those Writings which are forged in their (c) names, knowing that we have received no such [Books.] For I, when I came to you, thought all of you had adhered to the right Faith. And when I read not the Gospel which was offer'd me, that bears Peter's name, I said, if this be the only thing which seems to breed this dejected Spirit in you, let it be read. But now understanding, from what has been told me, that their Minds were cover'd with some Herefie, I will make haste to come to you again; wherefore, Brethren, expect me suddenly: But we, Brethren, have found out what Herefie Marcianus was of, for he contradicted himself, not understanding what he said, which you shall understand by some things which have been written to you. For we have been able to (d) borrow this very Gospel of some who have been continually exercised in it, (that is of some of their Successors who preceded Marcianus, whom we call Doctae, for many of [Marcianus's] Tenets are derived from their Doctrines,) and read it; and we find indeed many things agreeable to the true Doctrine of Christ: But some things that are particularly to be excepted against and avoided, which all we have here subjoin'd upon your account."

of which Hereticks Marcianus was one. The Translator takes no notice in this place of that Heretical Sect called the Doctae. They held that Christ was not really Incarnate, nor did truly suffer, but in opinion only. Clements Alexandrinus in his 7th Book Stromat. and also Theodoret in his Book Divinorum Decretorum mentions them. The Ring-leader of this Sect was one Julius Cassianus, as Clement tells us in his Third Book. Valef.

C H A P. XIII.

Clemens's (a) Stromata's, which are in all eight Books, are extant amongst us, which Books very well he thus intitled, The Variegated Contexture of this Title (b) Discourses of Titus Flavius Clemens, concerning all things which appertain to the knowledge of the true Philosophy: Of the same number with these are his Books intitled Institutiones: In which he by name mentions Pantenus, as being his Master, and he writes down his (c) Opinions he had receiv'd concerning the scope of Scripture, and explains his Traditions. He has also an Horatory discourse to the Gentiles: And three Books intitled The Tutor. And another Book of his (with this Title, What Rich Man can be saved?) And a Book concerning Easter. Disputations also concerning Fasting: And concerning Detraction: And an Exhortation to Patience to those who were newly baptized. And a Book intitled The Ecclesiastick Canon, or against those who Judaized, which Book he dedicated to Alexander the forementio'd Bishop. Moreover, in his Stromata he does not only compose miscellaneous Discourses out of the Holy Writings, but he also mentions some things out of the Gentile Writers, if any thing seems profitable which was spoken by them: He also explains various Opinions [which occur] in several Books both of the Greeks and Barbarians. He moreover confutes the false Opinions of the Arch-Hereticks. He lays open much of History, affording us large subject-matter of several sorts of Learning. Amongst all these he intermixes the Philosophers Opinions. Hence he fitly made the Title Stromata, answerable to the Subject of the Book. In the same Book he produces Authorities out of those Scriptures which are not allow'd of [as Canonical;] out of that which is call'd The Wisdom of Solomon, and out of the Book of Iesus the Son of Sirac: And out of the Epistle to the Hebrews. And out of the [Epistles] of Barabas, Clement, and Jude. He also makes mention of Tatianus's Book against the Grecians, and of Cassianus, (d) who also made a Chronography. Moreover, he mentions Philo, (e) Arifbholus, (f) Josephus, Demetrius, and Eupolemus, Jewish Writers, who all have proved by their Writings, that several thus, Opus varic contextum. Plutarch calls some Books of his, which are part Hilory, and part Poetry, σχυρα. Eusebius takes the Books to be so call'd from the divers sorts of matter which they treat of, and so says Baronius in his Annals, and Suidas in his Hilory: ἐκμάται, in Greek signifies Carpets or Hanging; which were woven of divers colours: Hence these Books are metaphorically entituled σχυρα, from the mixture of things they treat of: For he intermixes Grecian, Barbarian, and Latine Opinions, confutes Hereticks, and composes a kind of a various Hilory. Plotius Biblioth.

(b) Τραχυμάται (which is the term here,) are such Writings as contain only the Heads, and some Particulars of some special things; or, as Clement in Ferren says, σύντομα, σύντομα que dant concinnitate, nec in vulgus offeruntur: But now the word has got a larger signification.

(c) Langus renders this word ἑξέταξας, Dilates, Musculus verbally, Exceptionis, Rafusius, Expofitionis, and Christophorus, Commentarii upon the Scripturas, but none of them sufficiently explain the Propriety of the Word: ἑξέταξας are the Sense and Meaning of Scriptura. So Origen uses it in his 4th Book De Principiis, Chap. 2, speaking of the double Sense of Scripture, that is, the literal, and the spiritual Sense; and so also does Methodius, Ephraimus and Diogenes Alexandrinus use the term. Valef.

(d) Their words are ἑξέταξας, made Rafusius believe, that the preceding person Tatianus wrote a Chronography as well as Cassianus: But we must in no-wise think that true. Valef.

(e) Some Copies read, ἑξέταξας, but in all our MSS. and in Nicphorus's de dogmatibus. This Arifbholus here is that famous Arifbholus the Peripatetic who wrote Books of the Explications of the Assigned Law to Ptolomy Philometor, as Eusebius records in his Chronicle, and he produces a Fragment of these Books, in his 8th Book Preparations. Origen also mentions something of these Books in his 4th Book against Cassius, pag. 204. Valef.

Concerning Heraclas.

BUT when he perceiv'd himself not supplied with sufficient Strength both for the more profound study of Divinity, for his Researches into, and Interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, and moreover for the Catechizing of them who came to him; (having scarce time to breath, so many flocking together to him; one Company after another coming from Morning to Evening to his School; ) he divided the Multitudes, and electing Heraclas, one of his Familiars, made him his Assistant in Catechizing; a Man who was very studious in Divinity, most eminently skilful in other Learning; and one who was not unexperienced in Philosophy. He commits the Instruction of the New-beginners to him, but reserves to himself the hearing of those who had made some proficiency.

C H A P. XVI.

What Pains and Study Origen bestow'd about the Holy Scriptures.

ORigen now intended to make such accurate Researches into the Holy Scriptures, that he learn'd the Hebrew Tongue; and bought the (a) Authentick Scriptures written in Hebrew Letters, which were extant amongst the Jews. And he searched after other Editions of Translators of the Sacred Scriptures besides the Seventy. And he sought out some other Versions besides those (b) common ones of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, different from them; which he, having search'd out, first brought to light, from I know not whence, nor out of what Corners, having been forgotten for a long time: Concerning which, because he was uncertain who were the Authors of them, by reason of their Obscurity, he only noted this, that one of them was by him found at (c) Nicopolis near Athium; and another at some other place. Moreover, in his Hexapla of the Psalms, after those four excellent Editions, he adds (d) not only a fifth, and sixth, but also a seventh Version; and upon one of them again he has noted, that it was found at Jericho in an Hogs-head, in the times of Antoninus the Son of Severus. When he had thus collected all these Versions into one body, and divided them into (e) Verses, (f) having placed them directly one against the other, together with (g) the Hebrew Text, he left us those Copies which are called (h) Hexapla. He (i) afterwards prepared apart by themselves, Aquila's, Symmachus's, and Theodotion's Edition, together with the Septuagint, [and put them out] in his Tetrapla.

Sense. Hierom was the first amongst the Latins, who divided his Translation into Verses: See his Preface to Isaiah. This he did in imitation of Origen, who had done the same in his Hexapla. Origen herein had a regard to the profit of the Readers. For what is thus distinguish'd by Verses, is both more easily understood, and also more readily gotten by heart. Besides, this distinction was altogether necessary in order to a comparing of the Greek Editions. Origen's Example was afterwards followed by many; who did the same in the New Testament, which Origen had done in the Old. Vale!

(f) This was another of Origen's inventions, to wit, the placing of the Translations one against the other; that so, if one differed from another, it might be presently discerned by one view. See Hierom, in his Preface to Chromatius, upon the Chronicles. Vale! See a Scheme of Origen's Contrivance herein in Dr. Carr's Life of Origen, pag. 223.

(g) Enusis (the term which occurs here) signifies properly Annotation; See Book 5, Chap. 20, note (d). But Eusebius does here call the Hebrew Text, enusis, because 'twas prefix'd before the six Greek Translations; in like manner as in Comments the words of the Author are prefix'd before the Exposition: This term [enusis] signifies not only the Exposition, but the Text, at which the Exposition is fixt. Vale!

(h) From this place 'tis evident, that this work of Origen's was called Hexapla, because there were six Greek Translations contained in it, besides the Hebrew Text, which was written in two Columns two manner of ways, in the one in Hebrew, in the other in Greek Letters. See Epiphanius, Heret. Originist. cap. 3. And the reason why this Work was thus termed, is plain; for, as the Tetrapla were so called, because they contained four Greek Translations collected into one Body; so the Hexapla were thus termed, because they comprehended six Greek Versions, to wit, that of Aquila, Symmachus, the Seventy-two, Theodotion, and lastly the fifth and sixth Translation. But the Hebrew Text must not be reckoned amongst the Versions; that being the Original. Zonaras (in his History of the Emperor Severus) is of the same Opinion with us, and explains this place of Eusebius (though he mentions not his Name) as we do. Vale!

(i) The Mag. Abud. and Fab. MSS. have it written [ἑκτονισμῶν -] which is all one as if Eusebius should have said [ἑκτονισμῶν ἀπὸ τῆς καὶ ἑκτονισμῶν; i.e. after the Edition of his Hexapla; having prepared, &c.] For when Origen perceived that his Hexapla required too much toil and labour, he compos'd his Tetrapla, (which were more ready and useful) having taken away the two Editions of the Hebrew Text, and the fifth, sixth, and seventh Translation. Hitherto it has been the Opinion of the Learned, that Origen made his Tetrapla before his Hexapla; Usher (in Synag. de Sept. Interpret. cap. 5.) and Salmassius (in his Book De Lingua Hebraica) are of this Opinion. But this passage in Eusebius, in which it is corrected by the Authority of our MSS. Copies) does wholly confute it. Vale!

C H A P. XVII.

Concerning Symmachus the Translator.

MOREOVER, we must understand that this Symmachus, one of the Translators, was an Ebionite. For there is an Heretic called the Heresie of the Ebionites, who say that Christ was borne of Joseph and Mary, and suppose him to have been meer Man, who also stily affirm that the Law ought to be strictly observ'd according as the Jews kept it, as we have before made known somewhere in our History. Symmachus's Commentaries are even yet extant; in which he seems to confirm the foresaid Heresie, disputing to be genuine: But that Gospel of the Ebionites was not the same Gospel of St. Matthew which we now have, but a forged one, and which wanted the Genealogy of Christ, as Epiphanius declares (in Harp. Ebion.) For the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which they made use of, (as Eusebius says Book 3. Chap. 25. where he Note (c).) they called the Authentic Gospel of St. Matthew. Their Words therefore [μετὰ τὸν ἀποστόλου] Matthew's Gospel, which we read thus [disputing strongly against Matthew's Gospel] to wit, and the true Gospel of St. Matthew. From this Symmachus the Ebionites were afterwards termed Symmachians, because he strongly asserted their opinions. Valef.

Antoninus (a) disputing strongly against Matthew's Gospel: Origen tells us that he received these, together with other Interpretations of Symmachus's of the Scriptures, from one Julianus, upon whom, he says, these Books of Symmachus's devolved by right Matthew's of Succession.

C H A P. XVIII.

Concerning Ambrosius.

Antoninus (a) T this time Ambrosius ((a) who favour'd the Valentinian Heresie) being convinc'd by the Truth preach'd by Origen, and having his Mind cleared as it were with light, assents to the Doctrine of the Orthodox Faith of the Church. And (Origen's fame being noised abroad every-where) to several Men of great learning flock'd to him, intending to make trial of this Man's sufficiency in the Scriptures. Also infinite multitudes of Heretics, and not a few Philosophers, and them most famous, gave (b) diligent attention to him, almost like Scholars learning from him, besides Divinity, those things which appertain to * External Philosophy: For he initiated (c) those, whom he perceiv'd to have acute Parts into Philosophical Learning; teaching them Geometry, and Astronomy, and the other previous Sciences: Also guiding them into the knowledge of the various Sects among Philosophers; explaining the Writings of Aristotle, and commenting on them, and searching into all things. So that even amongst the Gentiles this Man was openly declar'd to be a great Philosopher. He also incited many to be of meaner Capacities to the study of the Liberal Sciences; telling them that from hence would accrue to them no small benefit and preparation for the contemplation of the Divine Scriptures: For which reason he esteemed the study of Secular and Philosophical Literature most necessary for himself.

Origen tells in the Prooemium of his fifth Tome of Explications on St. John's Gospel, where he commends Ambrosius for relinquishing those dangerous Principles. But some will have Ambrosius not to have been a Valentinian, but a Marcellian, and Epiphanius is of that opinion. Valef.

(b) Theophrastus were signifies to give attention to any one, [so as to learn something from him, or to come often to any one, to learn as Scholars]. And therefore he adds παραρτὸν μετὰ σχολῆς, almost like Scholars. Valef.

C H A P. XIX.

What things have been recorded concerning Origen [by the Gentiles.]

THE Heathen Philosophers who flourished in his Age are Witnesses of his great proficiency in these Studies: In whose Writings we have found frequent mention of this Man; [some of them] both dedicating their Books to him, and also delivering up their private Labours to his Censure, as to a Master. But I need not speak of these things, when as (a) Porphyrius, (who lived Antoninus in Sicily [almost] till our Age, having written some Books against us, and in them endeavour'd to cavil at the Holy Scriptures, when he had mentioned those Men who made explications upon them) was unable in any wife to cait any bafe Alperſion upon their Opinions, and through want of Arguments betakes himſelf to railing, and reviles the Commentators. Of whom he attempts chiefly to reproach Origen, ſaying, that when he was young, he knew him; but he unawares commends the Man; partly by ſpeaking the truth in ſome things where he could not do otherways; and partly by lying, wherein he thought he ſhould eſcape being detected. Sometimes he accuſes him as being a Chriſtian; by and by, he admires, and deſcribes the acceſſion he made to Philoſophick Literature. Hear therefore what he ſays word for word: 'Some Men, deſirous to find out not, a deſecution from the pravity of the Jewiſh Scriptures, but an explication [of the Obſcurities in them] have betaken themſelves to Expofitions, which have no agreement nor coherence with thoſe Scriptures, and which contain the Author's approbation and praife, rather than a defence of thoſe ſtrange Sectaries. For, having boaſted that what things were plainly ſpoken by Mofes were obſcure Riddles, allowing them the Authority of, and quoting them as, Divine Oracles full of hidden Myſteries; and having (b) bewitched the Judg-<sup>(b) Reſe</sup> ments and Minds of Men, with their Pride, <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> they afterwards put forth their Expofitions. <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> Then after ſome few words he ſays; 'Let an Ex-<sup>(c) Ex</sup> ample of this Abſurdity be taken from a Man, <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> whom I ſaw when I was (c) very young, being a <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> perſon then of great repute, and yet eminent <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> ly renowned upon account of his Writings miſtaken <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> which he left behind him, I mean Origen, by <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> whoſe Renown is very much ſpread abroad <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> amongſt the Teachers of thoſe Doctrines. <sup>καὶ τὴν</sup> For this Man having been an (d) Hearer and Chriſtopher philosophus was a Tyrian by birth, and was lik called Adelius, which in Syriac ſignifies a King; But afterwards, by his Maſter Longinus a Platonick, whom he was an Auditor of at Athenis, he was called Porphyrius, which ſignifies one cloath'd in Purple, a King; becauſe Kings only wore the true purple. St. Hieron ſays he was a Yew, born in the City of Batanae whence he call him Batanator or Batanatus; Some attells that this Man was once a Chriſtian, but could not endure the reproofs of thoſe Chriſtian who reprovd him, and therefore turn'd an Aſophate. Lactantius, who lived in his time, ſays, he wrote his Books againſt the Chriſtians in the ſame year the Emperour pull'd down the Churches; but St. Hieron affirms he left his Maſter Plotinus, and Rome, and went to Sicily for his health's ſake, and dwelt at Lilybaeum; where he wrote thoſe Books: But we ought rather to believe Lactantius, who lived in his time. St. Ambroſius ſays there were two Porphyrius's; one who liv'd in Sicily a famous Man; and another who wrote againſt the Chriſtians: But all agree that 'twas one and the ſame Porphyrius the Platonick who lived in Sicily, and wrote againſt the Chriſtians. Baronius's Annals.

(c) 'Tis probable Origen was then by Porphyrius in his younger days in the City of Tyre, where Origen, having left Alexandria, ſtaid ſome time. For Porphyrius was a Tyrian; and he was a young Man at the ſame time when Origen made his abode at Tyre. But Porphyrius could by no means ſee Origen at Alexandria when he was an old Man; becauſe when Origen left Alexandria he was not compleat fifty years old. Valef.

(d) We muſt believe Porphyrius, whenas he ſo expreſly affirms lets, that Origen Adamantius (ſo he was call'd) was an Auditor of Adamantius Alexandrianus. But amongſt the Auditors of Adamantius there was at that time another Origen, School-fellow to Hieronymus and Plotinus; mentioned by Porphyrius (in viſit Plotini); by Longinus (in his Book de fine); by Eusebius, and Eucherius (in his Book De Providentia) Baronius (in his Annals); and Lucas Holſtenius (in 2 and 6 cap. De vitâ Scriptipſe Porphyrii); ſuppoſed this Origen to have been the ſame Perſon with Origen Adamantius. But I diſſent from them, for theſe two reaſons eſpecially. (1.) Longinus the Philoſopher (in his Book De

De fine reckons Ammonius and Origen, (Platonick Philosophers) amongst those, who would not commit to writing their Opinions for the benefit of Posterity, but thought it sufficient to deliver them by word of Mouth to their Auditors. If any thing be written by any of them, (these are the words of Longinus), as indeed Origen did write one Book De Demonibus, it is very little: For they seemed not to have made it their business to write Books. These Words cannot be supposed to have been spoken of Origen Adamantius, who 'tis manifest, was a Voluminous Writer, as the Catalogue of his Works recorded by Eusebius does manifestly. Moreover, Porphyrius (in these Words of his here quoted by Eusebius) says, Origen was eminently renowned upon account of his Writings which he left behind him. (2.) Porphyrius (in his Life of Plotinus, not far from the beginning) has these Words: But when Herennius, Origen, and Plotinus had agreed amongst themselves, that they would not publish the Opinions of Ammonius, which having heard from him they approved of as most especially pure and refined; Plotinus was as good as his Word: But Herennius first broke the Compact; and afterwards Origen followed him: But Origen wrote nothing besides a Book concerning Demons, and a piece in Galienus's time, wherein he praised that the King was the only Poet. The last Book Origen wrote in praise of Galienus the Emperor, to commend his Poetical faculty. For Galienus was given to Poetry; and there are some nuptial Verses of his extant amongst the fragments of Parasani Arbitrator. Now, if it be true, that this Origen, School-fellow to Plotinus, wrote this Book under Galienus the Emperor, doubtless he must necessarily be distinguished from Origen Adamantius. For Origen Adamantius survived not the times of Galienus, but died when Galus and Valerianus were Emperors, in the year of Christ 252, having completed the sixty ninth year of his age. Valef.

Ammonius of that Ammonius, who in our Age made a great Proficiency in Philosophy; as for his Knowledge in Philosophick Literature he professed much by this Master. But as concerning a right course of life, he undertook a way quite contrary to him: For Ammonius, having been educated a Christian by Christian Parents, when he arrived to Understanding, and [the knowledge of] Philosophy, quickly betook himself to a course of life which was agreeable to the Laws. But Origen being a Gentile and brought up in the Learning of the Grecians, diverted to the (e) Impudence of the Barbarians. Being devoted to this [Religion] he (f) corrupted both himself, and also that proficiency he had made in Philosophick Learning: As to his manner of life he lived like a Christian, and contrary to the Laws: but in respect of his Opinions concerning things, and concerning God, he imitated the Grecians, (g) substituting the Sayings of the Heathens in the room of those strange Fables. For he was continually conversant in Plato's [Works,] and in those of b) Numenius and Cronius, and revolved the Works of (i) Apollonius and (k) Lamproclaudius. This barbarous Impudence, to despise the Roman Gods, and the Emperor's Edicts, to be fore'd by no Torments or Persecutions to sacrifice to those Heathen Gods. Valef.

(f) Κατασκευάζει, Catharticos, to sell if we, or to keep a Vitualling-house. Now because these Catharticos us'd to cheat the buyers, by mixing and dashing their Wines, and to enrich themselves; this Word is us'd to adulterate or corrupt; as here, and likewise in holy Writ, in the second Epistle to the Corinthians, Chap. 2. 17. we find, a κατασκευάζειτε τὸ λόγον, not carrying the Word of God. Valef.

(g) ὁμοκατασκευάζει; Porphyrius takes this Metaphor from Hucksters, who, by counterfeiting, take Wares for true, circumvent the buyers: For ὁμοκατασκευάζει signifies to follow, to lay one thing for another: Hence κατασκευάζει, a changing, a false Child left in the place of one taken away. Thus Porphyrius says Origen plays the Huckster. Valef.

(h) Origen quotes this Numenius in his Books against Heretics: He was a famous Pythagorean, born at Apamea in Syria. Longinus, in his Book De Fine, mentions these Philosophers, Numenius, Cronius and Moderatus; who, he says, connected Pythagoras's and Plato's Opinions together. Cronius's Book περὶ μετεωρολογίας is quoted by Nemesius in his Book De Naturâ Hominis, Cap. 2. Valef.

(i) Apollonius is called by Stobæus, in his ἐκλογαί, the Son of Ægimius. Valef.

(k) This was Cassius Longinus who has only one Book extant at this day, entitled De Sublimi Genere dicendi; most Men think he was a Grammarian; but he profess'd Philosophy, as Suidas and others testify: He was Porphyrius's Master in Platonic Philosophy at Athens. He liv'd in Origen's time, and was younger than him, and died a long time after him, 'tis a wonder therefore that Porphyrius should reckon him amongst the ancient Philosophers. Valef.

ginus; and (l) Moderatus, and Nicomachus, and Antoninus the Works of all the famous Men amongst the (1) This Pythagoreans; he also made use of the Works of (m) Charmæon the Stoick, and of (n) Cornutus who was born at Gades, now call'd Cadix, an Island on the South-side of Spain (without the Straits of Gibraltar): He wrote eleven Books, ἀγρίων τετρακταρίων, Concerning Nicomachus; See Plotinus and Suidas. Valef.

(m) Charmæon was a Stoick Philosopher: Origen, in his Books against Celsus quotes Charmæon's Book De Cometa: He taught Philosophy at Alexandria, and Diogenes Alexandrinus succeeded him in his School. See Suidas in Diogenes, Valef. Of this Charmæon, see Aristarchus's Epig. Book 11. E. p. 57.

(n) This Cornutus after Leptinus taught Philosophy at Rome in the Reign of Claudius Nero: He wrote many things concerning Philosophy, and Eloquence: Perkins dedicates his fifth Satyr to him, as to his Master: He wrote a Book De Grammaticâ Theologia, which is cited by the Rhetorickist in the word εὐαί. But the name is corrupted by Altidus Manutius, and called Phorastus. Valef.

And the Precepts of the Divine Philosophy remained uncorrupted, and unshaken in Ammonius even till his death; as his Works even to this present do testify; he being famous amongst most Men for his Book which he left behind him: As for example, that Book which is thus entitled, concerning the Concord of Moses and Jesus, and those other Books of his, whatsoever sort they be of, which are found amongst lovers of Learning. Let what we have said therefore be an evidence both of the Detraction of this lying Accuser, and also of Origen's great knowledge in the Grecian Learning. Concerning which, Origen (in an Epistle of his, wherein he makes an Apology for himself, to some who blamed him for his too great studiousness about this sort of Learning) writes these words: When I employed my self wholly in the Scripture, the sale of my progress in Learning spreading it fell every-where, there resorting to me sometimes Hereticks, at other times those who studied the Grecian Learning, and especially such as were skill'd in Philosophy, I thought it convenient to make researches into Heretick's Opinions, and into whatsoever things are reported to be said by Philosophers concerning the Truth: This we did, both in imitation of Panænius, who profited many before us, (who was furnish'd with no small stock of Provisions of this sort:) And also of Heracles, who at this time sits among the Presbyters of Alexandria;

(o) whom I found with a Philosophy-Master, (p) under whom he studied diligently five years be- may from fore I began to be an Auditor of his Doctrine, these And for this reason, he wearing a com- mon Habit before, put it off, and put on Heracles a (p) Philosophical Habit, which he (q) retains and Origen had the same Philosophy-Master, which Porphyrius affirms was Ammonius the most famous Philosopher of that Age. Valef.

(p) The Philosophick Habit was the Tallim, or Cloak; which was the usual Badge of the Greek Philosophers, different from that which was worn by the ordinary Greeks; which those Christians still kept to, who before their Conversion had been profess'd Philosophers: This our Eusebius affirms of Justin the Martyr (B. 4. Chap. 11.) ἐν εὐσεβείᾳ οὐκ ἔπαυτο τὸν τὸν δὲ αὐτοῦ λόγον, one that in a Philosophick habit was an assessor of the Divine Word.

(q) Hence we may conjecture that the Clergy had at that time no peculiar habit; seeing that Heracles, a Presbyter of Alexandria, and afterwards Bishop, always retain'd his Philosophick habit. Valef.

Alexander most pious Woman, and religious in her Conversion, (Origen's fame being now every-where to spread abroad, that it came even to her ears,) was mightily desirous to see the Man, and to make trial of his Knowledge in Divine Matters, which was so admired by all Men: She therefore making her abode at Antioch, sends a military Guard for him: When he had spent some time with her, and had demonstrated to her most things which tend to the Glory of God, and the Power of the Divine Doctrine, he hastened to his wonted Charge.

How many of Hippolytus's Works are come to our hands.

AT this time also Hippolytus, amongst many other Works of his, compiled a Book also (a) concerning Easter. In which having explain'd the Series of Times, and set forth a Canon of sixteen Years, concerning Easter, he determines his Computation at the first Year of Alexander the Emperor. Now the rest of his Works, which came to our hands are these: (a) Upon the six Days Work. Upon those things (b) which follow'd upon the six Days Work. Against Marcion. (c) Upon the Canicles. Upon some Chapters of Ezekiel. Concerning Easter. (d) Against all Heresies. And many more which you may find preserv'd amongst many Men.

And Eusebius Baberius translated it into Latin, but neither of them takes notice that this Canon is only a part of the Book which he wrote Concerning Easter. And through his inadvertency Scatiger blames this place of Eusebius, and says, that Hippolytus's Canon does not end at the first year of Alexander's Reign, but begins there; which is really true: But Eusebius does not speak concerning the Canon which Hippolytus annex'd to his Books, but concerning the Book it self, which ends at the first year of Alexander the Emperor's Reign. Valef.

(b) He means the second Chapter of Genesis, as Scatiger Notes. Where also he reproves Hieronymus as if he had been ignorant of it, but undelicately: For when Hieronymus says he wrote upon Genesis, he means as well his Books on the Hexameron, as those on the Post-Hexameron. Valef.

(c) Theodoret in his Book call'd Eranistes quotes this Book of Hippolytus. Valef. (d) Concerning this Book of Hippolytus's, see Photii Biblioth. Chap. 121. This Book was written against 32 Heresies; the first of which was the Deisthean, the last the Noctian Heretic. Which Heresies Irenaeus having confuted in his Sermons, Hippolytus his Scholar wrote an Epitome thereof. Stephanus Gobarus has often quoted this piece of Hippolytus, as appears from his 7, 10, and 13. Chap. B. 2. Valef.

Concerning Origen's Studiousness, and how he was honour'd with the Dignity of Priesthood.

ABOUT this time was the beginning of Origen's writing Commentaries upon the Holy Scriptures; Ambrosius chiefly inciting him to it by innumerable Intigations, not with Suppliments and bare Words only, but also with most plentiful Supplies of all things necessary: For there were always by him when he dictated, more in number than seven Notaries, which at set times chang'd Courses with one another. Neither was there a less number of them which

(a) Here the Mar. MS. and that most excellent Copy of Rufinus which we have often quoted, begin this Chap. 23. But Ruf. at set times chang'd Courses with one another. Neither was there a less number of them which

Chap. 23. calls it the 20. Hieronymus takes these words [ἐν ἑκῇ] in a bad sense, as if Origen had set himself to write in Emulation of Hippolytus; and refers ἐν ἑκῇ to Hippolytus: Which is not so, for we must understand ἑξῆς, which thing is common, and so the sense is plain, to wit, from this time. Valef.

wrote Books fair, together with Girls who had been instructed to write neatly and handsomely. To all these Ambrosius liberally afforded a sufficient supply of all things necessary. And indeed he convey'd into Origen an unspeakable alacrity, in his study and labour about the Divine Oracles. By which means chiefly he induc'd him to write Commentaries: Whilst these things were in this posture, Pontianus succeeds Urbanus, who had been Bishop of Rome eight years: And Zebinus [succeeds] Philetus in the Bishoprick of Antioch. At which time, (the Necessity of the (b) Church's Affairs constraining him) Origen (b) Rufinus made a journey through Palestine into Greece; and may here received the Order of Priesthood at Caesarea, by well serve the Imposition of the Hands of the Bishops instead of there. But what Combinations were hereupon a Com- rais'd concerning him, and what (c) Decrees were sent upon this place made by the Prelates of the Churches upon these who has Commotions: And whatever else he did, continu- reading it ing to be of great esteem, contributing to the Preaching of the Divine Word. [These things] was in- requiring a distinct Volume, we have in some the Chur- measure declared in the second Book of our Apology, that of which we wrote in defence of him.

ther to convince Heretics, who grew strong in these Parts. So also says Eusebius in his Catalogue. Valef.

(c) Eusebius ought here to have recited the Decrees of the Bishops against Origen, as being matter most accommodate to an Ecclesiastick History; and might better have omitted other things concerning him, and have inserted these, as most pertinent: But we ought not to blame Eusebius for this omission here, because it had been superfluous, having before declared them in his second Book De Defense Origenis: Which Books some Men, through their immatured hatred to Origen, envied us the use of. There is nothing of Eusebius, and Pamphilus the Martyr's Apologia Origenis extant, except some Fragments which Photius preserv'd as it were from Shipwreck. He in his Biblioth. chap. 116. says that there were two Synods summoned against Origen; the first decreed that Origen should be banish'd out of the Church of Alexandria, but did not divest him of his Priesthood: The second, which was assembled by Demetrius, consisting of Egyptian Bishops, degraded Origen from the Office of a Priest, to which Decree almost all the Bishops of the World subscribed, as Hieronymus says, whose words Rufinus relates in two Apolog. Hieronymus also adds that he was not only deposted, but also excommunicated by the Bishop of Rome. But this Decree of Demetrius is a very unusual for two reasons; first, because he shew'd it out against him in his absence, without any legal Citation; and secondly, because this Sentence was not confirm'd by the Authority of many Bishops, particularly not by the Bishop of Rome. Wherefore Origen still retain'd his Priest's Office, and continued Preaching in the Church, as Eusebius witnesses in this Book, and Pamphilus in his first Book Apologia Origenis. Valef.

C H A P. XXIV.

Concerning the Expositions he made at Alexandria.

BUT 'twas necessary for us to have annex'd these (a) to the things aforementioned; for (a) He in his sixth Book of his Expositions upon John's means, he [Gospel] he declares he compos'd those five first Books while he yet lived at Alexandria. But only (b) twenty two Books of his Works upon that Gospel are come to our hands. In his ninth Book also upon Genesis (for there are twelve in all) he manifests that he did not only write those first eight Books at Alexandria, but also those Comments upon the twenty five first Psalms: And moreover those Comments upon the Lamentations, five Books of which came to our hands. In which Books there is some mention of his Books

Alexander upon the (c) Resurrection: Those also are two Volumes. Indeed he also wrote his Books De Principibus, before his removal from Alexandria. He also composed those Books entitled (d) Stromata, by which are denoted in number, in that City in the time of the Reign of Alexander, as his (e) Annotations written with his own Hand, and prefix'd before those of Origen's Works: Books do manifest.

Thirteen
 Upon Genesis, two Books of Mythical Fables: Excerptions upon Exodus: Excerptions upon Leviticus: Also Adversus; and two other Dialogues: Two Books upon the Resurrection; and four other Dialogues concerning the Resurrection. Methodius the Bishop wrote an excellent Book of the Resurrection, against Origen's Books upon the same subject, as Hieronymus in his Book De Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, and Maximus in his Scholium upon Dionysius's Ecclesiastical Hierarchy do testify: There are excellent fragments of this Methodius's book of the Resurrection, in Epiphanius against the Originalists, and in Isidorus's Etymologia. And I think 'tis for no other reason, that Eusebius never mentions this Methodius, (whereas he mentions several Ecclesiastical Writers far inferior to him), but this, that he wrote against Origen: Eusebius, being a very great Follower of Origen, could not endure this Man's name in his History, because he was not his friend. Valf.

(3) Hieronymus in his Epistle to Magnus the Roman Orator, says Origen wrote these ten books in imitation of Clement; for the Argument of these books and Clement's above-mentioned are alike. Hieronymus also cites a piece of these Books in his Epistle against Rufinus, not far from the beginning. Valf.

(c) Translators did not understand what these ἑξήκοντα ὑπομνήματα were: ἑξήκοντα in this place is the same as ὑπομνήματα, written with his own hand. The Lawyers call a Will testamentum, which is written with the Testator's own hand, and not only confirmed by his Subscribers. So Eusebius here calls these ὑπομνήματα ἑξήκοντα ὑπομνήματα written with Origen's own hand, and either prefix'd or annex'd to every Tome. For 'twas usual for Authors to note something with their own Hands either at the beginning, or end of their Books. Valf.

C H A P. XXV.

After what manner Origen has mentioned the Books of the Old and New Testament.

BUT in his Explication of the First Psalm, he has exhibited a Catalogue of the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament, writing on this manner word for word. (a) We must understand that, as the Hebrew Traditions say, there are (b) twenty two Books of the Old Testament; just so many in number as they have Letters. A little after he adds, saying; 'These are the twenty two Books according to the Hebrews. That which we give the Title of Genesis to, is by the Hebrews, from the beginning of the Book entitled Genesis, that is, in the beginning. Exodus, Leviticus, that is, these are names. Leviticus, Leviticus, that is, and he hath called. Numbers' the Hebrews call. (c) Hannumpleodim. Deuteronomy, Hele-haddarim, that is, these are the words of Jesus the Son of Nave, [in Hebrew] Sebovay, Ben Nave. Judges, Ruth, are by them comprehended in one Book, and call'd Sophetim. The First and Second of Kings, among them one Book, termed Sammel, that is,

(a) This whole quotation is to be seen in Origen's Philocalia, lib. 3; but that place of the Philocalia must be corrected by this, for there εικοσι in stead of εικοσι is read. And this is the common mistake of all Editions that they writ εικοσι, when the Word follow'd begins with a Vowel. But in all good Copies εικοσι is written, although a Vowel follows. Valf.

(b) Hieronymus upon the Apocalypse says, there are twenty four Books of the Old Testament; to twenty two you may find in Thomius's Excerptions. Some reckoned twenty two, some twenty four Books of the Old Testament; I suppose this different account, faith Hieronymus, because some reckoned the book of Ruth, and that of the Lamentations of Jeremiah in the Catalogue of Scriptures apart by themselves. Others, as Hieronymus says, added Tobias, and Judith to make 24. books of the Old Testament; Epiphanius says, that some reckoned up twenty seven books of the Old Testament. Valf.

(c) I know not what Copy Rabert Stephens follows, who here reads it ὑπομνήματα ἑξήκοντα. For in the King's, the Mar. Alc. and Fut. MSS. ὑπομνήματα, is the reading. Valf.

called of God. The Third and Fourth of Kings, amongst the Hebrews one Book, called Vamme- lech David, that is, the Kingdom of David. The Alexander's First and Second Book of Chronicles, in one Volume, call'd Dibre Hajamin, that is, The words of Days. Esfars the First and Second Book, by them made one Book, called Efra, that is, A helper. The Book of Psalms, Sepher Tehillim [in Hebrew.] Solomon's Proverbs, in Hebrew, Adi-lath. Ecclesiastes, Cobeleth.

(d) The Song of Songs, Sir-basrim. (e) Esfars, Isidus: Hierimas with his Lamentations, and his Epistle, all in one Book, called Ter-mia. Daniel, [the Hebrews also call] Daniel.

Ezechiel, Tezebel, Job, Job, Effer, Effer also among the Hebrews. Besides these there are (but not of their number) the Maccabees, which are entitled Sarber Surbane-el. These Origen has set forth in the foregoing Work. But in the first Book of his Comments upon Matthew's Gospel, observing the Canon of the Church, he attests there are only four Gospels, in these words:

As I (f) have understood by Tradition, there are four Gospels, which, and only which, are to be allowed without contradiction by the Church of God under Heaven. As for the first, 'twas written by one Matthew, formerly a Publican, but afterwards an Apostle of Jesus Christ; he publish'd it, being written in Hebrew for the sake of those Jews who believed. The second is Mark's Gospel, who wrote it as Peter expounded to him; whom also he confesses to be his Son, in his Catholic Epistle, and in these words, (g) The Church which is at (g) 1. Pet.

Babylon elected together with you Salustius you, and 5. 13. so doth Marcus my Son. And the third is the Gospel according to St. Luke, which is commended by Paul; he wrote it for the sake of the Heathens. Lastly, St. John's Gospel. And the same Writer in the (h) fifth Book of his Expositions upon John has these words concerning place of the Apostle's Epistles. Paul being made a friend of Origen, Minister of the New Testament, nor in the Letter here-ter, but in the Spirit, he who (i) fully preaches it, quotes, is the Gospel from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum, in the Pre-wrote not to all those Churches which he taught, face to face, but to those to whom he wrote the sent [Epistles] by his Ex-les that contained] but a few Verses. But Peter preaches

(k) on whom the Church of Christ was build-upon John; the great part of this Preface is extant in the fifth Chapter of his Philocalia. Therefore this place here quoted by Eusebius must be joynted to that fragment. In that Preface Origen relates this dispute, whether Paul's Books are to be written concerning Sacred things? And he proves it from Ezekiel 12. 12. Also he brings for proof the Examples of Holy Men, Prophets and Apostles, who wrote very little. But these Examples the Collector of the Philocalia on set purpose omitted, as he himself confesses. Valf.

pture Jays of Antichrift. Moreover, this Persecution began when Maximin was Emperor, (after a long continued Peace in the Church,) because of frequent and most dreadful Earthquakes, which the Heathens, as they usually did, imputed to the Christians. Firmilianus in his Epistle to Cyprian attests this: See Baronius at the Year of Christ 237. Valef.

C H A P. XXIX.

Concerning Fabian, how unexpectedly he was elected by God Bishop of Rome.

Gordianus

Gordianus having succeeded Maximinus in the Roman Empire, Anteros succeeds Pontianus, who had been Bishop for the Church of Rome six Years. And Fabian succeeds him after he had perform'd the Office for a Month. They report that after the death of Anteros, Fabian, together with some other of his Acquaintance, came out of the Country to Rome to sojourn there: Where he unexpectedly came to be elected Bishop, through the Divine and Celestial Grace. For when all the Brethren were assembled together in the Church, in order to the Election of one who should succeed in the Bishoprick, and many of them had Intentions of [Electing] several eminent and worthy Men, Fabian being there present, no one so much as thought of him: But on a sudden, as they report, a Dove came flying from above, and sat upon his Head, which seem'd to be a representation of the Descent of the Holy Ghost upon our Saviour in the shape of a Dove: Upon which all the People, being at the same time moved as it were by the Divine Spirit, cry'd out with all imaginable alacrity and one common consent, (a) He is worthy: And without any delay they took him, and set him in the Bishop's Chair. At that time also Zebinus the Bishop of Antioch dying, Babylon succeeded in the Presidency. Heracles also takes upon him the [Episcopall] charge of the Church at Alexandria, after Demetrius (b) had executed that Office for forty three years. And Dionysius succeeds in the Catechetick School there, who also was one of Origen's Scholars.

(a) This was the common Acclamation at the Election of Bishops, of which we have many Examples in Theodorici's Scholars. (b) The Tenth Chapter of the Ninth Book. And in the Relation of what things were done at Basilin's Election, (recorded in Augustine's Epistles) these Acclamations are read, which were then used: They cry'd out twenty times, Dignus est iustus est, He is worthy and just: and five times Bene meritis, bene dignus est, He is very deserving, he is very worthy. Valef.

(c) The Arab. Maz, and Fab. MSS. add these words, had executed that Office for forty three years: But the King's MS. and Rufinus own them not. Valef.

C H A P. XXX.

Who were Origen's Scholars.

While Origen executed his accusom'd Duty at Caesarea, many, not only Natives of that Country, but also infinite others from places most remote, forsaking their own Countries, resorted to him to be his Disciples. The most eminent of them, we understand, were Theodorus, (who was also called Gregorius, one of the most famous Bishops in our Age,) and his Brother Athenodorus. He by perswasion induced them (being too much addicted to the love of the (a) Roman and Greek Learning, having infused

(a) Eusebius means the Roman Learning, the Civil Law, which Gregory learn'd at the City Ancyra, at that time when Origen periwaded him to nobler Studies, as he, in his Oration to Origen, testifies: The same thing also Origen attests in his Epistle to Gregory, Chap. 13, of his Philocal. Valef.

Concerning Africanus.

At this time Africanus, (a) the Author of the Books entitled Cesti, was very famous; there is extant an Epistle of his written to Origen, in which he suspects the History of Susanna in Daniel, to be spurious and fictitious. Origen very fully answers this Epistle. There also came to our hands five Books of this same Africanus's Antichristians, written with great care and accuracy. In which Books he says he took a Journey to Alexandria, because of the great fame of Heracles, in who, as we before signified, was intrusted with the care of the Church there for his eminent knowledge in Philosophy, and other Heathen Learning. There is also extant another Epistle of this same Africanus to Aristides, concerning the disagreement which is thought to be betwixt Matthew and Luke, in the relation of Christ's Genealogy. In which he manifestly demonstrates the consent of the Evangelists, out of an History which came to his hands; in which [Epistle] we also took, and placed it in the first Book of this Work in hand, being its proper place.

nothing else, but certain Medicines made up of Herbs, Metals, Magick Figures, Charms, and the like: For, as Suidas witnesses, these Cesti contain nothing else, and have their Title from Venus's Cesti, or Girdle, because they treat of Love-affairs. Besides, this Africanus, the Author of these Cesti, seems to be a distinct Person from Africanus the Chronologer, whom Eusebius mentions, for, as Suidas says, this Author of the Cesti was a Libyan by birth, and was called Σαργίς. But Scaliger in his Animadvrsions upon Eusebius calls him Σεπτις Africanus. But perhaps that Σαργίς in Suidas ought to be made Κίρις: And so he may be called Africanus Cestis from the title of his Books, even as Clement was called Symonides. But this Africanus the Chronologer was born in Palestine, says Eusebius's Chronicle; and in a Town call'd Ennemos, and his name was Julius Africanus: This Africanus was a Christian, but the other was a Heathen, as appears by his Books. There was also another Julius Africanus, who wrote a Book De Apparatu Bellico; which Book in the Manuscript Copy of the King's Library has the title of Κίρις, and under that title it is quoted by Politianus in his Miscellanies. The Grecians indeed were proud in prefixing Titles before their Books, they seem therefore to call these Books Cesti, which were filled with knowledge of divers kinds, like the Cesti, which amongst the Grecians signifies a Girdle wrought of divers colours: For that same reason were Clement's Books called Συναξατα. What Expositions Origen wrote at Caesarea in Palestine.

About this time Origen wrote his [Comments] upon Esaia, and those upon Ezekiel at the same time, of which Books there came to our hands thirty five Volumes upon the third part of Esaia, unto the Vision of the four-footed Beasts in the Wilderness: And twenty five Volumes upon Ezekiel, which were all he wrote upon the whole Prophet: Making his abode at that time at Athens, he finish'd his Commentaries upon Ezekiel. He also began his Comments upon the Canticale, and there proceeded in them to the fifth Book: But but he afterwards returned to Cæsarea, and there finish'd them, being ten Books in number. But what necessity is there at present to write an exact Catalogue of this Man's Works, which requires a Work itself; which we have also written in our (a) History of Pamphilus's Life, the blessed (b) Martyr of our Times. In which, endeavouring to prove how great Pamphilus's care and love towards sacred Learning was, we have publish'd the Catalogues of Origen's Works, and of several other Ecclesiastical Writers which he collected. From whence, he that is desirous, may have a full information concerning all the Monuments of Origen's Labours which came to our hands. But now we must proceed to the subsequent Series of our History.

Apology against Rufinus; where he also quotes a piece of that Work out of the third Book; he also mentions those Books in his Epistle to Marcella; 'twas in Eusebius's third Book De Vita Pamphili, wherein he wrote a Catalogue of Origen's Works. Vale.

note I. The MSS. and Sin. MSS. read ἱεροσολύμοις, all in one word, not ἱερὸν ὑμῶν. The Greeks call those ἱεροσολυμοί who were both Martyrs, and Priests: Therefore Pamphilus being a Presbyter, and a Martyr, may well be styled ἱεροσολύμ. The Greeks in their Hagiologies have three sorts of Martyrs, some they call μεγαλομάρτυρες, i.e. great Martyrs; others they call ἐπίμαρτυροι, i.e. help Martyrs; and others they call καθολοί, that is, the Bishops, or common Martyrs who suffer'd Mars- martyrdom. All the rest they call ὑπομάρτυρες, barely Martyrs: There is also another title yet, namely, σεπτομάρτυροι; but this is only proper to Stephen, and Thecla, he being the first of Men, and she the first of Women which were crown'd with Martyrdom. Here we may find what decency the Greeks show in the comparison of the Lazarus: they give him the same name with which, as with titles they are honour'd distinguished from other Men. Valete.

Concerning the Error of Beryllus.

Beryllus, who was mention'd a little before, Bishop of Befria in Arabia, subverting the Ecclesiastick Canon, endeavour'd to introduce some new Doctrines alienating from the Faith; daring to affirm that our Lord and Saviour, before his coming amongst Men, (a) had no proper different Subſistence: Neither any Godhead of his own, but only the Deity of the Father reſiding in him. Many Diſputes and Conferences having been held by the Bishops against this Man about that Point, amongst the rest Origen was called: At first he enters into a friendly Discourse with the Man, that he might discover what his Opinion was; which when he understood by his Discourse, he reprehended him being not Orthodox; and having convinced him by Arguments and Demonstrations, he took him as it were (b) by the hand, and set him into the way of the true Doctrine, and reinstated him in his former found Opinion. There are also written Monuments extant to this day both of Beryllus, and also of the Synod which was convened upon his account, which contain Origen's Questions proposed against him, and the Diſputes holden in his

μετάνοια, & ἑστίασις. Beryllus seems to take εἰσα to signify a Person, in this manner; viz. that εἰσα contained the two terms, ἀνθρώπου, & εἰσα. Concerning the true signification of these two terms, see the Ercelesick History, Book 3. Chap. 7. where these terms are largely discussed. Beryllus erred in that he believed Christ had no proper personality before his Incarnation; but he was Orthodox in that he holds Christ to be the Second person to himself, only the Godhead of the Father residing in him, and that he was equal to the Father, as the Fourth Holy Ghost, is all one, the Glory equal, the Majesty eternal, & the essence would be three Gods, not one God: Therefore if this were Beryllus's opinion he may be excused; but he erred in that he asserted the Son by himself is not properly God, but has only a derivative Divinity from the Father, which if he asserted that the Son subverted not personally before his Incarnation, I should have said that he was a Wise & virtuous Vatso.

Church, and all that was done at that time. Infinite other Memoirs the Ancients of our Times have deliver'd to Posterity concerning Origin : Which I intend to omit, as not pertinent to this present Subject; but what things concerning him are necessary to be known, may be read at large in that (c) Apology for him which was written by (c) Hierome, and Pamphilus the Holy Martyr of our times : synonym in Which we, Fellow-Labourers, carefully and joyntly composed upon the account of some of also in his his quarrelsome Accusers. first Apo gainst Rufinus, says, Eusebius wrote six Books in defence of Origen. Rufinus translated the first of these Books, and put it out under the name of Pamphilus the Martyr; for which he is not only severely punished by the Council of Carthage, but he is forth a Book of Rufinus, whom Jerome always calls an Heretic under the name of Pamphilus the Martyr. But Rufinus may make answer for himself from these words of Eusebius, who says that that Apology was written by both of them. Which also Photius confirms with his Testimony; Photius's Biblioth. Chap. 120. From this Book, as well as from Eusebius's own Words, we may gather, that Origen had many Enemies and Opposers, who charged him with his heresies, and his evil and unchristian treatment of Methodius, concerning whom, and the reason why he is not mentioned by Eusebius in his History, see Book 6. Chap. 24. Note (c.) Vale!

When Gordianus had held the Roman Empire six complete years, Philip, together with his Son Philip, succeeded him. The report is, that he, being a Christian, upon the day which is the last of the Vigils of Easter, was desirous to be a Paraker, together with the Congregation, of the Prayers of the Church; but could in no wise be permitted to enter into the Church by him who was then Bishop, before he had made a general confession of his Sins, and recounted himself amongst their number, who were (a) reckon'd the Lapsed, and stood in the place of Penitents: For had he not done this, he would not have been admired by the Bishop, because of his many offences: And is reported that he willingly (b) obey'd, and demonstrated in his Deeds, the sincerity and devoutness of his Affection towards the fear of God. Vale!

(b) This Story concerning Philip the Emperor, whom Babylas would not admit into the Church, being then Bishop, is told by the Author of Chron. Alexand. and also by Cyriostome in his Oration concerning Holy Babylas; but he does not name the Emperor. Valeſ.

What other Books were written by Origen.

At this time therefore, the Faith (as it was happily) daily increasing, and our Doctrine being preach'd amongst all Men, Oron
(as I said) was now above fixty years old, and because he had now gotten a most excellent habit of speaking thro' long use and exercise, he permitted the Novitaries to (a) write his Discourses which he deliver'd in publick, but never before this time would he suffer that to be done. About this time

Philip, he wrote eight Books against a Book of (b) Celsus the Epicurean, intitled The Word of Truth. He also wrote twenty-five Volumes upon Matthew's Gospel: And those upon the Twelve Prophets, of which Books we have found only twenty-five. There is also extant an Epistle of his to Philip the Emperor, another to his Wife Severa: And several others to divers other persons: Which being scatter'd here and there, in several Mens hands, as many of them as we could find preserved, being above an hundred in number, we have collected and digested into proper Books by themselves, that they may not hereafter be again dispersed. He wrote also to (c) Fabian Bishop of Rome, and to several other Prelates of Churches concerning his own Orthodoxy: You have also the Declarations of these things in the sixth Book of the Apostle's History we wrote in defence of him.

was against this latter Celsus that Origen wrote eight most elegant Books, which are still extant. This is the same Celsus, to whom Lucian dedicates his Book called Alexander, or the False Prophet; being intreated by him to write the Life of that Impostor. In the end of that Book, Lucian speaking to him, plainly demonstrates him to be an Epicurean. In the same place also he seems to mention Celsus's Book, intitled, The True Discourse. Valef.

A Gain, about the same time there sprang up in Arabia Introducers of another Opinion alienating from the Truth. These affirm'd, that Men's Souls even in this present life expired together with their Bodies, and were turn'd to corruption together with them; but that they should again revive together with the Bodies at the time of the Resurrection. No small Synod being call'd together upon this account, Origen is (a) again sent for thither, and having disputed publicly concerning this Question, he managed the cause so well, that those who before were fallen into Error, changed their Sentiments.

(a) Twas said before, chap. 33, that Origen was sent for to Arabia by the Bishops, to dispute against Beryllus: Wherefore this was the second time that Origen was called thither to dispute. Valef.

C H A P. XXXVIII.

Concerning the Heresie of the Helcesaiti.

AT that time also sprang up another perverse Error, called the Heresie of the Helcesaiti, which was stifled in its birth. Origen mentions it in (a) his Homily to the People upon the eighty second Psalm, in these words. 'Lately there came one, highly conceited of himself for his ability, to defend that Atheistical and most Wicked Opinion, called the Opinion of the (b) Helcesaiti, which lately was raised in opposition to (c) Scripture, Schools, and Homilies. His Comments he wrote for the sake of the Learned, and his Schools also: But upon those Books which did not require long and tedious Comments he made Homilies, adapted to the People's Capacity. And this is that which Sedulius aims at in his Preface to his Opus Paschale. See Hieronymus in his Preface to Isaiah, and Matthew, and also in his Preface to his Comments upon The Epistle to the Galatians: Where he mentions this threefold Work of Origen's; only in stead of the word Homilia he uses Tractatus, i. e. Discourses, which is all one: For Tractatus in Latin is the same as Ομιλία in Greek. Concerning this threefold Work of Origen, Rufinus speaks in his Epistle to Ursacius, which he prefixes before his Translation of Origen's Book upon Numbers. Valef.

(b) Theodoret in his second Book Fabularum Hæreticarum, Chap. 7. calls these Men Εκλεκταί, and says they were so called from one Εκλεκται. Epiphanius names him Εκτα, a false Prophet, who joyn'd himself to the Ebionites, and was Author of a strange, and unfix'd

Opinion concerning Christ: Which he relates, and which little differs from Theodoret's story in the place quoted. Hence it appears that this Εκτα, and Εκλεκται are one and the same Man. Epiphanius, in his Heretico Offensum, calls him Εκτα, and says he liv'd in Trajan's time. At first, he says, he put forth a Book full of Divine Wisdom, and a Prophesying Spirit: But afterwards he affirmed 'twas no fit for a Man to sacrifice to Idols in the time of Persecution, if so be he do it not with his whole heart. The same also Origen here relates of these Εκλεκται: But Epiphanius more plainly demonstrates this in his Heretico Sampsonum, where he says, that that these Εκλεκται (which we prov'd were the same as Εκλεκται) had one Εκτα, or Εκτα, Author of their Sect. Wherefore Scaliger in his Elenchus, Chap. 27. errs; where he says, that this Εκτα is the same person with Εκτα; and that these Εκλεκται or Εκλεκται are the same as Εκτα: Than which nothing is more absurd. Valef.

the Church. I will explain to you what evil things that Opinion asserts, that ye be not drawn away by it. It rejects some things of every part of the Scripture, but makes use of some Texts both out of the Old, and also out of the Evangelical Scripture. It rejects the Apostle [Paul] wholly. It says, 'tis an indifferent thing to deny [the Faith]. It holds also, that upon necessity [c] a Wife Man would deny [Christianity] with his Mouth, but not with his Heart. It also at the same time. They also carry about with them a Book which, they say, fell down from Heaven; and every one that hears it, and Christus believes it, shall obtain remission of Sins: a Remission different from that which Jesus Christ bestow'd." But let thus much suffice concerning these things.

Concerning what happen'd in the times of Decius.

BUT in the mean while Decius succeeds Philip, after he had reigned seven years: Who because of his hatred towards Philip, rais'd a Persecution against the Churches. In which Fabian being Martyr'd at Rome, Cornelius succeeds in that Bishoprick. And Alexander the Bishop of Jerusalem in Palestine, is again brought before the Governor's Tribunal for Christ's sake: And was very famous for his second Confession at Cæsarea, where he was imprison'd: Being now adorn'd with a venerable old Age, and reverend grey-Hairs. After this noble and famous Testimony before the Governor's Tribunal, he expired in Prison, and Mazabanes was pronounc'd his Successor in the Bishoprick of Jerusalem. Also Babylas Bishop of Antiochia died (in like manner as did Alexander) in prison after his Confession, and Fabius is preferr'd to be Bishop of that Church. Moreover, how many, and how great [Afflictions] happened to Origen in this Persecution, and what was the end of these things, (the Devil with all his forces enviously setting himself in opposition to this Man, and fighting against him with all subtlety and power, assailing him particularly above all those who were for upon at that time;) how many, and how great things he also suffer'd for the Doctrine of Christ, as Bonds, and bodily Torments, the Punishment of the Iron-Chain in the inmost Recefles of the Prison: how he was put upon the (a) Rack, his Feet for (a) ἑλκας (as we before noted) the same as Nervus, a pair of Sticks, wherein the Feet are put: But in this place 'tis used for Eulenas, a Rack: For, Eulenas in this place means, that Origen, being put upon the Rack, patiently sustained the threats of Fire and other Torments, Εὐλας therefore in this place signifies the same as the Latin word Eulenas, where the word added, (ὡς) καλῶς, sufficiently sheweth; for as often as this term signifies Sticks, or Shackles, we read Εὐλας only; but when it signifies the Rack, καλῶς, or βασιλικός, is commonly added, as here we find it to be. Eusebius here says nothing of the Ethiopian, who was scorned against Origens; or concerning his denial of the Faith: Baronius with good reason thought these things were fabulous: But Neposius, in his Book De Natura Hominis, Chap. 30. confirms that Narration of Epiphanius. Concerning what things happen'd to Dionysius.

(a) Ἐν ταῖς αὐτῶν βαλάντιοις, Not by my own Council, not by my own accord. But the Fab. MS. and Georgius Synellus's Chronicle read ἐν ταῖς αὐτῶν Μαρ. and Med. MS. ἐν ταῖς αὐτῶν. The Med. MS. begins this Epistle where we have begun it. Valef.

(b) Ἄρτι is here taken for the Degree of the Persecution: And accordingly we have translated the phrase. Valef.

(c) Frumentarii milites were Soldiers, sent to seek after Offenders, and to pick up all Rumours and News, and constantly put down this sort of Officers; they were also Prætor's under Government of Proconsuls, such an one was this Frumentarius, whom Dionysius here mentions. Valef.

Neither could he imagine that I should stay at home when there was Inquisition made for me. And at length after the fourth day, (when God had commanded me to depart thence, and had miraculously open'd a way for me) I, and my (d) Servants, and many of the Brethren, went out together. Now that that was a special act of God's Providence the sequel declared, in which peradventure I was profitable to some." Again, after the interposition of some words, he relates what happen'd to him after his Flight, in these words: I myself, (and my Companions) being much about the time of Sun-setting apprehended by some Soldiers, was brought to Tappositis. But Timotheus, according to the Providence of God, was not with us, neither was he taken: But when he at last came, he found the House empty, and Soldiers keeping guard about it, and us reduc'd to Slavery." After some other words he saith thus. "What now was the order and manner of this miraculous act of Providence? (I will tell nothing but truth.) A certain

(e) Χριστιανὸν Country-man met Timothy as he was flying, ἄνθρωπος ὁμογενὲς ἰσχυρὸς, ἐκ τῆς αὐτῆς χώρας; the Translation of *Georg. So in the Greek Councils we find αἱ τῆς χώρας ἀρχιερεῖς, in head of αἱ τῆς χώρας ἀρχιερεῖς, the Country-Presbyters. The Mar. Med. and *Fab. ing, and thus disturb'd in Mind; and he enquired of him the reason of this great haste; he told him the real truth. When the Man had heard his Relation, (he was then a-going to a Marriage-feast, and 'tis customary amongst them to tarry all night at such meetings) he went his way, and coming into the House, told the story to those that were set at the Table: All of them with an unanimous earnestness (as if it had been by a Compact amongst them) rose up together, set a-running, and with great clamours came speedily upon us. The Soldiers who guarded us being by them forthwith put to flight, they came upon us as we were, and [found] us lying upon

(f) Couches without any Furniture on them; I (God knows) at first supposing them to be Thieves, who came thither for Prey and Pillage, continued lying on the Couch, naked as I was, excepting only a Linen-Garment which I had on; and offered to them my other Cloaths, which lay by me: But they bid me arise, and come out immediately. Then understanding what was the cause of their coming thither, I cry'd out, intreating and beseeching them to depart and let us alone. But if their intent was to do me a kindness, I begg'd of them to behead me, and by that means to prevent those who brought me Prisoner thither. While I thus cry'd out (as my Companions and Fellow-sufferers in all my Troubles do know) they compelled me to rise up: I threw myself on my back upon the ground; but they took me by the Hands and Feet, and dragg'd me out: There follow'd me those who are my Witnesses of these things, Caius, Faustus, Peter, and Paul; (g) who took me together with that Couch upon their Shoulders, and convey'd me out of the Village; and having let me upon an altar, as unfuddled, they carried me away." These things Dionysius relates concerning himself.

me, up to Caius, and the rest of the Presbyters, and not to the Rusticus Country-men, as Christophorus does. ὁ οὗτος signifies, together with the Bed or Couch on which he lay. Dionysius says nothing here of what happen'd to him after the Rufficks forc'd him to leave Tappositis, having beaten the Guard: But in his Epistle to Domitius and Didymus, which is in the 7th Book, and 11th Chapter, he saith, that he and Peter, and Caius were separated from the rest of their Company, and shod'd a Mile desert place of Lycia. Dionysius it is an Exile till the death of Decius the Emperor, and from that desert place he wrote Letters to Domitius and Didymus. Concerning those who suffer'd Martyrdom at Alexandria.

THE same Man in an Epistle of his to (a) Nebrianus Bishop of Antioch, gives this account of the Combats of those Martyrs who suffer'd at Alexandria in the times of Decius. "The Persecution amongst us did not begin at the time when the Imperial Edict was issued out, but preceded it one whole year. For a Soothsayer, and (b) a Poet So also Rufinus names this Bishop of Antioch. Valef. (b) I have translated [ἡμεῖς] a Poet: First, because there is a great familiarity between Poets and Prophets, for the Divines or Soothsayers us'd to deliver their Oracles in Verse. Besides, the Egyptians were chiefly delighted with Poetry, which Euempus takes notice of. Moreover, no People were more malicious towards the Christians than these Soothsayers, moving the People to persecute them, and encouraging them by their Oracles. Valef.

Decius. (whoever he was who so endanger'd this City,) had stir'd up, and encouraged the Tumults of the Heathens against us, exciting them to their Country-Superstition. They being prick'd forward by him, and having obtained free Power of acting all Mischief, thought it the most acceptable Service *and Worship of their Gods to slaughter us. First of all therefore they lay hands upon an old Man named Metrus, and bid him pronounce some Atheistical words, and because he obey'd them not, they beat him with Clubs, and prick'd him in the Face and Eyes with sharp Reeds; and when they had led him into the Suburbs, they stoned him to death. Afterwards they dragg'd a believing Woman called Quinta, to the Temple of their Idol, and compell'd her to fall down and worship: But she turning away her face, and abominating it, they bound her feet, and dragg'd her through the City, which is pav'd with sharp Stones; and having dash'd her against Millstones, and scourg'd her, they led her to the same place without the City, and stoned her. Afterwards all with one accord violently broke into the Houses of pious Men, and every one of them ran to their Neighbours, whom they knew, and plunder'd and robb'd them; their Goods which were of greater value they (e) purloin'd, but the Lumber and what was made of Wood they cast forth and burn'd in the Streets: So that the City seem'd as if it had been taken by an Enemy. But the Brethren withdrew themselves thence and privately fled; and (like those St. Paul speaks of) **took joyfully the spoiling of their goods*. And not one of them that I know of, except one who somewhere fell into their hands, renounced the Lord till this time. Moreover, at that time they took a most admirable Virgin who was ancient, called Apollonia, and buffeting her on the Cheeks, they dash'd out all her Teeth. And when they had built a Pile of Wood before the City, they threaten'd to burn her alive, except she should repeat together with them some (d) prophane words. But she, having begg'd a little respite, being let loose, forthwith leap'd in to the fire, and was consumed to ashes. They also apprehended Scapion as he was in (e) his House; and having tortured him with grievous Torments, and broken all his Joints, they cast him down headlong out of an Upper-room. There was now no way for us, not the common High-way, not so much as any narrow Street through which we could securely pass either by day or night. Every body proclaiming at all times, and in all places, that whosoever would not repeat those blasphemous words, he should be dragg'd away, and burnt immediately. After this manner these things continued for a great while: Afterwards follow'd Sedition, and a Civil War, which [scoiz'd] these Wretches, and returned the cruelty they used towards us upon themselves. And we had a little breathing time, their fury towards us being somewhat appeased. But presently news came of

(13) The ἀσπίδας νεφέλας, are the terms here, and what the words were, 'tis hard to conjecture: In his Epistle to Germanus he calls them [ἀσπίδες νεφέλαι, impious words;] and in this Epistle δυσχερὲς ἱερουργίας λόγια. Valef.

(14) Here we read ἡμέρας, i.e. in his own House, but Nicomachus very ill reads it corps. Concerning this Scapion, Valef, and Ussanius speak at the 14th of November. Where they say he suffered in the Reign of Decius; but they might better have said in the Reign of Philip. For Thanasius in this Epistle to Fabius expressly affirms that Scapion, and some other Martyrs, suffer'd before the Death of Philip the Emperor. The same Error is committed in all Martyrologies concerning Apollonia the Virgin, which say she suffered in the time of Decius upon the 9th day of February. Valef.

the (f) Translation of that Empire, which had Decian. been more favourable to us: And much fear of a threatening Storm appeared. And now arriv'd the [Imperial] Edict, almost like that fore-told by our Lord, (g) representing those most terrible [Times] in somuch that even the Elect, if it were possible, should be discouraged. Indeed, all were put in great fear. Immediately many of them who were more eminent, yielded up themselves [to their Idolatry] through fear: Others, who (h) had to do in the management of the publick Affairs, were forc'd thro' the necessity of their Offices [they held]; and they induced others of their acquaintance, who, being summon'd by name, repaired to their impure and prophane Sacrifices. Some look'd pale and trembled, as if they themselves were about to have been Sacrifices and Victims, not Sacrificers to their Idols. So that they rendered themselves the subject of laughter to the Multitude that stood round about them; because they demonstrated themselves to all, to be fearful both of Death and of Sacrificing: But others of them ran to the Altars more willingly, protesting very confidently that they never were Christians before. Concerning whom the Lord's Prediction is most true, that they shall hardly be saved. As for the rest, some of them adhered to the one or the other of those Parties we have mentioned; some fled away; others were apprehended. And of these [though] some proceeded so far as till [they came to] Bonds and Imprisonment, and others of them had been imprison'd several days; yet before they were brought to the Tribunal, they renounced [the Faith.] Some of them after they had persisted some time in suffering Torments, yet for fear of what might follow renounc'd [their Religion.] But the steadfast and blessed Pillars of the Lord, being strengthened by him, and having received Power and Patience equal and answerable to their strong Faith, became admirable Witnesses of his Kingdom. The first of which was Julianus a Gouty Man, who could neither go nor stand; he, together with two other Men who carried him, was brought before the Judge: One of those Persons straightway deny'd [Christ.] But the other whose name was Cronion, but was surnamed Emus, together with the old Man Julianus, having confessed the Lord, rode upon Camels through the whole City (which you know is very large) and were scourged as they sat on high, and at last in the presence of all the Multitude standing round, they were consum'd by (g) In the King's MS. and Stephanus's Edition, in stead of ἀσπίδας, νεφέλας is read, but in the Mar. Med. Lat. and Savil MSS. ἀσπίδας is the term, which is a great deal better as I think. For Dionysius here means that this Decree of Decius was so terrible, that it seem'd to represent those most dreadful times of Antichrist, foretold by our Saviour. Valef.

(h) Christophor. mistakes in his Translation of this place. I have rendered here [δυσχερὲς, ἡμέρας], as it is had been [ἀσπίδες, νεφέλαι] the Decurion or Magistrates. For these always assembled the selves at the reading of the Emperor's Edicts in the Courts; and first of all executed his Commands; hence they were compelled to be present at the reading of this Decree, and immediately after it was read, to forsake to the Gods, according to the Injunction of the Decree. (i) This

by an (i) exceeding hot fire. A Soldier who attended on them as they were led [to the Stake,] thrust away all those who abused them, and when the People exclaimed against him; this most valiant Champion of God (by name Belus) was called in question, and after he had behaved himself nobly in a great Combat in defence of Piety, he was beheaded: Also another Man, a Libyan born, (both according to his name and also agreeable to the Divine Benediction truly still'd (k) Macar) after much exhortation of the Judge to a Renunciation, being nothing subdu'd thereby, was burn'd alive. After these Epimachus and Alexander, after a tedious imprisonment, which they endured, having suffered infinite sorts of tortures, as

(k) Macar is derived from the Greek term μακαριος, which signifies blessed: Dionysius seems here to allude to those Words of our Saviour, Matt. 5, 10. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness sake, &c. Rufinus translates this place thus, Alis guidam, vir nomine sui Macarius, gente Lybi-

* Ευκαρις is the term in the original: It signifies properly any kind of iron-instrument to make incision: Dionysius does here mean by it, an Excise wherewith they scraped the flesh from off the bones of the Christians.

† neftets tortured, because she had before-hand said she would utter nothing he should enjoy (her,) when she had verified her promise, she was led to execution. Now the rest were these, Mercutia a most virtuous and venerable Matron; and Dionysia the Mother of a numerous issue, but did not love her Children more than

(l) These words [also another Ammonianus.] I have added out of Rufinus. For Dionysius said there were four Women; but we find but three, except, according to Rufinus, we add these words. Valef.

(m) In stead of Ater in Georg. Synclius, and Niceph. we find Ater: In Rufinus 'tis Asinus; in the old Roman Martyrology, which is mostly taken out of Rufinus, he is called Asinus, at the 19th of the Kalends of January. Valef.

† ter, and Isidorus, Egyptians, and with them Dioscorus, a Lad about fifteen years of age, were set before the Judge. Who first of all endeavour'd to deceive the Youth with words, as thinking him flexible and easie to be perwaded; he endeavour'd also to force him by Torments, [supposing] him to be remis and inclinable to yield; but Dioscorus was neither moved with Perswasions, nor yielded he to Torments. When [the Judge] had most barbarously torn the rest with Stripes, and they persisted, he delivered them also to the Fire, but he dismiss'd Dioscorus, because he was lovely in the eyes of the People, and he also himself admired him for his most prudent Answers to his Questions: Saying, he allow'd him space for repentance because of his tender Age. And now the most Excellent Dioscorus continues with us, reserved for a greater and more lasting Combat. Also one Nemesion, another Egyptian, was falsely accused as a Companion of Thieves: But having before the Centurion cleared himself of this Accusation brought against him, as being most absurd, he was impeach'd as being a Christian, and brought bound before the Governour: Who, (most unjust Man!) having inflicted upon him double as many Torments and Stripes, as upon the Thieves, [commanded] him to be burnt amongst Thieves. Blessed Man! who was honoured after Christ's example. Moreover, a whole (n) File of Soldiers, to wit, Ammon, and Zeno, and Prology, and Ingenius, and with them the old Man Theophilus, stood together before the place of Judicature. And when a certain Man was accused for being a Christian, and inclined to a Renunciation [of his Religion,] they standing by gnash'd upon him with their Teeth, made Grimaces at him with their Countenances, stretch'd out their Hands, and shew'd mimic and antick Gestures with their Bodies; [in-so-much that] all Mens Eyes were turned towards them. Before any one came to lay hands on them, they ran to the (o) place where the Accused usually sat, confessing themselves to be Christians: Upon which the Governour and the Assessors were surprized with a great fear. The Accused seem'd most courageous at what they were about to suffer, but the Judges trembled. So they went out of the place of Judicature in a kind of Pomp and State, and rejoiced at the Testimony [they were to give to the Faith.] God (p) making them to triumph gloriously.

† But I rather think that were Legionary Soldiers of that Legion, which kept Garion at Alexandria, and were under the Command of the Emperor's Deputy-Governour of Egypt; for at that time he who was the Emperor's Prefect in Egypt, had not only power in Civil Affairs, but also in Military. In the old Roman Martyrology the Birthday of these Martyrs is set down on the 19th of the Kalends of January. Valef.

(o) By this word ἐκδοτα is meant Subsellium, i. e. the place on which the Criminals while they are examin'd by the Judge sat. It is in some places call'd Ambo, or Pulpitum. Valef.

(p) Οὗτος ἐκδοτα ἔστω. Rufinus translates thus, God thus triumphing by his Saints; hence we may suppose he read ἐκδοτα. Julianus and Christophorus follow this Translation of Rufinus: But we must take notice and see whether Dionysius means not by ἐκδοτα ἄλλα, ἄλλα, ἄλλα, which I think he does, and therefore have so translated it. Valef.

C H A P. XLII.

Concerning some other things which Dionysius relates.

SEveral others were torn in pieces by the Heathens, both in the Cities, and in the Country-Villages: One of them I will hear speak of for example's sake. Ischyron was a mercenary Officer under one of the Magistrates. He, whom he serv'd, enjoy'd him to sacrifice: but when he obey'd him not, he was injurious to him; when he still persisted to be disobedient, he basely reproach'd him. After he had patiently sustain'd all this, he took a great Stake, and having run it through his Guts and Bowels, murder'd him. What need I to reckon up the Multitudes, which wandered in Desarts and Mountains, and dyed by Pestilence, Thirst, and Cold, and by Diseases, Thieves, and Savage-beasts? Such of them as surviv'd are Witnesses of their Choice and Victory. But I will add one Fact for a manifestation of the truth hereof. There was one Charemon a very aged Man, Bishop of the City called Nile, he together with his Wife

Decius.

(a) Hieronymus mentions a

Mountain, called Arabius; which Proton and others call Troicus. Chrysostom therefore does not well in calling it a Mountain in Arabia. It is a little after called Arabicus, from its vicinity to Arabia. Valef.

(b) This place ought to be taken notice of for this one thing: For of all the Writers which came to our Hands, there is none (that I know of) who is ancients than Dionysius Alexandrinus, that mentions the Saraceni. Indeed Ambrosius Marcellinus says in his 14th Book, that he mentioned the Saraceni amongst the Aids of Prince Maximus. So also says Spaurianus, (In Nigro) saying they were conquered by the Roman Soldiers. Valef.

terwards, after some few words he makes an addition to all this, saying: Therefore those Divine Martyrs, (who are now Assessors with Christ, Colleagues of his Kingdom, and are

(c) It was the Opinion of the Ancient Fathers, that Martyrs should be

Christ's

Assessors, and should judge the World together with him.

So says

Eusebius, Bishop of*Caesarea*, in his 4th

Book, against the

Novatians. But Philostratus in his*Philosophy*, removesthis Opinion. (Philostratus says) that those words of St. Paul in the Epistle to the Corinthians 6, 2. Know ye not that the Saints shall judge the World? Must not be understood as if the Saints were to be judges with Christ: But, says he, only meaneth thus, that other Men who had not lived to be judged by the Saints means he condemned. As it is in the Gospel, The Men of Ninive, and the Queen of the South shall rise up in judgment against this wicked Men, and condemn them. Matt. 12, 41. Philostratus took this Exposition out of Cyprianus, but Eusebius's Opinion seems the truer to me. For if the Novatians are now Colleagues of Christ in his Kingdom, Why may not they be partakers of his Judgment? Moreover, Christ expressly promised the Apostles, That they should sit on twelve Thrones, judging the twelve Tribes of Israel. Math. 19, 28. Valef.

(d) This place must be rendered according to our Translation; though

Langens and Chrysostom translate it, as if the Alexandrians admitted the Penitents into the Church: Which they could not do, being in Bonds.

Moreover the Bishop only had power of reconciling Penitents, the Martyrs could only intercede for them, and write commendatory Letters in their behalf; though this word overdura may be rendered passively, as in the 3d Chap. of this 6th Book. Valef.

(e) Communion in the Church is twofold, of Prayer, and of the Sacraments, that of the Prayers was granted to Penitents after a certain time; but the Communion of the Body of Christ was not granted except to them who were reconciled after long time of Repentance. But

Dionysius here means private Communion; by some that I call private Communion, which was granted to any one by some private Persons, and not by the Bishop, whose Power and Duty it was to grant it. The thing these private Persons granted, was this; these Martyrs and Confessors permitted Penitents who desired their pity and intercession, to pray to God with them. Valef.

together, and received them into their Congregation, and (e) communicated with them in Prayer, and in Eating. Now, therefore (Brethren) how do you counsel us concerning these things, what must be done by us? Shall we be of like Mind, and of the same Opinion with the [Martyrs?] Shall we observe their Determination, and the Favour they [shew'd such Persons?] And shall we be indulgent towards them, to whom they were merciful? Or shall we render their Sentence unjust, and make ourselves Examiners and Judges of their Opinion? Grieve their Goodness and Clemency? And destroy the Order [which is constituted?] Dionysius very advicably annexed these words, discouraging concerning them, who in the Times of Persecution had lapsed through infirmity of Mind.

C H A P. XLIII.

Concerning Novatus, what manner of Person he was as to his Morals; and concerning his Heresy.

FOR Novatus, a Presbyter of the Church of Rome, being puffed up with pride against these Men, as if there were no further hopes of Salvation left for them, altho' they perform'd all things appertaining to an unfeigned Conversion, and a sincere Confession, constituted himself the Ring-leader of a peculiar Sect, of those who by reason of their haughty Minds filed themselves

† Cathari. Upon this account a very great Synod was assembled at Rome, consisting of sixty Bishops, but of Presbyters and Deacons [the number] was greater. And when the Pastors of each respective place in the rest of the Provinces, had consulted by themselves concerning what was to be done; (a) This Decree was promulgated to all: That

Novatus, together with all those who imitated his Pride, and who presumptuously assented to his uncharitable and most inhuman Opinion, should be accounted as alienated from the Church: But that the Brethren who were fallen into the Calamity [of the Lapsed], should be healed and cured by the Remedies of "Repentance." There came to our hands the Epistles of Cornelius Bishop of Rome, to Fabius Bishop of Antioch; which set forth the Acts of that Synod at Rome, and the Opinions of all those in Italy and Africa, and the Provinces there. There are also extant other Epistles written in Latin, by Cyprian and those Bishops assembled with him in Africa: By which it appears, that they consented to the relieving of those who were fallen into Temptation, and that the Author of this Heresy ought with good reason to be expelled out of the Catholic Church, together with all those who had been seduced by him. There is also annex'd to these (b) another Epistle of Cornelius's concerning the Decrees of that Synod: And also another concerning the mischievous Acts of these Novatus. Part of which, nothing hinders but Epistle that we may here infer, that so they who read this Work, may have a perfect knowledge in all things concerning Novatus. Cornelius therefore, informing Fabius what a Man this Novatus was as to his course of life, writes these very words: "But that you may the better understand how this admirable Fellow heretofore covered a Bishoprick, and concealing this his hot am-

The first and the third seem as if Cornelius had writ them in Greek, which may be proved by several Arguments, for Eusebius quotes several things out of the third Epistle, but does not in the least signify that it was ever translated out of Latin into Greek, which thing he always does as often as he quotes any Latin Authors. Moreover, in this very Chapter Eusebius signifies that the first Epistle was writ in Greek, for speaking of it, he adds that there was another Epistle of Cyprian annex'd to it, which was written in Latin. Decius. bition continued undiscover'd; for a Convert for his Folly, usually from the beginning having the Confessors in his company, I will make this Declaration to you: (c) Maximus a Presbyter of our Church, and Urbanus, which Men have the second time acquir'd great renown to themselves for their Confessions: Sidonius also; and Celerinus, a Man who has most patiently endured all sorts of Tortures through God's Mercy; and having corroborated the weakness of the Flesh through the strength of his Faith, utterly vanquish'd the Adversary: These Men [I say, &c.] when they had made enquiry into the Man, and (d) detected his Subtlety and Deceit, his Perjury and Lyes, his Unfociableness and Wolfish Friendship, return'd to the Holy Church; and divulged all his subtil Devices, and his Villanies (which he had kept conceal'd within himself for a long time, refusing to declare them) in the presence both of a sufficient number of Bishops, and also of a great many Presbyters and Laicks; lamenting and repenting, because, having been seduced by this subtil and wicked Beast, for some small time they had abandon'd the Church." After some few words, he also adds this ("Dear Brother") That a wonderful change and alteration we saw made in a short time in him? For this most excellent Fellow, (who affirm'd with terrible Profutations and Oaths, that he did not in the least cover the Office of a Bishop) on a sudden appears a Bishop, as if he had been (e) thrown into the midst by an Engine. For this brave Doctor, who [pretended himself] to be a Maintainer of the Church-Discipline, when he endeavour'd by force to acquire to himself, and surreptitiously to steal the Bishoprick which was not assign'd to him by God, chose for his Confidants two Men, who despair'd of Salvation, that he might send them into some little corner, and the most despicable part of Italy, and there delude three Bishops, who were simple and unlearned Men, by a certain fraudulent enterprise, affirming and professing that with all possible speed they must go to Rome, that all the disagreement which had been there, might by their mediation, together with the other Bishops, be compos'd.

(c) Concerning this Maximus the Presbyter, Urbanus, and Sidonius, Confessors, who they deferted to the Church; see Cornelius the Pope's Epistle to Cyprian. There was also at the same time another Maximus, Presbyter of the Church of Rome, whom Novatianus employed as Embassador to Cyprian in Africa, together with Maianus and others: Afterwards the Schismatics made this Maximus a Bishop in Africa, as Cyprian in his Epistle to Cornelius tells us. Valef.

(d) Kallianus signifies to catch a man in the very act of Robbery, with the goods, or things which he hath stolen are yet in his hands; hence it signifies to bring any Plot, Robbery, or any other Wickedness to light, to bewray, or disclose. Ego. Hist. pag. 27.

(e) Theodoret in his 3d Book of his Historia, Chap. 4, writes that Novatus himself went into Italy to fetch these Bishops, and when he, with the Bishops upon their Journey, came into some Town or other, he forced them to Ordain him, which those Bishops complain'd of when they came to Rome; but this Epistle of Cornelius refutes that Story of his. Valef.

(f) Cornelius Wine, to give him the Bishoprick by (g) an imaginary and an ineffectual Imposition of Hands: Bishops, and ineffectual Ordination, because it was solemnized by those of another Diocese, and not by those Bishops who had the Right and Power of Ordaining the Bishops of Rome, which were the Bishops of Offia, Tibur, and others: 'Twas also ineffectual and vain, because it was done by Men who were blind, by force, at the Tenth Hour of the Day, none of the Clergy or People being present; and lastly, because another Bishop was before regularly Ordain'd. Cornelius both here, and in his Epistle to Cyprian, says, Novatianus was Ordain'd by three Bishops, whereas Pocianus says, in his second Epistle to Simplicianus, he was Ordain'd by the Letters Commendatory of the Confessors: but these Differences we may thus reconcile. Novatianus was named to be the Bishop, by the Epistle of the Confessors, but was afterwards Consecrated by three Bishops. Valef.

And he laid claim to that by craft and subtlety, Decius, which did in no-wise appertain to him. One of those Bishops not long after return'd to the Church, bewailing and confessing his sin, whom, through the mediation of all the People then present, (h) we received into the Communion of the Laity. We ordain'd Successors for the two other Bishops, and sent them away to possess their Sees.

(i) This Maintainer therefore of the Gospel, knew not that 'twas meet there should be but one (k) Bishop in a Catholic Church. In which he was not ignorant (for how could he be?) that there should be (l) 46 Presbyters, 7 Deacons, 7 Sub-Deacons, Clerks 42; Exorcists, Readers, together with Janitors, 52 Widows and (m) Indigent Persons, which could not maintain themselves, above a thousand and five hundred. All these the Grace and Bounty of the Lord maintain'd; But neither could so great Multitude, so necessary in the Church, (a Congregation which by God's Providence is both rich and numerous, together with a great and innumerable multitude of People) make this Man ashamed of this so desperate an attempt, or deter him from proceeding in it, or recal him into the Church." And again, after some other words, which intervene, he adjoyns these.

But come on, let us in our following words declare, in what Works of his own, or what good Practices he was so confident, as to aspire to a Bishoprick. Was it upon this account, that from the beginning he had been convert in the Church, and had fought many Combats in defence of it, and had been in many and great perils upon account of Religion? No, this is nothing so. For the Devil who had enter'd into him, and for a long time dwelt in him, was the occasion of his being a deliverer. He being relieved [thereof] by the Exorcists, fell into a grievous Distemper, and it being suppos'd that he would die immediately, he receiv'd Baptism, (n) being besprinkled with Water, on the Bed whereon he lay: (For that word εβαπτισεν very well renders perfusus, besprinkled; for People which were sick, and baptized in their Beds, could not be dip'd in Water by the Priest, but were sprinkled with Water by him: This Baptism was thought imperfect, and not solemn for several reasons. Also they who were thus baptiz'd were called ever afterwards Cincti, and by the 12th Canon of the Council of Nicephora, these Cincti were prohibited Priesthood. Chrysostome decries this sort of Baptism in his 60th Homily, Tome the 2d. (to the Catechumen): Cyprian in his 76th Epistle, holds this Baptism to be lawful and perfect. Valef.

And again, a little after, he saith: "This Man in the time of Persecution, through timoroufness and a desire of life, deny'd that he was a Presbyter. For being desired and intreated by the Deacons that he would come out of his Chamber, in which he had shut himself up, and succour the Brethren as far as it was meet and possible for a Presbyter to succour the distressed Brethren, who wanted assistance: He was so far from complying with the Deacons who intreated him, that with great indignation he went his way, and departed. For he said he would no longer be a Presbyter; but was a favourer of another kind of Philosophy." Having ran over some few Passages, he makes this addition hereto in these words: "For this excellent Fellow has deserted the Church of God, in which, after he had receiv'd Baptism, he was (q) vouchsafed the Degree of Presbyter by the favour of the Bishop, who by Imposition of Hands Ordain'd him Priest: Who being (r) deny'd [Orders] by all the Clergy, and many of the Laity, (because it was not lawful for one who had been baptized in his Bed by reason of some Infirmitie, as he was, to be admitted into (s) any sacred Order,) the Bishop intreated licence might be granted him to Ordain this Person only." To these impious acts he afterwards subjoyneth this other, the worst of all his wicked

47th Canon of the Council of Laodicea, and in Chap. 39. of the Council of Elvire, Val.

(p) Rufinus thinketh that by this Phrase το βαπτισμα εν το κρητι is meant the Chrism, but I rather think he means the imposition of Hands, by which the Bishops gave the Holy Ghost to them who were baptized. Cyrilus, to Subianus, confirms our interpretation. Tis true βαπτισμα signifies in figu, or more, it also signifies, to lay hands on, as Innocentius uses it in his 3d and 6th Chap, to Decentius, and Marcus in his Letter to Porphyrius Bishop of Gaza, and Ambrose (or whosoever it is who is the Author of those Books) upon the 4th Chap. of Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians. This Sealing of the baptized was sometimes perform'd with the Chrism, (that is) when the Person, in case of approaching death, had been baptized by some of the inferior Clergy, and not anointed; but if he had been perfectly baptized before, only imposition of Hands by the Bishop was required, as the Canon Araucanus tells us. Hence I conjecture arose the custom of not using the Chrism in Baptism amongst the Novatians, (as Theodoret tells us) that he did not, in his third Book Haer. Fabul. because their Ringleader Novatianus received Baptism without the Chrism.

(q) Hence we may gather that Novatianus immediately received Priest's Orders, being never Ordained Deacon, or Subdeacon; that thing was at that time unlawful in the Church, as we may see in Origen and others. Val.

(r) Formerly Bishops could not Ordain Priests without the consent of the Clergy, and People. Now concerning the requiring of the People's Votes in the Election of Presbyters, the Nicene Fathers themselves do evidence that, in their Synodical Epistle to the Bishops of Egypt. Out of several places of that Epistle we may gather, that the consent of the People was required in the Ordination of Clergy-men. The Holy Fathers also in that same Epistle deprive those Bishops who adhered to Meletius the Schismatic, of all Authority of proposing their names to the People, who were to be admitted into Holy Orders, and only granted it to those Bishops who were pure from all Schism. For, in those days, the Bishops gave up the names of them who were to be Ordained to the People, that if they had any thing to object against any of them, they might attell it openly; as we may read in the Sacramentarium of Gregory the Great. I here is also an excellent passage in St. Chrysostome upon the 11th Chapter in his 1st Homily upon the second Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians. We have the whole Solemnity excellently described in the Sacramentarium of Gregory the Great, pag. 236. upon which place consult the whole Annotations of that most learned Man  Hugo Mercurius. Val.

(s) Krieger signifies a Degree or Order of them who have any Office in the Church. So Cornelius calls κληρικος presbyterus, the Presbytership, Eufebius and Irenaeus very often use κληρικος denotative for the Dignity of a Bishop: κληρικος signifies any degree whatsoever. Val.

Exploits; saying thus; 'For he made Oblations, and distributed to every one a part thereof; which when he had (r) delivered, in stead of blessing them, he compelled the wretched (s) Men to swear, holding the hands of him that received with both his hands, and not letting them go, till the Persons had sworn, pronouncing these words; (for I will here make use of his own words: ) Swear to me by the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, that thou wilt never desert me, and revolt to Cornelius. So the miserable Man was not permitted to taste before (u) he had cursed himself. And at the receiving of the Bread, instead of saying Amen, he says, I will never return to Cornelius." Again, after some other words he says, thus: "Now you must understand he is strip'd though naked of all his Followers, and left desolate. Is not the Brethren daily deserting him, and returning to the Church: And (x) Moses a blessed Martyr, (who lately amongst us suffered a famous and admirable Martyrdom,) taking notice in his life-time of this Man's Impudence and Folly, (y) depriv'd him of Communion, together with the five (z) Presbyters, who with him had voluntarily separated themselves from the Church." Now at the end of his Epistle, Letin

he makes a Catalogue of those Bishops who were present at Rome, and condemn'd the folly of Novatians. He also gives an account of their names, and the name of every one's particular Church, in which he govern'd. He does also expressly mention those, who were not then present [at Rome,] but by Letters approv'd of the Sentence of the foreaid Bishops, together with their names, and the names of the Cities, from which each of them wrote. Thus much Cornelius has recorded in his Epistle to Fabius Bishop of Antioch.

But I had rather read it κατωθεν, with George Gennadius. The meaning of the place then is this, That the unhappy Man was not permitted to taste, before he had solemnly cursed himself. Val.

† This Phrase κατωθεν is used, instead of saying Amen in the same import with what Cornelius has said a little before, viz. αμην, after the Priest, delivering the Sacrament: had said, the Will of our Lord, &c. See Ambrosius in his B. 4. Chap. 5. De Sacramentis. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his last Catechism; and August. B. 12. Chap. 12. against Faustus, Val.

(x) Concerning this Moses, a Presbyter of Rome, Cyrian in his Epistle do speak frequently. After the Martyrdom of Fabianus Bishop of Rome (who suffered Anno Christi 250.) this Moses was apprehended, (together with Maximus the Presbyter, and Nicotrianus the Deacon,) call'd into Prison, where after 11 Months and 11 Days, he dy'd, St. Cyrian's 15th Epistle to Moses and Maximus. Val.

(y) Moses being a Presbyter had no Authority to excommunicate his fellow-Presbyters: All he could do was to separate himself from their Communion, when they came to visit him in Prison. This Phrase here αποχωρισθησιν, i. e. he depriv'd him of Communion the ancient Writers frequently used, when they spoke of those Presbyters, who abstained from Communion with others. See Paulinus in the Life of St. Ambrose. Moses's depriving of Novatians of Communion was, I suppose, done by him a little before his death. For at this Moses the Confessor had Communion with Novatians: And when the Clergy of Rome wrote that Epistle to Cyrian (which among Cyrian's Epistles is accounted the 31.) Moses then had Communion with Novatians; for both of them subscrib'd that Epistle. Moreover, Novatianus himself wrote an Epistle, as Cyrian attests in his Epistle to Amianus: From which Epistle we may perceive the Wit and Eloquence of Novatianus; for that when Moses he must confess, is a most elegant Piece; and it was written when Moses had been a year in Prison, as may be collected from Cyrian's Epistles to Moses. Val.

(z) Who these five Presbyters were, who with Novatianus made a Schism, 'tis to me unknown. I can't think that Maximus the Presbyter and Confessor, who with Urbans, Sidonius, Nicotrianus, and the rest of the Confessors were seduced by Novatianus, adhered to his Party any long time. For Maximus and the rest of the Confessors went over to Novatianus's party after Moses's death. Indeed Novatianus separated himself from the Church before Moses's death, which happened in February, Decius 3, and Eusebius being Confessors: But the Confessors did not betake themselves to Novatianus's side till after Moses's death.

So good was the power, and authority of Moses. Besides, 'tis evident the Confessors were not diffident of their imprisonment till Moses was dead: For why should they be freed rather than Moses? Therefore they became Novatianus's followers after Moses's death. One Maximus, native-like to Maximus the Presbyter and Confessor, seems to have been one of these five Presbyters; whom Novatianus sent as his Messenger afterwards into Africa. Valf.

Dionysius's Story concerning Serapion.

Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria sent Letters to this same Fabius, who was something inclining to this Schism, and having discoursed several things concerning Repentance in his Letters to him, and also related the Combats of some who had undergone Martyrdom a little before at Alexandria, amongst other Stories, he relates a miraculous thing, which I thought necessary here to insert into this our History: it runs thus: 'I will here propose to you one Example which hapned amongst us. There was amongst us one Serapion an old Man, a Believer; who for a long time had liv'd blameless: But in the time of Persecution he lapsed; he often petition'd for pardon, (a) but no body gave attention to him, because he had sacrific'd. Being taken with Sicknefs, he remain'd for the space of three days speechless, and senseless: Being a little refresh'd on the fourth day, he called his Daughter's Son to him, and said, Child, how long do you detain me? I pray make haste, and absolve me quickly, call one of the (b) Presbyters to me: And when he had spoken these words, he was again speechless. The Child ran to the Presbyter. It was now Night; and the Presbyter also was sick, and not able to come. But (because I had before given command, [that those People who were dying, if they desired it, and (c) especially if they had before humbly requested it, should be (d) absolved, that they might depart with a lively hope] he (e) gave any fault had been excommunicated.) And the Bishop himself sometimes asked the Consent of the People. The People also did often intercede for the Penitents to the Bishop, as we may see in the preceding Chapter in the Epistle of Pope Cornelius to Fabian Bishop of Antioch. Valf.

(a) Some one may perhaps ask why Serapion did not rather send for the Bishop, whose Office it was to reconcile Penitents. The Bishop had given this Authority to the Presbyters, for fear, lest he being absent, any one should dye without Absolution and the Communion. See Eusebius in his History of the Arians. This custom of committing this Authority to the Presbyters was usual in all great Cities. Valf.

(b) This was the Decree of the African Synod about the same time that Dionysius wrote these things. Valf.

(c) In the Savil and Fab. MSS. before this word [apiesau] there are some Words inserted which also Christophorus infers in his Translation: It may appear from this place that the Sacrament was delivered to such Penitents in case of necessity, without the reconciliatory imposition of Hands. And this Communion was called, the Piscarium. See Cyprian the 77 and 78 of the 4th Council of Carthage, and the 39th Canon of the first Council of Aradusca: This Communion was called also dispenfatoria, because it was granted to dying Penitents, before the completion of the full time appointed for Repentance, and if the penitent Communicant recovered, it was perfected after his recovery by Imposition, he completing his time of Repentance. Valf.

(e) This that Dionysius here says concerning the giving of the Eucharist to the Boy to carry to the sick Person, ought not to seem strange, for it was frequently done a long time after. So that St. Udalric thought it necessary expressly to prohibit it, in his Synodical Speech which Greiser published, together with the Life of Gregory the Seventh, Chap. 20. But that which Greiser takes to be St. Udalric's Oration, I found lately to be the Synodical Epistle of Ratherius Bishop of Verona to his Clergy. And so 'tis entitled in the old Laudunensian MS. Valf.

to the Child a piece of the Sacrament, bidding him to (f) moisten it in Water, and put it into the old Man's Mouth: The Child return'd with it. And when he approached, before he came thither, Serapion again recover'd himself a little, and said, Child thou art come, the Presbyter was not able to come; but do thou perform quickly what he enjoynd thee, and let me depart. And it is said the Boy moisten'd it in Water, and put it into his Mouth immediately: And when he had swallow'd it by little and little, he straightway gave up the Ghost. Is it not plain that he was preserved, and his Life prolong'd till he was absolved, that his Sin being quite blotted out, he might for the several good Works he perform'd, be (g) acknowledg'd [by Christ?"] Thus much Dionysius.

Decius, (f) Rufinus translates this phrase thus, He thus, He thus, He thus. Bread in Water, as Adamantius witnesseth in his 2d Book concerning the Miracles of St. Columba, Chap. 6. And Bede also in the Life of St. Cuthbert, Chap. 31. and in his Poem upon the same Man's Life; and several other Ecclesiastical Writers. But the Eucharist being put in the mouth of sick Persons, is mentioned in the 75th Canon of the 4th Council of Carthage; which Canon is, concerning sick Persons, who desired Repentance, but were speechless before the Priest came to them. See the Contents of that Canon. Valf.

(g) Langus and Mafius render ἀποκαθάρσις in this place by the Latin word confiteri; which, in my opinion, is intolerable. Christophorus renders it, in numerum Confessorum referri, to be reckoned amongst the Confessors: Which translation I like, if it be understood thus, referri Christo, to be reckoned by Christ. For Dionysius alludeth to Christ's Words in the Gospel; He who shall confess me before Men, him will I also confess before my Father, &c. Matth. 10. 32. Valf.

C H A P. XLV.

Dionysius's Epistle to Novatus.

LET us now see what the same Person wrote to Novatus, who about this time disturb'd the Fraternity of the Roman Church. Take notice therefore how he writes to him, because he pretended that some of the Brethren were the Authors of his Apostacy and Schism, and how he yielded to it, being compelled by them. 'Dionysius sendeth greeting to our Brother (a) Novatus. If you (as you say) were seduced unwillingly, you should manifest it by a voluntary return. For better it were to endure any thing whatever, than that the Church of God should be rent asunder. Nor were Martyrdom less honourable if a Man suffer death before he will yield to raise Schism in the Church, than if he undergo it rather than he will yield to sacrifice to Idols. Yea, in my opinion, 'tis much more glorious, for in that case Man suffers Martyrdom for his own Soul's sake only: But in this he undergoes it for the sake of the whole Church. Wherefore now, if you can persuade or compel the Brethren to return to concord, your Good Deed will be greater than your Crime; for this will not be imputed to you; but that will be commended. But if you can effect nothing upon the Disobedient, save your own Soul. I wish you Health, and that you may embrace Peace in the Lord.' These things he wrote to Novatus.

(a) Hieronymus, in his Catalogue, where he relates the beginning of this Epistle, in stead of Novatus more truly writes Novatianus. And so in George Synellus's Chronicle we read Novatius. Novatius Rufinus says that Dionysius wrote two Epistles after the same Copy; one to Novatus, another to Novatianus; and at the end of Dionysius's Epistle to Novatus, which Eusebius here rehearseth, he adds that much, And he wrote these same Words to Novatianus: Which Words are nowhere found in the Greek Text. The Greek Writers being deceived through the likeness of the Names, make a confusion betwixt Novatus and Novatianus, using them both to signify one and the same Person. Our Author Eusebius is also guilty of this mistake. Valf.

Decius.

CHAP. XLVI.

Concerning Dionysius's other Epistles.

HE also wrote an Epistle concerning Repentance to them (a) in Egypt; in which he layeth down his Opinions concerning the Lapsed, and makes distinctions in the degrees of Faults. There is also extant a particular Book of his concerning Repentance, to Canon Bishop of the Church of Hermopolis. And another (b) objuratory Epistle to his Flock at Alexandria. And amongst them there is an Epistle written to Origen concerning Martyrdom: And an Epistle to the Brethren at Laodicea, over whom Theymidres was Bishop: He also writ concerning Repentance to the Brethren in Armenia, over whom (c) Meruzanes was Bishop. He writes to all these, and also to Cornelius Bishop of Rome, after he had received his Epistle concerning Novatus: Where he declares that he was invited by Helmus Bishop of Tarsus in Cilicia, and those who were with him;

(a) Hieronymus in his Book concerning the Ecclesiastick Writers, saith, that Dionysius wrote this Epistle about Repentance, and the Order and Degree of Sin, to the Armenians. Valef.

(b) Musculus and Christophor. translate κηρυγματις, an Horary Epistle; but not well: Eusebius uses the same word in his former Books. Valef.

(c) In the Max. Med. and Vul. MSS. in stead of μερζανος, 'tis μερζανος; he was Bishop of Armenia the Less, as I think. Valef.

and also by Firmilianus Bishop of Cappadocia, and by Theodotus Bishop of Palestine, to meet them at the Synod at Antioch, where some Men endeavour'd to establish the Novatian Schism.

(d) Moreover, he sends him word that he had heard Fabian was dead, and that Demetrianus was appointed to be his Successor in the Bishoprick of Antioch. He also writes concerning the Bishop of Jerusalem in these very words: 'Also blessed Alexander being in Prison, there died a happy death.' There is extant besides this another Epistle of his sent by Hippolytus to the Brethren at Rome, concerning the (e) Office of a Deacon. He also wrote another to them concerning Peace, and concerning Repentance likewise. And again he wrote another to the Confessors there, who even at that present were favourers of Novatus's Opinion. He also sent to those same Men two other Epistles, after their return to the Church. He also compiled many more Epistles written to divers persons, wherein he has left to them, who at this time studiously peruse his Works, variety of profit.

(d) We must understand this News was written in the same Epistle, and not in another, as Christophorus thinks. Valef.

Goar, who published Georgius Syncellus, and illustrated him with his Notes, thinks that this Διακονικη was a kind of an Ecclesiastick Epistle, as were the Synodical, the Dimissory-Epistles, and the like: But I rather assent to Rufinus, that it was called Διακονικη, because it treated concerning the Duty of a Deacon. Valef.

Of the Ecclesiastical History

THE PREFACE.

Dionysius the Great, Bishop of Alexandria, shall again assist us with his Words in the Composure of this Seventh Book of the Ecclesiastick History; who particularly relates all the Actions of his own Times, in the Epistles which he left to Posterity: And our Narration shall take its beginning from hence.

CHAP. I.

Concerning the Wickedness of Decius and Gallus.

GALLUS succeeds Decius, who was slain in a short time, together with his (a) Children, before he had fully completed the (b) Second Year of his Reign. (c) About this time died Origen, having lived Seventy Years wanting one. But Dionysius in his Epistle to Hermannon, writes thus concerning Gallus: ‘But neither did Gallus understand what was Decius’s Destruction; neither did he before see what brought his Ruin; But he also stumbled upon the same Stone, which lay before his Eyes. He, (his Kingdom being in a happy state, and all Affairs succeeding according

Aurelius Quintus. They were both made Cæsars by their Father, and afterwards Augusti, as may appear by their Coins, and the Inscriptions upon them. Valef.

(4) Eusebius in his Chronicle faith, Decius reigned<sup>d</sup> one year and three months. Aurelius Victor faith, he died after he had reigned<sup>d</sup> two years compleat. But Victor in his Epiomy faith he reigned<sup>d</sup> thirty months. Eusebius in his Chronicle affigne one year and three months to Decius, because he had before said that Philip reigned<sup>d</sup> seven years, whereas he reigned<sup>d</sup> but six. After his Death Decius proclaim'd himself both Emperor and Consul, which was in the Year of Christ 249. And in the Year 250, he was again Consul: And also after he had been Governour, as we may gather by a Decree of the Senate which was made the Year of Julius Tollio in Valentin relates. Wherefore he died the Year following, together with his Sons (when Gallus and Volusianus were Consuls,) being all kill'd in the Wars in Thrace. Valef.

(.) Baronius placeth Origen's Death at the Year of Christ 256. in the 3rd Year of Gallus and Volusianus: Eusebius here placeth it in the same year that Decius died, and Gallus began to govern. But Eusebius himself in the 36th Chapter of the 6th Book of this History confirmeth what Baronius saith: For he says that in the 3d Year of Emperour Philip's Reign, which was the 10th Year of Emperour Septimius from the 3d Year of Philip's Reign to the 3d Year of Gallus and Volusianus's Consulship, 'tis 9 years. Moreover, if we say Origen liv'd 65 years, and died in the first Year of Gallus the Emperor, he must necessarily be born in the 4th Year of Commodus the Emperor: But the Chronicon Alexandr. assigns his Birth to the 5th Year of that Emperor. ## CHAPTER II

Cornelius having possess'd the Bishoprick of Rome about three years, Lucius was appointed his Successor. He having ministred in the Office not eight whole months, died, and relinquish'd the Dignity to Stephen. It was this Stephen to whom Dionysius wrote the first of his Epistles concerning Baptism, there being about that time a great Controversie raised, whether it were lawful for the Converts, of what Sect soever, to be cleansed by Baptism. (a) For an old Custom had prevail'd, that about these Converts only Imposition together with Prayer was to be used.

for what follows concerning Cyprian, ought to be contain'd in the 3d Chapt. the same Sentence with these last words in this Chapter. And before these words in all Books we find a distinction, which shews, here is to begin another Period. But Musculus and Christoph. begin the third Chapter where we do. Valeſ.

C H A P. III.

How Cyprian, with some Bishops which were of his mind, was the first that was of the Opinion, that the Converts of any Heretical Sect whatever, ought to be a rebaptized.

Cyprian then Bishop of Carthage was the (a) first (a) Cyprian was not of all, who thought, that Hereticks should be admitted unless they were cleansed the first this Opinion; but Agrippinus, who was Bishop of Carthage a long time before before him, having assembled together the Bishops of Africa and Numidia, made a Decree that Heretics should be re-baptiz'd, as Cyprian faith in his 71 and 72 Epistles. Therefore Cyprian ought here to be excus'd, who only endeavour'd to maintain his Predecessors Opinion, which was establish'd by the Authority of a Synod. But this Custom of re-baptizing Heretics, had been us'd in Cappadocia time out of mind, as Firmilianus Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia testifieth in his Epistle to Cyprian. Valef.

Gallus, from their former Error by Baptism. (b) But Stephen thinking no Innovations ought to be rais'd in opposition to the Tradition which had prevail'd of old, was in no wise well pleas'd the Bishops at this. (a) Nephele is in the 74 and 75 Epist. of Cyprian. Firmilianus also, in his Epistle to Cyprian, relates some Heads of that Epistle, and confutes them. Valef.

CHAP. IV.

How many Epistles Dionysius wrote concerning this Controversie.

Dionysius therefore having written at large to * him concerning this business, at last certifieth him, that the Persecution being alay'd, the Churches in all places, which desired Novatus's (a) Novelties, had regain'd a general Peace amongst themselves: Thus he writes.

(a) Nephele is in the 74 and 75 Epist. of Cyprian. Firmilianus also, in his Epistle to Cyprian, relates some Heads of that Epistle, and confutes them. Valef.

CHAP. V.

Concerning the Peace which followed the Persecution.

(a) Berenice is from this Epistle of Dionysius, which was written the Year of Christ 255; gathers that the Eastern Bishops had renounced their Error, and adher'd to Stephen's Opinion. (b) Heretics were not to be re-baptiz'd. But any considerate Reader of this Epistle will find it far otherwise. For the Subject of this Epistle is twofold. 1. Whether Heretics were to be re-baptiz'd. 2. Concerning the Unanimity of the Oriental Churches, which had abominated the Novatian Heresie, and decreed that the Lapsed should be received. He therefore tells him, that Dennerianus Bishop of Antioch, Metropolitan of the East, and the rest had subscrib'd to this Opinion; which he knew would please Stephen, because Fabius, Dennerianus's Predecessor, endeavour'd to establish the Novatian Heresie, as Dionysius before signified in the end of the 6th Book of this History. Valef.

(b) These words [and a little farther] are not in the Vulg. and Greek MSS. but Syriac, Nicæborn, King's, May, and Ale. MSS. have them; and though some will have these words to signify ἐκείνην τὴν αἵρεσιν, the more remote Churches, yet I think that they are Eusebius's own words, repeating the Heads of Dionysius's Epistle. And this is my Reason, because in most of our MSS. there is a middle distinction at these words; therefore we translate it thus, a little farther he writes. Valef.

(c) This City was in Dionysius's Days, and also till Constantine's Time called Elia. It was afterwards called Jerusalem (as I before noted) through the Pride of the Bishops of that See, who termed themselves the Successors of James the Just: Hence is it that Rufinus never calls it Elia, but according to the manner of his Times, always Jerusalem. Valef.

(d) frequently relieve, and to whom you have Gallus. now written: Mesopotamia also, Pontus, and Bithynia: And in a word, all People every-where joyce for the Concord and Brotherly-love, and praise God." These are the words of wont for Xylus succeeds Stephen after he had merely to execute the Episcopal Office two years. To relieve other Dionysius wrote a second Epistle concerning Baptism, and set forth to him the Judgment and Opinion of Stephen, and the other Bishops. Con-Money and Stephen thus he writes: "Indeed he before (e) wrote Letters concerning Helens and Firmilianus, and all the [Bishops] of Cilicia, Cappadocia, Captivi and Galatia. And moreover, concerning all they, and to neighbouring Provinces, that he would have no communion with them for this very reason, because, says he, they rebaptize Heretics. And consider the weightiness of the Affair; for the truly I hear that there have been Determinations made in the (f) greatest Synods of Bishops concerning this business, that Heretics which were converted, should be first Catechized, and Epistle to then should be wash'd and cleansed from the Filth of their old and unclean Leaven. (And I wrote to him, making intercession for all these Men. And afterwards he says; Also to our Well-beloved and Fellow-Presbyters, Dionysius his 4th B. and Philemon who were formerly of Stephen's Opinion, and wrote to me concerning the same things) I before wrote in short, but now I have written more at large." But thus much says, that concerning the said Controversie.

continued in the Church of Rome in his days. And to that purpose Collections were made in the Church. Emperors properly signifies, to supply one with all things necessary for a journey, viaticum præbere, and also it signifies (as it does here) to relieve charitably, as we do Beggars with Alms, or Alms. So Clement Alex. in his first Book Stromata, and Cyprian in his 67th Epistle upon Martyrs, use the word. Valef.

(e) Stephen wrote another Epistle (besides that we mentioned, before he wrote to the Bishops of Africa) to the Eastern Bishops, which Firmilianus mentions in his Epistle to Cyprian, near the end: Where Firmilianus says, that he broke off all Peace and Friendship with the Eastern Bishops, but he did not, only threatened that he would renounce all communion with them, if they persisted in their old Opinion, as Dionysius here expressly testifieth. It is certain that Stephen never proceeded in this matter farther than threats; for after Stephen's death, Dionysius wrote to Xylus desiring his judgment in that point. For Dionysius inclined to the Opinion of the Africans, and the Eastern Bishops, as Hieronymus witnesseth. Firmilianus in his foresaid Epistle does strangely aggravate the business; so that some think from his words they may gather that Stephen excommunicated those Bishops: He was indeed much displeased that the African Synod should pretend to disannul so ancient a custom, and make Decrees, that Heretics should be re-baptiz'd, without the knowledge of the Church of Rome: But he never broke Peace with them, nor excommunicated them: For he wrote an answer to Cyprian. And altho' his Letters to Cyprian were something sharp, yet they still remain'd Friends: For Cyprian afterwards in his Letters to Pompeian, called Stephen Brother. In fine, the Africans, notwithstanding Stephen's Letters, re-baptiz'd Heretics till the Times of Constantine, as we may see from the Council of Arles. Valef.

(f) He means by these great Synods, the Synod of Laodicea, of which see Firmilianus's Epistle to Cyprian; the Council of Synnada, and the Council of Carthage under Cyprian: In which Council above eighty Bishops gave their Opinion, some of which were Martyrs and Confessors: In the Council of Laodicea fifty Bishops met, as Augustin, attests in Book 3. and Chap. 3. against Crisostomus. But the Eastern Churches, especially the Churches of Cappadocia, still retained their old custom of re-baptizing Heretics. And that custom remained amongst them even till the first Synod of Constantinople. Valef.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Heresie of Sabellius.

(a) After this Head of discourse, he informs him (a) Infidel of the (b) Sabellian Heretics, who at that time, the King's MS. reads ἐπὶ αὐτῷ, which reading we follow, and understand καταδύει, which word is us'd in Eusebius before. Now ἐπὶ αὐτῷ signifies, Post illud capitulum, after that Chapter, or Head of Discourse. Dionysius's Epistle to Xylus consisted of two principal parts, which were the Matter and Subject of the whole, (viz.) Concerning Heretics being re-baptiz'd, and concerning Sabellius's Heresie. Valef.

(b) These Heretics were very ancient, even before Sabellius, though those who maintained these Opinions were afterwards also denominated from Sabellius. For we find this was the Opinion of Praxeas, against whom Tertullian wrote. After Praxeas followed Novius, (See Epiph. Hier. 57.) from whom they were called Novians. Suddenly after Novius arose Sabellius, from whom all which held the same Opinion were afterwards called Sabellians. This Sabellius (the reviver of this Heresy) was a Lybian, born at Prolemais a City of Pentapolis: He affirmed the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to be but one Substance, one Person under three several Names, which in the time of the Old Testament gave the Law under the notion of the Father; In the New, was made Man in the capacity of the Son, and descended after Novius undertakes this Man; but managing the Cause with too much eagerness and fervency of disputation, he bent the Stick too much the other way, asserting not only τρεῖς ἰσότητες ἀλλ' ὁμοουσιον, a distinction of persons, but also ἕως διαφοράς, a difference of essence, and an inequality of Power and Glory. Upon which account he is severely censured by St. Basil, (Epist. 41. ad Magn. Theoloph.) and others of the Ancients, as one of those who in a great measure opened the Gap to those Arius Impieties, which afterwards broke in upon the World.

time abounded mightily; and thus he writes; For concerning the Opinion which lately sprung up at Prolemais a City of Pentapolis, which is impious, and full of Blasphemies against God Almighty, Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and contains much Infidelity against his only-begotten Son, the first-begotten of every Creature, the Word that was conconvert all Men; and is full of stupidity and senselessness about the Holy Ghost: When Letters came to me from both Parties and Brethren to discourse with me, I wrote some (c) Epistles according to my ability with God's assistance, explaining those [Points] more at large like an Instructor: Of which Epistles I have sent you Copies.

Bishop of Bernici, and that to Telephorus, and that to Euphrasius: All against Sabellians. Eusebius mentions these Epistles, in Chap. 26. of this fourth Book. Athanasius in his defence of Dionysius Alexandrinus mentions but one Epistle of Dionysius to Ammonius and Euphrasius. Dionysius was accused by some Bishops of Egypt, for speaking some things about Christ in that Epistle which were not Orthodox. Valef.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the most execrable Error of the Hereticks, and concerning the Vision sent from God, which appeared to Dionysius, and the Ecclesiastick Canon he received.

THE same Dionysius in his third Epistle concerning Baptism, written to Philemon, Prefbyter of the Church of Rome, annexeth these words: I have read over the Books and Traditions of the Hereticks, desiring my Mind for a little while with their most accursed Inventions: Indeed, I received this advantage from them, that I can the better confute them in my own thoughts, and do grow to a greater detestation of them. And when one of my Brother-Presbyters prohibited me, fearing lest I should be mixed and disordered with the Filth of their Wickedness; (for he said my Mind would be defiled, and truly I was sensible he said true:) A Vision sent from God corroborated me. And a voice came to me, which gave me this express command, saying, Read all things that thou shalt take into thy hands, for thou art able to search into, and to examine every thing, and this was the principal cause of thy becoming a Christian: I gladly received the Vision, as being consonant with the (a) Words of the Apostle, who speaketh thus to those who are able,

(a) These Words with the

(a) These Words with the ὁμοὺς τρεῖς ἰσότητες, be ye skilful Tryers or Examiners, are no where found in the Apostle. Indeed we have, in the first Epistle to the Thellianians Chap. 5. ver. 21. these Words, Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good: Which are the same in effect with these, be ye Tryers, &c. But Origen and Hieronymus say that these words, Estote boni

Tryepites, are an express command of our Saviour's: And that the place out of the Thellianians above-quoted has relation to these words δοκιμαζέτωσαν, and exactly agrees with them; whereas I am of the same mind with the Learned Cyber, who in his Proleg. to Ignatius's Epist. cap. 8. says, this command of Christ is taken out of the Gospel according to the Hebrews. These words are also quoted in Cyri's Hieroglyph. his 6 Catechism, near the end. Valef.

Be ye skilful * Examiners. Afterwards, having spoken something concerning all the Heresies, he continues, saying: I received this Rule and Canon from Heraclas our Blessed Pope. For the original is that those who were Converts from Heresies, (although they were (b) Apostates from the Church; or rather not Apostates, but seemingly assailed themselves, and were privately discovered to frequent any of the Heterodox Teachers) he excommunicated, and would not again admit them into the Church although they intreated him before they had made a publick Confession of what they had heard from the adverse Party. And then he again admitted them to Communion, but thought no second Baptism was requisite for them, because they had before received Holy * [Baptism] from him. Again, Law (Ex. 64. 32.) thus concludes: This furthermore I understand, that the Africans of this Age were not the only Introducers of this Custom, but this was established long before by Bishops, who were before our Age, in their most populous Assemblies, and in the (c) Synods of the Brethren at Iconium, and at Synnada, and amongst many other Persons; whose Sentiments and Decernments I will by no means overthrow, nor excite them to Contention and Strife. For it is the example, (which by the length of their journey they were sometimes disabled to do) these Trapezite set up their Tables in the very Temple, that to them might traffic with all that had use of them; in like manner as others brought Oxen and Sheep and Doves, to sell there to them which had brought their Sacrifices with them. See Dr. Hammond on Mat. 21. v. 12.

(b) Here we may see the Difference between Apostates, and those which are simple Hereticks. Apostates were baptized in the Catholic Church, but had deserted the Church and revolted to Hereticks: Simple Hereticks were those who had never been admitted into the Church. And this was the custom in the Church, that Apostates as well as simple Hereticks should be received (when they returned to the Church) by imposition of Hands. St. Augustin, in his 25 Epistle to Vincentius saith, the Church dealt more kindly with them who were never received into the Church, (that is with them who were simple Hereticks) than with them who had been received into her, and deserted her, (that is Apostates). This is therefore the first of Dionysius's words here, as we may gather by the aforementioned Words of St. Augustin. Dionysius here says, Heraclas his Predecessor had this form of admitting Converts, who had been Apostate Hereticks, into the Church. He required a publick Confession (which is called Exomologesis) of the Principles of that Heresy which they had followed; but he did not baptize them, because they had been before baptized: He immediately after this Confession he laid his Hands upon them (as we may gather from Dionysius's words) this imposition of hands upon an Apostate, and a simple Heretic, was different. The one was ad penitentiam, in order to Repentance: The other was ad translucendum Spiritum Sanctum, for the delivery of the Holy Ghost: the first was used at the admission of Apostates, the other at the admission of them whom they called pure Hereticks. See Cyprian's Epistle to Stephen. In the MS. and Rob. Stephens's Edit. the reading is [τῶ τῷ ἀποστατῷ, &c. for they had received the Holy Spirit, &c.] in the King's, Mar. and Euk. MSS. the word [τῷ τῷ ἀποστατῷ, &c.] is wanting: Which in my judgment is the true reading. For Dionysius gives the reason why Heraclas did not reiterate Baptism in the admission of Hereticks in these words. [τῶ τῷ ἀποστατῷ, &c. ἀποστατῶν, &c.] [understand Βαπτισμῶν, Baptism] [for they had before received Holy Baptism from him.] Dionysius calls Βαπτισμῶν, to distinguish it from the Baptism of Hereticks; which Cyprian, Vincentius, and others (who at that time defended the opinion of not rebaptizing Hereticks) call profane: Dionysius was a favourer of their party, as appears both from his Epistles here quoted by Eusebius, and also from St. Jerome's Testimony. Valef.

(c) That these Synods were before Dionysius Alexand. his time, we may easily gather by his own Words here: For he expressly affirms that these Synods were παλαιὰ ἀπὸ πατέρων, long before our time. The same thing Eusebius witnesseth, in his Epistle to Cyprian concerning the Synod of Knoum. This Synod was a long time before the Days of Stephen Bishop of Rome, as we may gather by Virginianus's Words in his said Epistle to Cyprian, where he expressly affirms that this Synod eminent Man, the very chief of the City: And before he reigned (as Hieronimus aver) was judged worthy of the Empire by common consent. This Translation and Mistake of Christoph. has also brought Baronius into an Error. Valer.

Valerian. Empire, but being unable to put on the Imperial Dignity, because of his feebleness of Body, he made his two Sons Emperors, who were Heirs of their Father's Iniquities. The Prophecy which God spake is most evidently accomplished in these two Brothers: Visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me: For he imposed his own (!) evil Lusts which he could not enjoy, upon the Heads of his Children, and imprinted on them his own Wickedness and Hatred against God.* Thus much Dionysius writes concerning Valerian.

(1) Valerian. et we have rendered (which he could not enjoy) And if that reading [ἀντὶ τούτου] be true, it must be so rendered: The King's MSS. and Steph. Edit. read [ἀντὶ τούτου] But the Mar. Med. and Luk. MSS. read ἐκ τούτου, which he justifiably obtained; and in my opinion 'tis the better reading: For Maximian did obtain the Empire, which he was so desirous of, but by reason of his debility of Body he was unable to carry the Insignia of the Empire, but raised his two Sons to that Dignity, whereupon upon the obtaining of all these his desires, Dionysius might well say of him, ἐκ τούτου ἐπέβησαν ἐπ' αὐτοῦ τὰ βασιλείᾳ, that he was capax capax, Master of all his wishes. As for this feebleness of Body (ἀσθενεῖα καὶ ὀλιότης) which he attributed to Maximian, we find it mentioned in no Historians, except in Zonaras's Annals (who was the only Man that gave us a true Relation of the Acts of Maximian and his Sons) and he says Maximian was lame. Valer.

C H A P. XI.

Concerning what then happened to Dionysius, and to those Christians which were in Egypt.

BUT concerning the Persecution which raged exceedingly against him; what [Sufferings] also he and others sustained upon account of the worship of the Supreme God, his own words will declare, which he wrote in answer to * Germanus, a Bishop of those times, who endeavour'd out of malice to revile him: Thus he answers him. (a) I run the hazard of falling into great folly and stupidity, being compelled of necessity to relate the miraculous Providence of God concerning us. But because 'tis said; (b) It is good to keep close the secrets of a King, but it is honourable to reveal the works of God: There-

*The passage which follows, is an eminent argument of the Epistle or rather the Book which Dionysius wrote against Germanus the Bishop, and it is to be joined to that other argument of the same Book, which you had in Chap. 4. of Book 3. Valer.

(a) This place in Dionysius alludeth to that of Saint Paul in the 11th Chap. of the 2d Epist. to the Corinthians v. 15; where St. Paul useth this same exhortation, being absent to comfort himself: Upon which place Christophorus Annotat. 121-2.

(b) These words we find in the 12th Chap. of Tobit ver. 7.

fore I will hand to hand engage in the assault made against me by Germanus. I came to Emilianus not without company, for there followed me Maximus my Fellow-Presbyter, and Eusebius, Eusebius, and Cheremon who were Deacons. One of the Brethren of Rome also then present went in with us. Neither did Emilianus say to me at first, do not you hold solemn Assemblies; For this was needless for him to have said, and a recursion from the last to the first, or principal thing in hand: For it was not his desire that we should not assemble others, but his principal care was that we ourselves should not be Christians. And he commanded me to leave off that way of Worship, for he thought that if I would change my mind, others would follow my example: I replied not impertinently but in short, that (c) we ought to Valerian. obey God rather than man. But I openly protested that I worshipped him who is the only true God, and adored no other, and that I would never change my mind, nor ever cease being a Christian. After these words he bid us depart thence into a Village called Cephro adjoining to the Wilderness. But hear what words passed on both sides, as we find them inserted in the (d) Publick Records (e): When Dionysius and Kauslus, and Maximus and Marcellus and Cheremon, were brought in Emilianus the Governour said; I have also discoursed with you by word of mouth concerning the Clemency which our Lords the Emperors have used towards you, for they have given you power to remain in safety, if you will but turn to that which is agreeable to nature, and adore the Gods which are Protectors of their Empire, and forget those things which are repugnant to nature. What say you to these [Proposals?] For I hope you will not shew yourselves ungrateful towards their Clemency, because they incite you to better things. Dionysius replied, all Men do not worship the same Gods, but every one worships those whom they think to be Gods: But we pay reverence and adoration to one only God, the Creator of all things, who gave the Empire into the hands of the most Sacred and August Emperors Valerian and Gallienus. And to him we offer up our Prayers incessantly for the permanency and stability of their Empire. Emilianus the Governour said unto them, who hindereth you but you may also worship him (if he be a God) together with them who are by nature Gods: For you are commanded to worship the Gods, and also those Gods whom all Men own to be such: Dionysius replied, we adore no other. Then said Emilianus the Governour unto them, I see you are altogether ungrateful and insensible of the Emperor's Lenity towards you: Wherefore you shall not abide in this City, but shall be sent into the parts of Libya, to a place called Cephro; for this place I have design'd for you according to our Emperor's command; and it shall in no wise be suffer'd that either you, or any others, keep your Meetings, or have recourse to the places called the (f) Carneteries; but if it appears that any one of you be not gone to the place which I have commanded you to go to, or shall be found afterwards in any Assembly, he will bring imminent danger upon himself, for a necessary observation [thereof] shall not be wanting. Therefore depart

Chap. 5. of the Acts of the Apostles, ver. 29. they are St. Peter's answer to the Sanbedrim, when they laid to their charge the preaching the Gospel: But how these words come in in this place I cannot tell, except we read with the Kings MSS. ἀποκρίσας δὲ ἐκ ἀποστόλων τῶν ἐκ τῆς Ἀπολλείας, ὅτι (c) ἡμεῖς προσκυνούμεν αὐτὸν οὐ κατὰ φύσιν, ἀλλ' οὐκ ὡς τὸν ἀντίστοιχόν τῆς Ἀπολλείας. Valer.

(d) Christophorus translates [ἐπιμαρτυρία] sent a question in Commentariis relata sunt; but we have rendered it thus, as they are inserted in the Publick Records. For the Greeks use ἐπιμαρτυρία in the same sense as the Latines use their word Acta, see Book 1. Chap. 9. Note (a). Those which wrote these Commentariis relata sunt Latines call acta Actis, Registers, Records. We find mention of these Registers of Alexandria in several places. Lucianus was once Recorder of Alexandria, and he (it is said) had a large Salary out of the City Treasury for the performance of this Office; and for the good execution thereof he had the Government of a Province conferred upon him. Valer.

+ Cephro was the most rude and barbarous tract of the Lybian Desert; and Calutib (a place hereafter mentioned in this Chapter, to which Dionysius was in particular design'd) was, 'tis like, the most uncomfortable part of this tract. See Nicéphor. B. 6. Chapter 1.

(f) Those places which Εσκληρία in Greek here calls κατακρήνη the Latines call atra. Valer. They were the places where the Martyrs were usually buried; upon which account the Christians frequent them. See Book 4. Chap. 11. Note (a.)

Valerian. depart hence whither you are commanded: And he compell'd me, altho' I was sick, to depart, and gave not one day's respite. (g) How then could I have any leisure to call or not to call a Meeting? After some Passages again he saith; But neither were we absent (by God's assistance) from a corporal Congregation: For with greater diligence I gathered together those in the City, as if I had been present with them, being absent in Body (as I b. said) but present in Spirit. In Cephro also there was a great Congregation assembled with us, some of whom were the Brethren who follow'd us out of the City; others came thither from the rest of Egypt: And there God opened to us a Door [to preach his] Word: At first indeed we were persecuted and stoned: But afterwards some of the Heathens, and those not a few, forsook their Idols, and were converted to God; for the Word, which they had not before received, was then first won amongst them by us; as if God had sent us away to them for this End. After we had here fulfilled the Ministry, he again removed us to another place. For Amilianus resolved to convey us into places more uncomfortable (as he thought) and more like the Libyan Desert: And he gave command that we should altogether repair to Marcatis, having allotted particular Villages throughout that Region for every of us. But he ordered us to reside near the High-road, that we might be the first that should be apprehended. For this was wholly his Contrivance and Provision, that whenever he had a mind to apprehend us, he might have all of us easily taken without any trouble. But when I was commanded to depart to Cephro, although I knew not where the place lay, (having scarce ever before heard the name of it,) yet I went away willingly, and not at all disturb'd. But when they told me I was to depart thence to the (i) [Parts] of Coluthis, they who were present with me can tell how I was then dispos'd; for here I will blame myself: At first indeed I was griev'd and sorely vexed; for altho' I had a better knowledge of, and was more acquainted with those places, yet they reported it was a Country not inhabited by Brethren and good Men, and expos'd to the Disturbances of Travellers, and Incurfions of Thieves. But I received comfort by the Brethren, when they suggested to me, that it lay nearer to the City; and although Cephro had brought us a great Multitude of Brethren out of Egypt, so that we could hold larger Assemblies, yet there, the City lying nearer, we should more frequently enjoy the Company of our truly beloved Friends and Acquaintance, for they would flock thither, and reside with us. And there would be (k) particular Congregations, as if it were in the more remote Suburbs. And so it fell out to be." After some other discourfe thus again (k) These writeth concerning what happen'd unto him, words, [But perhaps] Germanus * glorieth in his many Confessions; and he can enumerate a great many [Afflictions] which have befallen him. But how many Sentences of the Judges may he reckon up which were pronounc'd against us; [how many] Confiscations, Proscriptions, Plunderings of Goods, (l) Deprivations of Dignities, Contempts of worldly Glory, Despising of the Praises of the Præfects and (m) Senators? What patient sufferance of public Menace, of Exclamations against us, and of Perils, and of Persecutions, of wandering up and down in Exile, and of Anxieties, and of all sort of Tribulation: What things happen'd to me under Decius, and (n) Sabinius, and what to this present under (o) Amilianus. But where appear'd Germanus? What report is there concerning him? But I desist from this great Imprudence which I am fallen into upon Germanus's account. Wherefore I willingly give those Brethren, who perfectly know these matters, leave to make a Narration of every thing which did befall us." The same Dionysius, in his Epistle to Domitian and Didymus, doth again in these words mention some things concerning this Persecution; 'It is superfluous to recite to you, who knew them not, the names of all our [Martyrs,] which were very many. But understand thus much, that both Men and Women; Young and Old; young Women and ancient Women; Soldiers and Rusticks; Persons of all sorts, and all Ages; some of them having been victorious in the Combat by Scourges and Fire, and others by the Sword, received Crowns of [Martyrdom.] But a long interval of time pass'd away, being insufficient to make some appear acceptable to the Lord: In like manner, as for me it hath not seem'd [sufficient to make me acceptable] who have continued even till this. (p) These time: Wherefore God hath reserved me for a time words which he knows to be opportune, who saith; (q) cur in ha-

(a) Here Dionysius answers Germanus's Caution, who assur'd him, because he never call'd an Assembly of the Brethren before the Persecution began; which was a custom in those days, (b) That the Bishops, upon the approach of a Persecution, should gather the People together, and exhort them to a constant perseverance in Christianity; and Baptize Infants, and Catechumens, lest they should die unbaptized; and also distribute the Sacrament to Believers. (c) Altho' we read [as above] and have so translated it, yet the Max. and Med. MSS. read [as above] [as one may say] [The Fek. and Savil MSS. read he said to Dionysius, as the Arabic said: 'This certain Dionysius shew'd to that of the Apostle in the First to the Corinth. (i) In the Original the reading is [παρὰ κολυθίων] but we must necessarily understand ὑπὸν [parts,] and so we have translated it. This Coluthis was a part of the Libyan, Præfecture in Egypt; so called from them who were formerly Possessors of it. Coluthis is a common name amongst the Egyptians, and hence came κολυθίων which in Niceph. we find written with a single (L.) There were several Egyptians call'd by this name Coluthis. Valef.

Valerian. congregations, are in Greek ἀγῶνες συναγωγῶν. d. Those that dwell in the remotest parts of the Suburbs were not bound to come to the Congregation of the Great Church: But in that part of the Suburbs there were particular Assemblies in a Church, or some other place fit for that purpose. Thus much we may gather by this Passage of Dionysius. Moreover, the Greeks did not call those places singly which join'd to the City ἄγῶνες, but also the Villages which were a great way distant from the City. Canopus which was twelve miles from Alexandria, is called by Athanasius, in his Libel which he presented to the Council of Chalcedon, ἀπόστατον. Further, from this place we may gather, that in Dionysius's days there was but one Church in Alexandria, whither all the Christians assembled themselves to pray: But afterwards, in the Days of Athanasius, the number of the Churches being increased by the bounty of the Bishops of Alexandria, the Citizens of Alexandria had particular Congregations in divers Churches; except in the solemn Festivals of Easter and Whitsuntide, when all the People assembled themselves in the Great Church. Valef. * These things concerning Germanus are here spoken ironically. Valef. (i) By these words, ἀναμνησκόμενος, Depositions of Dignities; we may conjecture that Dionysius was descended of a good Family; for dignitas is that which cometh by nobleness of birth. Thus we find, in Gess. Pueri, Cædiciani, that Vidor being ask'd by Zeno, what the President, ejus conditionis esset, he answered, he was Praefessor litterarum Romanarum, and when he ask'd him ejus dignitatis esset, he answered he was praefectus a Patre Decurione Cassianianisimorum, avo militis, qui in Comitatibus militaverat. Dionysius Alexandrinus, before he turn'd Christian, was by Profession an Orator, or Teacher of Rhetorick. Valef. (m) Augustus commanded the Alexandrians to govern their City without any Senators or Aldermen. But afterwards Severus the Emperor granted the Alexandrians power of having a Senate, as we may read in Book 51. of Dio. And in Athanasius's Epistle Al sibi tractus, there is mention of the Senators of Alexandria. Valef. (n) This Sabinius was Praefect of Egypt under Decius the Emperor: of him Dionysius speaketh in his Epistle to Fabian, which Epistle is quoted in Chap. 41. Book 6. of this History. But Amilianus, who is here mentioned as Governor, afterwards seized the Empire, as Pollio writeth in his 30 Tyrants. Valef.

(p) These time: Wherefore God hath reserved me for a time words which he knows to be opportune, who saith; (q) cur in ha-

Valerian. In an acceptable time have I heard thee, and in a day of Salvation have I helped thee. But because you are inquisitive after our Affairs, and desirous to be informed in what condition we live: You have fully heard, how when I, Caius, Faustus, Peter, and Paul were led away Prisoners for the Centurion, and (p) the Magistrates [of Alexandria] and the Guards and Officers that were with them, (q) some of them of Marcius came upon them, and took us away by force, dragging us by violence who were unwilling, and would not follow them. But at this present, I, and Caius, and Peter being alone, and deprived of the rest of the Brethren, are shut up in a desert and most uncomfortable place of Libya, being three days journey distant from Paratonium. And a little after these words, he saith; Some have hid themselves secretly in the City that they may visit the Brethren; as Maximus, Diogenes, Demetrius, and Lucius, who are Prefbyters. (For Faustus and Aquila being Men more eminently known in the World, travel up and down Egypt.) But the Deacons that are surviving, besides those that died in (r) the Plague, are these: Fausus, Eusebius, Charemon, Eusebius, [I say,] one whom God hath impow'rd from the beginning, and furnished with great vigour to fulfil the Office of Ministration to the Confessors in Prison, and to perform the Funeral (s) Rites due to the Bodies of the perfected and blessed Martyrs, with great hazard and danger. For to this very present the Governour exacteth notwithstandingly to slay some who are brought before him, (as I before told you) to tear in pieces others with tortures, and to make other some to pine away in Prisons, and Bonds, giving a strict charge that none approach them, and making diligent search whether any one be come near them. Notwithstanding, God through the cheerfulness and fortitude of the Brethren, doth incessantly refresh the afflicted. These are Dionysius's words, and are contained in that Epistle.

At wherefore this word ἐπαγγέλλω must here signify some other Officer besides a Captain, we will therefore render it the Dumvir, or, as we call them, the Sheriffs, or Magistrates of Alexandria; which are in Greek often called ἐπαγγέλοι. Now it was the duty of these Magistrates to apprehend Criminals, commit them to Prison, examine them, &c. still reserving the power of judging to the Roman President. Wherefore 'tis not here absurd, that very reasonable to say, that Dumvir allotted the Governour in leading these Men into banishment: The following Words also ἐπαγγέλοι and ἀρχαὶ confirm our Opinion: For ἐπαγγέλοι are the Guards which belonged to the Prefect; ἀρχαὶ are the Officers belonging to the Dumvir, or Sheriff. Athenag. in his Epistle ad Solitarios, calls this Magistrate, or Dumvir, ἐπαγγέλος.

(q) These things were said by the sentence of Sabinus the Governour, was led to Tyberius. See his own Epistle to Valius in Chap. 40. Book 6. And whosoever does compare that Epistle with this here, he will conclude them both written concerning the same thing. Wherefore, Eusebius mistakes when he thinks that the subject of this Epistle here to Dionysius is that thing which happened in Valerian's Reign: For none of these things which I here mentioneth, happened in Valerian's Reign, but in the Persecution which began a little before Decius's Reign, as Dionysius himself saith in his Epistle against Germontus, which Eusebius quoth in the 6th Book. But in the Persecution under Valerian, he had only those Companions which he mentions in the beginning of this Chapter. Valer.

(r) Rufinus in stead of whom readeth themselves, and accordingly he translates the place, from who died in the Hand: But Dionysius means the Plague, which in Galles and Belgium time, spread itself quite through the Roman Empire, as Eusebius and others Record. Valer.

(s) Christoph. renders this word ἐκταφύει, by a long Periphrasis thus, ad linthea, quibus corpora beatorum Martyrum jam vitâ defunctorum involverantur, conficiuntur; he all along having relation to the usage in our days, for with us the dead are wrapped in linnen-cloth, and so interred. But the Ancients, I mean the Christians, used to wrap the dead in moist costly clothes, and so bury'd them. But see Christophoro's translation, we have Athenagoras's authority, who saith, in his Epistle to S. Anthony, that the Aegyptians used to wrap their dead Bodies, especially those of the Holy Martyrs in Linnen, and did not inter them, but laid them upon Beds, and kept them within their own private Houses. Valer.

We must further understand, that this Eusebius Valerian; whom he before called a Deacon, was a (r) great while after constituted Bishop of the Church of Laodicea in Syria. And Maximus, who he said was then a Presbyter, succeeded Dionysius himself in the Government of the Brethren at Alexandria. Fausus also, (who together with Dionysius was at that time famous for his being a Confessor) was reserv'd even till the Persecution in our days, and being very old, and full of years, he was persecuted by Martyrdom, being beheaded even in our Age. But thus much concerning what happen'd to Dionysius about that time.

was a great while after that Eusebius was ordained Bishop of Laodicea. For he exceeded Socrates, as Eusebius attests a little lower. Valer.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Martyrs which suffered at Cæsarea in Palestine.

IN this Persecution under Valerian, three Men of Cæsarea in Palestine were eminent for their Confession of Christ, were crown'd with Divine Martyrdom, being made food for the Wild Beasts. One of them was called Prifens; the other Malechus; the name of the third was Alexander. They report that these Men, living in the Country, should blame themselves first for being careless and slothful Persons, because they were negligent of, and did not eagerly catch at the Crown of Martyrdom, seeing that was a seasonable time of distributing those rewards of Victory to them who had the least spark of Celestial love in them. Then, when they had consulted about these things amongst themselves, they took a journey to Cæsarea, and went immediately to the place where the Judge was, and received the afore-mention'd Sentence of Death. Besides these, there was a Woman of the same City, in the same Persecution, who they report, strove in the same Combat: But 'tis famed that she was one of Marcian's Sect.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the Peace under Gallienus.

(a) BUT not long after, Valerian being (b) captivated and enslaved by the Barbarians, his Son reigned alone, who behav'd himself more prudently in his Empire. He immediately putterh a stop to the Persecution against us by his Edicts; and gave command that the Prelates of our Religion should securely, and with freedom execute their usual Offices, by his Rescript which runs thus: EMPEROR CÆSAR PUBLIUS LICINIUS GALLIENUS, PIUS FELIX AUGUSTUS, To Dionysius, Pinna, Demetrius, and the rest of the

(a) Rufinus here alters the count of the Chapters, and placeth there which we place here as the 12th and 14th, after the 19 Chapter immediately; but in his Index before this History, he keeps the same method as the Greek Copy of Eusebius does: Why he should here pervert the Order, I cannot tell; except it is, because he thinks it more convenient to subjoin the sufferings of Marinus, and Asterius to the sufferings of the Martyrs of Cæsarea. But he ought to observe that those Martyrs of Cæsarea suffered in Valerian's Persecution; but Marinus and Asterius suffered in the Reign of Gallienus. This mistake of Rufinus has brought several other Authors into the same Error. Valer.

Bishops: We have commended that the Indulgence of our Gracious Bounty be published through the whole World: That all shall quickly depart out of Religious places. And for this cause you are empower'd to make

Gallienus make use of a Copy of our Rescript, that no body may molest you: And that which is lawful for you to put in execution was granted by Us long ago: And

(c) For an upon this account Aurelius Cyrenius, Our (c) High-
Steward shall keep the Copy of this Edict granted by Us. For the more manifest understanding of the Office, see these things, they were translated by Us out of Latin into Greek, and here inserted. There is also extant another Rescript sent to other Bishops, in which he permitteth to them the Restauration of the places called (d) Cameteria.

(d) They were the places where they buried their Dead, and often assembled for their Religious Solemnities, especially the Memorials of the Martyrs; as has before been remark'd.

How Marinus was Martyr'd at Caesarea.

(a) General Peace being at this time restored to the Churches in Caesarea of Palestine, Marinus, a Man honour'd with a (a) Military Dignity, and eminent for Decent and Riches, was beheaded for his Confession of Christ, upon this account. There is a certain Dignity amongst the Romans termed the (b) Vine, which those that obtain'd, are said to be made Centurions; (c) this place being vacant, Marinus, whose course in order it was, was called to that Promotion: When he was forthwith to have been invested in that Dignity, there came another of the Forum, &c. Which could not be spoken of the Militia Caesars.
Had the Camp-militia been spoken of here, Marinus must have pleaded his Cause before the Captain or Deputy of Caesar. The Ordinary Judges thier Centurions and Centurialis in their Court. Yea, almost all the names of the Officers under them were taken from the Camp-militia, as Africanus Pellucius has remark'd. Valef.

(b) The Phrase in the Original is [Τὸ κλῆμα] which we have rendered [The Vine]. It was enacted by a Law amongst the Romans, that no Citizen should be beaten with Rods, but with Vines; See Liuy, in li's 57 Book. Upon this account the Soldiers were by the Centurions beaten with Vines; whence at last the Vine came to be the Badge of the Centurion's Office. Spartianus (in the Life of Hadrian) uses it in this sense; and so does Plutarch in Galba.

(c) In the Max. Eccl. and Med. MSS. there is a slip here; but in the King's MS. there is none: Which Foundation in the three MSS. first named, Salmusius (in his Notes on Spartianus) defends against Cassianus, (in his Notes on the same Author,) who thought that the Vine was a Badge which denoted those that were to be chosen Centurions, who should bear that Office, when there was a Place vacant. And therefore Cassianus read this Passage thus; [There is a certain Dignity amongst the Romans termed the Vine, which those that obtain are said to be made Centurions when there is a place vacant.] Which Reading agrees with the King's MS. But Salmusius makes a slip (as we do) at the word [Centurions], which doubtless is the true Reading: See Note (b) in this Chapter. Valef.

ther before the Tribunal, and accused him, saying, it was unlawful according to the Old Laws, for him to hold any Dignity amongst the Romans; for he was a Christian, and did not sacrifice to the Emperors; therefore the Office belonged to him. (d) Acbaus (for that was the (d) That name of the Judge) being enraged at this, first was the Judge's ask'd Marinus what Opinion he was of: Then name: So when he saw that he steadfastly confes'd himself a famous to be a Christian, he granted him three hours Captain respite for deliberation. When he was gone out of the place of Judicature Theotecnus the Bishop of that City coming to him, took him aside to discourse with him; and laying hold of his Hand, leads him to the Church; wherein when he had placed him at the very Altar, he put his (e) Cloak a little aside, and shewed him the Sword wherewith he was girded, and also brought the Book of the Sacred Gospels and placed it right against him, bidding him on his own accord to take of those two best pleased him. When Marinus without any delay had put forth his Right Hand, and taken up the Sacred Book, Theotecnus said unto him, adhere therefore, adhere to God; and being empower'd by him thou shalt obtain what thou hast chosen; go in peace. Immediately as he return'd from the Church, the Crier, who stood before the Tribunal, called him; for the time allotted him was now accomplish'd: When he was brought before the place of Judicature, and had shew'd a greater courage in the Confession of the Faith than he did before, immediately he was halled away to Execution, and was (f) crown'd with Martyrdom.

erroneous Reading. The Clamps and the Baltes (i. e. the Cloak and the Belt) were Military Badges, as may be proved from innumerable places in Chrysostom, Libanius, and others. Valef.

(f) The term here is [τὰς κορώναις], i. e. he was persecuted by Martyrdom. For Martyrs were initiated by Consecration, and perished by Death; as Dionysius observes it at the end of Chap. 11. in this Book. Clement Alexandrinus (in Book 4, Stromat. pag. 206.) gives another reason, why Martyrdom is called τὰς κορώναις ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ ἱερῷ ἀγῶνι ἀνδραγαθία, because it demonstrates the Perfection of Love. Valef.

A Relation concerning Astyrius.

Astyrius also is much fam'd for his Religious boldness and freedom at that time: A Man who was a Roman Senator, a singular Favourite of the Emperor's: And both for his nobleness of Birth and Estate, known to all Persons. He, being present at the Death of the forefaid Martyr, took up the Corps, wrapped it in a white and precious Garment, laid it upon his Shoulders and carried it away; and when he had adorn'd it very richly, he deposited it in a decent Grave. This Person's Familiars, who lived till our days, relate infinite other things concerning him.

Concerning the mighty Miracles of our Saviour at Paneas.

Amongst which they relate this Miracle. At Caesarea-Philippi, (which the (a) Phanicians (a) Those call Panear) they report there are Springs to be whom our Eusebius
here calls soinnes, Phanicians, are the Grecians which inhabited Phanicia. For Panear is a Greek name, the Syrians, or rather the Syro-Phanicians, called this City Dan, as S. Jerome affirms in his Quaestio-on Genesi; his words are these: Dan Phanices oppidum, quod nunc

*Panice dicitur. Dan autem unus e fontibus Jordanis. Nam et alter vocatur Jor, quod interpretatur gaderus. Quibus ergo fontibus, qui bant procul a se distant, in unum rivulum jaderitis, Jordanis deinceps appellatur. I. e. Dan est a Terna of Pheuticia, which is now called Panace. Also Dan is the name of one of the Spring-heads of Jordan. For the other is named Jor, the interpretation whereof is [a Stream.] These two fountains therefore, which are not far distant from each other, are united into one Rivulet, which is afterwards called Jordan. my struck with admiration at what was done, was sorry for their Error. Then he lifted up his Eyes to Heaven, and besought the supreme God, by Jesus Christ, that he would rebuke this Devil which seduced the People, and command him to cease from deceiving of Men. They report that when he had prayed thus, the Sacrifice floated upon the Waters immediately. Thus perish'd their Miracle, and never afterwards was there any Prodigy done near that place.

Concerning the Statue, which the Woman who had the Flux of Blood, credd.

BUT since I have made mention of this City, I think it not at all unsuitable to produce a Story, which is worthy to be related to Posterity. For they say that the

(a) This place of Eusebius, concerning the Woman who had the Issue of Blood, is quoted in the Seventh Syntaxis, Acton 3. pag. 568. See also what Pliny says in his Seventh Book, Chap. 3. And what Nicodemus, who borroweth it from him. Valef.

Woman, (a) who had the Issue of Blood, whom the sacred Gospels inform us to have been healed by our Saviour, was born in this City: And that her House may be seen there, and that the illustrious Monuments of our Saviour's beneficence shown towards her do yet remain. For near the Gate of her House ('tis said) stands upon a Pillar of Stone, the Effigies of a Woman in Bra's, kneeling on her Knees, and stretching forth her Hands forward in the form of a Suppliant. On the other side opposite to it stood another Image of a Man made of the same Metal standing upright, dressed decently in a short * Διὰ τοῦτο it sometimes signifies a Military Cloak: This term occurs Jude 100. 29. where 'tis rendered a Mantle. (b) Rufinus understands this place [μυσεὶ τῇ νεκρῷ ἀντί] as, as if this Herb had no healing virtue till it was grown up to the Skirt of our Saviour's Vesture: But since Eusebius does not expressly determine it that way, every one may interpret the place as pleaseth him best. I think Eusebius meaneth by the addition of these words, that the Herb grew up no higher than the Skirt of our Saviour's Doublet, as it were in reverence to him. See Nicodemus, Book 6. Chap. 15. Valef.

City to see it. Nor need it seem a wonder that the ancient Gentiles, who received Benefits from our Saviour, did these things; seeing that we have seen the Pictures of his Apostles Peter and Paul, and of Christ himself, drawn in colours, and preserved till our days. It is probable enough that those Ancients, according to the custom of the Heathens, were wont (c) unadvisedly to honour all those after this manner as Saints, by whom they have been any ways benefited.

indifferenter, indifferently; but I rather think ἀμετάσχετος here; miseth inconsequently, unadvisedly, contrary to the Doctrine of the Ancients, unwise. Moreover, Sir Henry Savil in the Margin of his MS. upon these words ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, the custom of the Heathens, bids us take notice that this is here spoken concerning Images. Valef.

Concerning the Chair of James the Apostle.

THE Episcopal Chair of James the First Bishop of Jerusalem, who was consecrated by our (a) Saviour himself, and the Apostles; (who in Holy Writ is honoured with the title of the Brother of Christ;) being reserved till this time, the Brethren who have succeeded in that Apostolic Church do reverence it: Hence they plainly manifest to all what great veneration and respect, both the Ancients, and also those of our Age, have, and do pay to Holy Men for their love to God. But thus much concerning these things.

Christ, in his 38 Homily upon the Epistle to the Corinthians, on these words, Deinde iussu est Jacobi, Then he was seen of James; expressly affirmeth it: The same also Epiphanius, Nicodemus, Callist, and others do affirm. They all seem to borrow this Opinion from the First Book of Clement's Recognitions: Also in the Eighth Book of his Constitutions, Chap. 35. we find him speaking of James the Bishop of Jerusalem in these words, ὁ ἅγιος ἀποστόλος καὶ ἱερεὺς, Ordained by our Saviour himself, and the Apostles. We must farther advertise the Reader that these words ἅγιος, the Apostle, as wanting in the King's, Fulk, and Maz. MSS. and in Rufinus: But in our Maz. Med. Fulk. MSS. in the Contents of this Chapter, we find this word ἅγιος, the Apostle: Although in the Index of the Chapters which are prefixed, we find it thus written, ὁ ἅγιος Ἰακώβος ὁ ἀποστόλος, concerning the Chair of James the Bishop. Concerning Dionysius's Paschal Epistles, in which he prescribed a Canon concerning Easter.

Moreover, besides those his fore-mentioned Epistles, the same Dionysius at the (a) same (a) From time wrote these still extant, called (b) Paschal E. this word Discois amongst which he interweaves Panegyric πανηγυρικός Discois concerning the Feast of Easter. One of these time, some Epistles he dedicateth to Flavianus; another to Dionysius; and another to Domitius and Didymus: In which he published a Canon of eight years, having proved that we ought to celebrate the Feast of Easter, at no other time, these Epistles but after the Vernal Equinox. He composed these in the another Epistle besides these, to his Fellow-Prebiter at Alexandria, and others to divers other Persons, and these he wrote whilst the rage of the Persecution still continued.

(b) Rufinus very well translates this word ἐπιστολὰς, in this place, Paschales, Paschal Epistles. The Bishops of Alexandria used to write these Paschal Letters every Year, and send them to the rest of the Churches of Egypt; that they might all agree in the time of the Celebration of Easter. There are at this day extant Epistles of this sort, written by Theophilus, Cyril, and others: What was the Form of these Epistles we may understand from the 30 Paschal Homilies of Cyril: first they discoursed some thing concerning Easter: In the end they declared the beginning of Lent, and the Day of Easter, whence we may call them Homilies, as well as Epistles. Concerning what things happened at Alexandria.

Dionysius returned to Alexandria, Peace being as yet scarce thoroughly settled there. But when Sedition and War joyntly raged again there, so that he could not visit all the Brethren in the City, they being divided into the one or the other Party of the Faction: Again, even on Easter-Day, as if he had been exiled out of Alexandria, he conversed with them by Letters. And in his other Paschal Letter, which a little after this he wrote to Hierax, one of the Egyptian Bishops, he mentioned the Sedition then at Alexandria, in these words: 'It is no wonder if it be difficult for me to converse with Men far remote even by Letters, whereas it is render'd now no easie matter for me to discourse with my self, and to give advice to my own Soul. For I am compell'd to send Letters even to my own Bowels, my Brethren, who live under the same Roof, have the same mind, and are Members and Inhabitants of the same Church; and it appears to me a great difficulty, how I should convey my Letters to them: For a Man may with more ease and less danger travel not only beyond the Bounds of this Province, but even from East to West, than out of Alexandria into Alexandria. For the very Middle-street of this (a) City is more unfrequented and unpasable than that vast and invidious Wilderness which Israel travelled through in two Ages. (b) Those calm and still Havens do represent the Sea through which the Israelites had a spacious passage, it being divided, and made like a Wall on both hands; (c) but the Egyptians were drown'd in the Paths thereof. And through the frequent slaughters perpetrated therein, they were like a Red-Sea. The River which runneth by the City seem'd sometimes more dry and uncomfortable than the thirsty Wilderness, through which the Israelites travelled, they were so thirsty, that they murmur'd against Moses, until by the Power of God (who only doth marvellous things) Water gush'd out of a craggy Rock for them. At other times it overflow'd in such abundance, that it laid all the Country round about under water, the High-ways and the Fields, and seem'd to threaten a return of that Deluge which was in the Days of Noah. It runneth by, being continually polluted with Blood, and murdered, and drowned Bodies;

(a) In the King's Ms. we find, in stead of the word, this City, the measures, these Cities; which reading is agree to be expell'd: for that Faction had so divided Alexandria, that in a moment it became of one City 114, as before he cometh to inter-when he saith, that a Man may with more ease travel from East to West, than out of Alexandria into Alexandria. This great Sedition, I think, happened, when Antianus posselt himself of the Government of Alexandria. Valef.

(b) There are divers ways of translating this place according as we get it. Most Translators have erred here, by an Erroneous conjunction of this Sentence with what precedeth. But Dionysius's following words confirm our Punctuation and Version: The sense of which is that the Havens of Alexandria, overflowing with the Blood of the slaughtered Citizens, did truly represent the Red Sea. Wherefore it is not the Middle Street of the City which is compared to the Red Sea (although some so interpret it) but the Ports or Havens are said to represent that. Valef.

(c) Betwixt these words where we use only a middle distinction or comma, Robert Stephens uses a full period, contrary to the Authority of all the MSS. we ought rather to follow the punctuation of the MSS. and join this passage with what precedeth: But here we meet with a Genitive singular of the Article [ὅς], which we translate in the singular number, and refer it to Σαλαῶνος the Sea, which is a singular put for the plural number. For the Sea was divided into two parts, and opened a broad way for the Israelites; so that what was really but one Sea, seem'd to be two; but if we translate it according to Stephanus's Punctuation, we can find no word to which this Genitive case plural of the Article can reasonably be referred. Valef.

like that River which by Moses, in the fight of Gallicenus, Pharaoh, was turned into Blood; and stank: And what other Water can purifie this Water which purgeth all things itself? How can that vast and immense Ocean which is unpasable by Men, cleanse this bitter Sea? Or how can that great River which springeth out of Eden, though it gather its four Heads, into which it is divided, into that one of Goan, wash away * The very hurt be purified, which on every side is defiled withation of most noisome Exhalations? For such Vapours Alexandria did doubleless conduce much to the insalubrity of the place. For these (d) continued Plagues; whence these noisome Diseases; these Contagions of all kinds; and this various, and numerous Destruction of the Men proceeds. They admire why this great City contains not in it as many Inhabitants, as (e) (should they be number'd even from Infants to the most Aged and Decrepit) as it formerly it under maintained Persons, who were (e) lively old Men, as they called them. But in those days there were many persons betwixt forty and seventy years old, that their number could not fit. The now be made up, although all from fourteen to fourscore years of age were registred, and their names enroll'd in the Tables, that they might partake of the publick Distribution of Corn. And our youngest Men now look as if they were of the same age with our old Men formerly. And altho' they see Mankind so diminished and consumed from off the Earth, (their intire Destruction being increased and augmented incessantly) yet they tremble not.

civitas ingens cisterna concamerata, crassique innitens fornicibus suffronda est, in qua centum Nilus per aquaductum in planitie usque artificio construxit extra Alexandriam delatam, sub eius matibus demittitur, &c. This artificial conveyance of the River, though it was otherwise acceptable to the Inhabitants, yet it could not be without some annoyance to the Air, the Complexion whereof suffered much alteration by the noisome Vapours which rose up out of the Waters, which in tract of time purified in their Cisterns. It is the collection of the forcible Levee, in his following Words, Cisterna parva temporis successu turbida ac congesta, diuturni officii tempore languinis occasione prebet, &c. The same Author gives us another reason for the unwholesomeness of that City; which was caused by certain little Gardens planted near the City, the Fruits whereof were so unwholesome, that the Inhabitants were thereby made subject to very noxious Fevers, and many other Dilemmas. See John Lee's descrip. Afric. 675, and 676. Edit. 1744. Bonn. 162.

(d) Σωμφορῶν καταστροφῶν, continued Plagues without intermission. The Plague even from the times of Galus and Polysenus, and Eusebius destroyed almost all the Romans Εὐνοπίου saith that the Reign of Galus and Polysenus was very remarkable for the great Plague which happened in their Days. Aurelius Victor affirms that Galus and Polysenus were beloved very much on this account, because they took care of every one, even of the poorest Man's Funeral. The Plague afterwards raged at Rome, and in the Roman Provinces, in the Days of Gallicenus, as Pollio in Gallicenus's Life attells. Valef.

(e) ἡλικιωτέρων & ἡλικιωτέρων, Hoary, hoary old Men. So they were called at Alexandria, who were betwixt forty and seventy years old. Their names were registred in Tables that they might partake of the publick distribution of the Corn, as Dionysius attells in his following Words. Over these were the Archigrautes, of whom mention is made in the first Law of the Codex Theodosianus, de Alexandria plebis primatibus. Hither may be referred that which Gregor. Naz. affirms, in xi. 21 Oratio concerning St. Athanasius, to wit, that the Alexandrians were wont to be distributed into Stets, Ages, and Troops, as often as, out of respect, they went forth to meet any Person. Valef.

C H A P. XXII.

Concerning the Plague which then raged.

Afterwards the Pestilence succeeding the War; when the Feast [of Easter] was at hand, Dionysius again writeth to the Brethren, M. 4. describing

Gallienus, describing the Miseries of that Calamity in these words : (a) To some Men this present may seem

(a) This Exordium of this Epistle of Dionysius is really a most elegant one. Here he saith, that this present time, when all things were so lamentable a posture, would seem to the unbelieving Heathens no fit time to keep a Feast : But neither this time, which (saith he) is really a time of mourning, nor any other, though never so undisturbed, never so merry, could possibly yield the Heathens any true joy. For the Wicked and Unbelievers can never keep a Feast, altho' they daily sacrifice, because they can't enjoy any true Mirth : Only the tristis and Virtuosus do truly keep a Feast, because they perform their duty, and offer Prayers and unbloody Sacrifices to God. Origen, in his 8th Book against Celsus, discourses at large concerning this Opinion : Which Passages in him are borrow'd from the Stoicks, and they give much light to the understanding of this place of Dionysius. Valef.

(b) Here we read only ὁ βασιλεὺς, and I wish : But Tunnebus in the Margin of his Book very well correcteth and pointeth it thus ; Καὶ ὁ βασιλεὺς ἦν ὁ θεὸς, And I wish only one had died in every House. The King's MS. reads thus ; ὁ βασιλεὺς ἦν ὁ θεὸς, ὅς ἐστιν ὁ θεὸς. But Tunnebus does very well amend this place of Dionysius, by his foreaid Punctuation of it. Valef.

(c) Dionysius here makes a commendable Repetition of all the Sufferings of the Christians from the time he was first ordain'd Bishop of Alexandria. First, he recounts the Persecution and Exile, which began in the last Year of Pekip the Emperor. Next the Civil War which immediately follow'd ; concerning which Civil War, see Chap. 4. 1. Book 6. of this History. Then he saith, after a little Cease in follow'd the Plague ; which he rag'd privately in the times of Calpurnius and Valerianus ; but it began in Diocles's Reign. For it is evident by Dionysius's Epistle to Domitian and Dionysius, that some Persons died of this Plague in the Reign of Decius. see Chap. 11. Book 7. Valef.

granted to us alone : But when both we and they had enjoy'd a very short time of Refreshment, this Plague immediately invaded us. A thing most formidable to them, and more calamitous than any accident whatsoever. And, as one of their own Writers saith, it was the only thing which furlmouted all Men's expectation and fear. It was indeed no such thing to us ; but rather an exercise and tryal, nothing inferior to our former Sufferings : For this Plague did not spare us ; but it rag'd grievously amongst the Heathens." After these words he continues, saying ; " Indeed many of our Brethren through their superabundant love, and brotherly kindness neglecting their own selves, and firmly adhering to one another, without any thing of caution visiting them who are infected, carefully ministring to them, and healing them in Christ, most willingly died with them ; infecting themselves with other Men's Distempers, attracting the Disease from their Neighbours upon themselves, and voluntarily (d) drawing the Infection out of them by translating it into themselves. And many who had cured and restored others to their former health, died themselves, having brought their Death upon themselves ; and being thus made the Ransom and Expiation for them all, they died, really fulfilling that common saying, which always hitherto hath seem'd to contain no more than an officious (e) Friendship. Thus therefore died the best of our Brethren ; some of whom were Priests, and others Deacons ; also those of the Laity which were eminent died voluntarily : So that this kind of death which was suffered upon account of Piety, and a steadfast Faith, may be esteem'd no less honourable than Martyrdom. They took the dead Bodies of the Saints up in their open hands, and into their Bosoms ; they clos'd their Eyes, and shut their Mouths ; carried them upon their Shoulders ; and (f) buried them : They stuck close to them ; embraced them ; washed them ; and (g) adorned them curiously in their Cloaths ; not long after they had the like good Offices performed to themselves : For those who survived did continually tread in the steps of such as went before them. But the Gentiles practice was quite contrary to this. They thrust out of doors those which began to be infected ; they fled away from those who were most dear to them ; they deserted them being half-dead in the High-ways ; and cast forth the dead Bodies unburied ; being utterly averse from a Participation and Society [with them] in Death, which yet was in no wise easie for them to avoid, though they used all Arts and Devices to decline it. After this Epistle, when Affairs in Alexandria were in a peaceable and quiet posture, he again sendeth selves, another Paschal Epistle to the Brethren throughout Egypt ; he also writ several other besides this. There is also extant an Epistle of his concerning tion of the Sabbath, and another concerning Excommunication. Again, in an Epistle to Hermammion, and the Brethren in Egypt, he has a long Discourse concerning the Improbability of Decius and his Successors, where he also makes mention of the Peace in the Reign of Gallienus.

and Infection. It is no more than what he said in their words, ὁ νόσος ἐξ' αὐτοῦ ἐλκουμένη, drawing the Infection upon themselves. Valef.

(e) This word εὐφροσύνη we have here rendered Friendship ; yet the word primarily and properly signifies that which the Latines call Comitas, that is, Complaisance, Courtesynesse, Civility, Affability : As in this term ἀντιλογία, which we have translated a Ransom ; we find it in the first Epistle to the Corinth. Chap. 4. v. 13. This word seems to have been used by the Alexandrines in their Salutations : When they met together, and promised their sincere love, willingness and diligence in serving one another, they used to say ἐὰν εἰπὶ ἀντιλογία σὺ ; or else we may take the word in this sense ; as if the Heathens should call the Christians the very Faces Populi, and the Pargamenta Scuti ; which Interpretation is not to be rejected here. Valef.

(f) Χριστόφ. in his Latin Version, renders this word [ἀντιλογία] decussat ornamentis, dressing them up neatly : But he mistakes ; for Dionysius speaks of their Dress afterwards in their words, ἀντιλογίας καπνοσώματα, decking them in their best Cloaths : ἀντιλογία, here we therefore render Companions, (that is) burying them ; and so the word is used in Prophane as well as in Sacred Authors : Compessus pro sepulto, in Virgil, and Horace. Valef.

(g) Πτεσάδαι καπνοσώματα, some render lintheo funebri involuente, spreading them in a winding-sheet. But this is contrary to the custom of Buryings in those Days ; for the Heathens used to dress the Dead in their best Cloaths, and so inter them. And the Christians used in like manner to to dress the Saints Corps : See Chap. 16. of this Seventh Book, concerning Affurius. Valef.

Gallienus.

C H A P. XXIII.

Concerning the Reign of Gallienus.

Nothing hinders but we may hear his own words, which run thus : [(a) Macrianus] therefore, having treacherously betray'd one of the Emperors which preceded him, and made War upon the other, was immediately extirpated, and together with his whole Family became extinct. Gallienus was now proclaim'd, and by common consent receiv'd Emperor. He was both an old Emperor and a new ; for he was before * them, and also surviv'd them : For according to that which was spoken by the Prophet Esaïas, † Behold the former things are come to pass, and new things shall now rise up. For as a Cloud rising up before the Rays of the Sun, overhadowed it for a while, and appears to be substituted into the place thereof : But when the Cloud has gone over it, or is dissolved ; the Sun, which before was risen, seems then to arise again : So Macrianus, who set himself before, and (b) approach'd the very Empire of Gallienne, now is not, for he never was : But Gallienus, as he was Emperor before, so he now continues to be. And the Empire itself, having deposited its old age as it were, and being cleansed from the Dregs of its former Improbability, now flourisheth with greater vividness ; is seen and heard of at a larger distance, and spreads its fame in all places.* He afterwards declares the time when he wrote these things, in these words ; It now again comes into my mind to contemplate the Years of our Emperor : For I see how those most impious Persons who had so great a name, are in a short time become most obscure. But our most Pious and Religious Emperor, having pass'd his seventh, is now in the ninth year of his Empire, in which we are about to solemnize the Festivals.

Concerning Nepos, and his Schism.

Besides, Dionysius wrote two Books concerning the Promises. The occasion of his writing these Books was Nepos, an Egyptian Bishop, who taught that the Promises, which were made to the Saints in the Sacred Scriptures, should be perform'd in the * Jewish fence, and affirmed that there was to come a thousand year's State upon Earth, which should be spent in bodily pleasures. Now he supposing he could confirm his own Opinion out of John's Revelation, wrote a Book upon this Question, and intitled it, A Confutation of the Allegorical Expositors ; which Piece Dionysius confutes in his Books concerning the Promises. In the first Book of which he propoeth his own Opinion concerning the Question. In the second he discourseth concerning the Revelation of John, where in the very beginning he makes mention of this Nepos, and writes thus concerning him : But because they produce a Book of Nepos's, on which they rely very much, as if it did (a) infallibly demonstrate that the Kingdom of Christ should be [set up] [on Earth : Indeed for several other things I commend and love Nepos, for his Faith, his industry and study in the Scriptures, and also for the many (b) Psalms and Hymns he compos'd, with which many of the Brethren are even at this time much delighted. And I reverence the Man for this reason chiefly, because he is (c) dead. But I judge Truth must to be beloved, and to be the most precious of all things. It is our duty to praise, and freely to commend whatever is truly said : But we are also to examine and correct whatever unfound opinion appears to have been committed to writing. Now could he be present, and discuss his Opinion by word of mouth, then a bare discourse by Questions and Answers, without any writing might suffice to convince and reduce the perverse Party to an agreement. But since there is a Book published (and as to some it seems) a most pernicious one ; since some Teachers look upon the Law and the Prophets to be of no value ; neglect to follow the Gospels ; have small esteem for the Epistles of the Apostles ; and

(d) promise great things concerning the Doctrine of this Book, as containing some great and hidden mysteries ; since they will not suffer the more ignorant of our Brethren to think of any thing that is sublime and great, neither of the glorious and truly divine Advent of our Lord, nor of our Resurrection from the Dead ; our gathering together to him, and our being made like him : (e) But persuade 'em to think that Men hope for nothing in the Kingdom of God, but abject and mortal things, such as they now hope for : It is necessary we enter into a dispute against our Brother Nepos, as if he himself were present. After some words he continues saying ; When I was in the Province of the (f) Asiennae (where, as you know, this Opinion was long since propagated so far, that there were Schisms and Revoltings of whole Churches together ;) having convened the Presbyters and Teachers

(a) We have here sufficient evidence that this Book concerning the Promises was written in answer to Nepos. I wonder that Hieronymus in his Preface before the eighteenth Book of his Comments upon Esaïas, should affirm that this Book was written against Irenaeus Bishop of Lions. Indeed Irenaeus was one of them who believed that Christ should come and reign on the Earth 1000 years, which Opinion was grounded on Papias's Authority, as Hieronymus himself affirms, and also our Author Eusebius in the end of the third Book. But as well from this place, as also from Hieronymus himself, in his Book De Script. Ecclesiasticis, we may gather that this Book was not written against Irenaeus, but against Nepos. Valef.

(b) Ψαλμοὶ, we have here translated, the Composition of Psalms and Hymns ; according to the custom of the Christians, who used to compose Psalms and Hymns in honour of Christ, as Eusebius in the end of the fifth Book attelleth. We also find mention of these Hymns in the Epistle of the Council of Antioch against Pant of Samosata, and in the last Canon but one of the Council of Lapidea, where there is an express prohibition, that no Psalms which in Greek are called Ψαλμοὶ, that is, composed by private or ignorant Persons, should be sang in Churches. Teachers of the Brethren in every particular Village, (such Brethren also as had a mind to come being present,) I advised them that there might be Researches made into this Doctrine, in the presence of a publick Assembly. And when they produced this Book as a defence, and an impregnable Bulwark, fitting with them three whole Days together from Morning till Evening, I endeavour'd to discuss the Contents thereof. In all which time I did extraordinarily admire the Constancy of the Brethren, their

Concerning the Revelation of John.

HAVING interposed some words, he afterwards says thus concerning the Revelation of John: Indeed some of our Ancestors disown'd, and wholly rejected this Book; confusing every Chapter, and demonstrating it to be an unknown and senseless Work, and that the Title is forged; for they say it is not John's: Neither is it a Revelation, because it is covered over with so thick and dark a Veil of Ignorance; And that not only no Apostle, but also no Holy or Ecclesiastick Person, could have been the Compiler of this Work: But that it was * Cerinthus, the Founder of the Heresie, called from him the Cerinthian Heresie, who was desirous to have a creditable name prefix'd before his Forgery: Gallienus. For this, they say, was Cerinthus's Opinion and Doctrine; that Christ's Kingdom should be terrestrial: And whatsoever he, being a carnal and voluptuous Man, most lusted after, in these he dream'd the Kingdom of Christ consisted; as in indulging the Belly, and the Parts beneath the Belly; I mean, in eating, drinking, and marrying; and also in Festivals, Sacrifices, and killing of Victims, by which these might with more specious pretences be acquired. I dare not indeed reject this Book, since many of the Brethren have it in great esteem. But this is the Opinion I have of it, I think the Sense or Subject thereof surpasseth my apprehension, and that there is a mysterious and admirable meaning covertly contain'd in every part of it; for though I do not understand it, yet I suppose there is a more profound meaning comprehended in the words. I do not judge of, nor fathom these things by the Line of my own Reason; but attributing much more to Faith, I esteem them more sublime than to be comprehended by me. I do not condemn those things I could not understand, but I rather admire them because I cannot see through them." After these words, having carefully look'd into the whole Book of the Revelation, and demonstrat'd that it was impossible to be understood according to the obvious sense of the words, he goes on, saying, "But having finish'd his Prophecy, (as I may call it,) the Prophet pronounceth blessing upon all them who keep it, and moreover on himself too; for he saith, * Blessed is he that keepeth the words * Revel. of the Prophecy of this Book: And I am John c. 22. v. 7, 8. of which saw and heard these things. I do not indeed deny that his name was John, and that this was John's Book: [For I grant that it was written by some Holy and Divinely inspired Person:] But I cannot easily be brought to give my consent that this was John the Apostle, the Son of Zebedee, the Brother of James, the Author of the Gospel according to John, and of the Catholick Epistle. For I conjecture by the Genius and Nature of them both, by the form of the Style, and the Method and (a) Disposition

(a) Διευκρίσις is a term proper to the Rhetoricians, as plainly appears by the following word εὐκρίσις: I think that διευκρίσις has the same import with Dispositio, or dispositio; for διευκρίσις, in Suidas is the same as dispositio, to dispose, or handle. Or we may render it the form and manner of writing: For he proves the Revelation not to be John's the Apostle, by the εὐκρίσις, the Genius, or Nature of the Writer: Then by the Style and Manner of writing, that is, by the ῥησις and the ῥησις. § We ought to take special notice of this Passage concerning the Primitive Christians custom of calling their Children, by the names of Peter and Paul, which they did both for the reverence and love they bare to thole Saints, and also that their Children might be beloved and no less dear in the sight of God than thole Saints were. Chrysostom in his Oration concerning St. Asterius faith, that the Asterius had such a reverence and esteem for him, that the Parents called their Children after his name, that they might have their Houses in a manner adorned with his presence. The same Father also in his 21 Homily upon Genesis, adviseth his Auditors that they should not carelessly call their Children by their Grandfather's or Great-Grandfathers, or some noble Heroes names, but that they should rather give them the names of some Men who were famous for Virtue and Piety; that the Children, by their Example, might be excited to an imitation of them. Valer.

Divine Revelation. * That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes. For upon account of this kind of Revelation the Lord hath pronounced Peter blessed in these words, † Blessed art thou Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. But neither before the second, nor third Epistle of John which are extant, although they are very short, is John's name exprelly prefix'd; but he is namelessly intituled, the Elder. But the other [John] thought it not enough to name himself once and fo to proceed in his relation, but he again repeateh his name. * I John, even your brother and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus, was in the Isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ. And at the close of this Book he faith; † Blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book. And I John saw these things and heard them. Therefore that it was John who wrote these things, we ought to believe, because he affirms it. But what John it was 'tis uncertain; for he has not said that he himself was that John, who in several places of the Gospel is called the beloved disciple of the Lord; or that he was he who lay in the Bosom of the Lord; or that he was the Brother of James; or that he was the person who with his own Eyes and Ears saw and heard the Lord. For certainly he would have mentioned some of these fore-mentioned [Descriptions,] if he were desirous to have made himself apparently known. But he has recorded none of these Passages in his Writings, but styles himself our Brother and Companion and Witness of Jesus, and calls himself Blessed, because he saw and heard these Revelations. I suppose there were many of the same name with John the Apostle, who thro' their love to, admiration and zealous emulation of him, and because they were desirous to be beloved of the Lord as he was, had a great love for his name:

(b) As we see many Children of the Faithful called by the name of Paul and Peter. Moreover there is another John mention'd in the Acts of the Apostles, surnam'd * Mark, whom Barnabas and Paul took to be their Companion. Concerning whom it is again said, * They bad John to be their Minister. Whether it were he that was the Author of this Revelation or not, I dare not affirm. For 'tis no-where written that he came with them into Asia, but 'tis said that when Paul and his Company loosed from Paphos, they came to Parga in Pamphilia: and John departing from them, returned to Jerusalem. † Therefore I think it was some other John, one of them who lived in Asia.

For 'tis said there are two Tombs at Ephesus, and both called by the name of John's Tomb.

(c) Also from the Sentences, the Words, and were not written by one and the same John; for he had urged his first Argument begun at Note (a) to this place: Now here he begins a second, (viz.) to prove by the Words and Sentences, and by the placing of the Words or method, that they were two distinct persons: For I render this word ἀνίστατο, the placing or ordering of words, according to Cicero; though ἀνίστατο in this place may as well comprehend the ordering and modelling of sentences, as of words. But here we may take notice what an excellent Critick Dionysius Alexandrinus was. For it is the property of a Critick to judge of the Writings of the Ancients, and to discern what is true and genuine, and what spurious and supposititious. Valer.

the disposition or placing of them, this John who wrote the Revelation, may with good reason be suspected to be a distinct person from the other John; for there is a mutual agreement betwixt the Gospel and the Epistle, and they both begin alike. The Gospel begins thus; In the beginning was the Word. The Epistle thus; That which was from the beginning. The Gospel says; And the Word was made flesh and dwelt amongst us; And we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten Son of the Father. The Epistle says the same with a very little variation: That which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life; for the life was manifested. For these are his Preludiums, directing his words (as in the following Passages he has declared) against those who denied that Christ came in the Flesh: Wherefore on that purpose he subjoyneth this, And what we have seen we bear witness to, and shew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us. That which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you. He is constant to himself, and does not in the least wander from his subject proposed, but in the same

(d) Periods and Words he does prosecute all Points, some of which expressions we will briefly recount. He who does carefully read them, will both in his Gospel and Epistle, very frequently meet with life; very often with light, an avoiding of darkness; very frequently with truth, grace, joy, the flesh and blood of our Lord, judgment, forgiveness of sins, the love of God towards us, the commandment of mutual love one towards another, and that we ought to keep all the Commandments. There is also contained in them

(e) the condemnation of the World, of the Devil, and of Antichrist; the promise of the Holy Ghost; the Adoption of the sons of God; a faith universally required of us; mention of the Father and the Son in every place. In sum, they who note the Phrase in all things thoroughly, may easily discern, that the Genius and Style, both in the Gospel and the Epistle, appears to be one and the same. But the Revelation is altogether different from, and unlike to these; it has no allance to, nor (as I may so say) familiarity with either of these: Nor has the Revelation so much as one syllable in it which is common to these: Neither does the Epistle (for I omit the Gospel) make the least mention of the Revelation; nor the Revelation of the Epistle: And yet Paul in his Epistles mentions something concerning his Revelations, which he did not digest into a Volume by themselves. Furthermore by the Phrase, the difference betwixt the Epistle and Gospel and the Revelation, may be easily conjectured: For those are not only written most correctedly

(d) ἀνίστατο in this place signifies Periods or Sentences, by which an entire sense is concluded. Chrysostom also they may be called, the Greeks also call them συντάξεις, the Latines Capitula. Valer.

(e) ἐν παντι & πανταχού, made I think he rendered here rather the condemnation of the World, than the revealing of the World. In the old Oracles we find πανταχού to signify judgment. Valer.

(f) This is Dionysius's second Argument; by which he proves that the Gospel and Revelation

For [the Evangelist] ('tis apparent) had (f) both Faculties; the Lord had endow'd him with both, that is, the gift of knowledge, and the gift of speaking. As touching this other John I do not indeed deny that he saw the Revelation, and that he received the [gift of] knowledge and of prophecy. But I take notice that his Dialect and Style is not pure Greek, but he makes use of some barbarous words, yea and in some places he has Solæcisms, which it is not now necessary to give a Catalogue of. For I would have no one suppose that I have said these things in a way of derision; but only on this account, that I might explain the Dissimilitude of these Books.

Concerning Dionysius's Epistles.

(a) Hence we may gather that the two Books concerning the Promiser, out of which Rufinus has the fragment afore-quoted, were by the same author. We may confirm this by a passage in Chap. 12, where Petrus and Paulus are mentioned, which is an Epistola Petri ad Paulum. But be-

Here are extant many more of Dionysius's Epistles (a) besides these. As for example, his Epistles to Ammann Bishop of Berenice against Sabellius; and an Epistle to Telephorus; also one to Empranzor; and again, another to Ammann and Euporus. He also wrote (b) four more Books upon the same Subject, and dedicated them to his Namesake Dionysius Bishop of Rome. There are also more of his Epistles besides these extant amongst us: And moreover some Books of his, which are something verbose and prolix, and are written in an Epistolary form: As for example, his Books concerning (c) Nature, which are dedicated to Timotheus a Child, concerning Tentations, which he dedicated to Empranzor: Besides these Books, in his Epistle to Euphides Bishop of Amphipolis, he says he wrote a Comment upon the beginning of Ecclesiastes. He has also left us several Epistles which he wrote to this (d) Basilides. Thus many are Dionysius's Works. But now after an Historical Relation of those things, we will deliver to the knowledge of Posterity an Account of our own Age.

As Alexand. in his Epistles against Sabellius seemed not to touch, as touching the Divinity of Christ, and he was accused of Monis Bishop of Rome, by some of the Bishops of Pentapolis, at Rome, Dionysius Roman called a Synod, heard the Accusing examined some false Opinions in Dionys. Epistles, Dionys. Alexand. desiring him that he would more distinctly Enrich and Opinion concerning those matters. Upon this Alexand. wrote four Epistles to Dionys. Roman, which he ἐπιστὰς εἰς πεντάπολιν, (that is,) concerning the confutation of

Dionysius, Namefakē to Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria, succeeds Xystus, after he had presided over the Church of Rome (a) eleven years. About the same time also died Demetrius Bishop of Antioch, whom Paul of Samosata succeeded in his Bishoprick. This Paul had an abject and low Opinion of Christ, contrary to the Doctrine of the Church, as if he had been by nature of no more than a meer Man; Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria was increased to come to the Synod: He having complained of his Age, and also of his Infirmary of Body deferr'd his coming: But he openly declared by Letter what his fence Months, and opinion concerning the matter in debate. But the rest of the Pastors of the Churches from all Parts hastned to Antioch, and were convened there, as against the Corrupter of Christ's Flock. But

(a) Here Eusebius is in a gross mistake, for Xystus was not Bishop of Rome only 2 Years, but only 2 Years and Eleven Months, as we may see in the Book De Pontifici, ubi dicitur, Gelasianus first published, and that Book is most exact in its account of the times of the Popes, from Callistus to Liberius: The same also says Xystus suffered Martyrdom on the eighth of the Ides of August: But our Author neither here, in his Epistle, nor in his Chronicle mentions any thing of Xystus's Martyrdom, which I really admire, and should more admire, did not I certainly know that Eusebius is not over-jollicitous and curious in his History concerning what things were done in the Western parts. Moreover Eusebius in his Chronicle asserts Eight Years to Xystus, and he says that Dionysius succeeded Xystus in the 12th Year of Gelasius, and that Maximus succeeded Dionysius Alexandrin, in the 11th Year of the Good Gaius the Emperor. Which is most absurd, whenas 'tis evident that Dionysius Alexandr. dedicated his four Books against Sabellius to Dionysius Roman, as our Author tells us in Chap. 26. of this 7th Book. Vale.

THE most Eminent of these assembled were Firmilianus Bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia; Gregory and Athenodorus both Brethren, Bishops of the Churches of Pontus; Besides these there were Helenus Bishop of Tarfus, and (a) Nicomachus-Bishop of Iconium: Also Hymeneus Bishop of Jerusalem, and Theoctenus Bishop of Caesarea upon the Confines of Jerusalem: Besides these, Maximus, who with great commendation governed the Brethren of Bosphorus. And a great many more may be reckon'd: who, together with Presbyters and Deacons, were convened in the aforesaid City at the time aforesaid, and upon the same account. But these were the most eminent of them. All these therefore being assembled in the same place together; (b) divers times and often, Disputations and Questions were rais'd in every Synod. On the one side Paul of Samosata endeavour'd to conceal and hide his Heretodox Opinions; on the other, these Persons striving with all diligence to denudeate and make apparent his Heresie and Blasphemy against Christ. In the which subscribed to the Council of Nice, Nicomachus Bishop of Bosphorus was named the first, the Bishops of the Province of Arabia: But the common MSS. read Nicomachus, and so we find it in the MS. of C. Justinian, which is of the 16th century.

(b) We here translate it, divers times, though some Greek Copies read only  $\alpha\gamma\ \tau\alpha\upsilon\tau\alpha\ \delta\iota\alpha\tau\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\sigma\theta\epsilon\varsigma$ . But all our MSS. read  $\alpha\gamma\ \tau\alpha\upsilon\tau\alpha\ \delta\iota\alpha\tau\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\sigma\theta\epsilon\varsigma$ . There were several Synods called against this Paul of Samosata. Hence follows the word [ $\mu\epsilon\lambda\lambda\acute{o}\tau\epsilon\varsigma$ ] which we must in no wise suppose to be superfluous here. Eusebius lays, There were many Synods assembled at several times, and in every Synod there were many Seignors or Bishops. The first Synod against Paul was at Antioch in the Seventh year of Gallienus; of which Synod Firmilianus was President: Concerning which see Bede histor. Anno Christi 265, and 266. Valef.

C H A P. XXIX.

How Paul being confuted by Malchion a Presbyter, (who formerly had been one of the † Sophistas) was deposed.

(a) IN this Emperor's time was the last Synod convened, which consisted of a very great number of Bishops: The Author of that Heresie at Antioch being now convicted, and by all manifestly condemned of false Doctrine, was Excommunicated out of the Catholick Church, which is under Heaven. But one (b) Malchion most especially confuted and convinced him, being desirous to keep himself concealed: He was a most eloquent Man, and Master of the Grecian Philosophy-School at Antioch. And moreover, for his surpassing sincerity in the Faith of Christ, he was honour'd with a Presbytership of the Church there. Now this Man having undertaken to dispute against Paul, (the Notaries having written down all the Passages of that Disputation, which is at this day extant) was the only person that was able to detect and convince that crafty and deceitful Fellow.

The Council of Ephesus, in pag. 228. utterly destroys this Opinion of Baronius: For it says that Paul of Samosata was excommunicated 160 years before that time; and if we reckon backwards we shall find, that the year of Claudius and Paterius's Consulship, that is, the year of Christ 270. is the 160 year backwards from the time that Book was written, which was Theodosius 13th, and Valentinianus 3d being Consuls. Moreover, if Baronius reckon those things done in the 2d year of Aurelianus, he must necessarily make Dionysius to continue Bishop of Rome till that Year; but that is contrary to the Authority of the Lib. Pontifical. Farther, in the second year of Aurelianus's his Reign, there was a War waged against Zenobia, when Antioch and other Cities were taken, so that it is impossible there should be a Synod of Bishops that year there. Valef.

† Leontius in his first Book against Nestorius, has a Fragment of this Disputation. In Theodoret, this Malchion is called Malchion; but truly, 'This Man gained such Honour in this Constitution of Paul, that he was thought worthy to be Canoniz'd in the Grec Ecclesiology, at the 5th day of October. ## C H A P. XXX.

THE Prelates therefore, being assembled together, by common consent writ an Epistle to Dionysius Bishop of Rome, and Maximus Bishop of Alexandria: And then sent it over all the Provinces; both manifesting their diligence to all Men; the perverse Heterodoxy of Paul, the Confutations and Disputes which were held against them; and also giving in a Narration of the whole Life and Morals of the Man, whose words in which Epistle, that Posterity may remember them, it will be convenient here to relate.

THE EPISTLE.

To Dionysius and Maximus, and to all our Fellow-Ministers over the whole World, Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons; and to the whole Catholick Aerolis-Church under Heaven; Helenus, Hymenaeus, Theophilus, Theotecnus, Maximus, Proculus, Nicomachus, (a) Eliaianus, Paul, Bolanus, Protegeus, (b) Hierax, Eurychius, Theodoros, Malchion, and Ant. Fek. Lucius; and all the rest of the Bishops of the neighbour-At. d. ring Cities and Provinces which are with us, the Syn. MSS.

(b) Presbyters and Deacons, and the Churches of God, thus write To the beloved Brethren in the Lord, health. After some words interposed, they add these following. We have written to, and intreated many of the Bishops far remote, that they would come and assist in the Curing of this Pestiferous Doctrine: For we wrote to Dionysius Bishop of Alexandria, and to Firmilianus Bishop of Cappadocia, Men of blessed Memory. The first of them wrote to Antioch, but did not so much as vouchsafe the Author of the Heresie a Salutation; (c) neither did he write to him by name, but to the whole Church: A Copy of which Letter we have here inserted. The other, Firmilianus came twice, and command'd Paul's Novelties, as we who were then present do attest, and many others do also know as well as we. But when he promised to recant, Firmilianus believing him, and hoping that the business might be composed (d) without any reproach to our Religion, deferred his Sentence; being deceived by him who denied his God and Lord, and who kept not the Faith which he formerly profess'd. But Firmilianus was now about coming to Antioch: And he came as far as Tarsus; for he had had experience of his malicious wickedness who denied his God. But in the interim of our assembling, and whilst we were sending for him, and expecting his coming, he died. After some other Passages they describe his Morals, and what course of Life he led, in these words: But since he turn'd to forged and seditious Opinions, departing from the (e) true Rule, it is not our concern to examine the Actions of one who is out of the Church: Neither how he, who was formerly poor and indigent, (having had no Estate from his Parents, Faith nor got any thing by any Trade or Profession) is now become, incredibly rich, by his unlawful and sacrilegious dealings, (f) by extortion, and vexatiousness used towards the Brethren, and by (g) taking Bribes from our

but in some printed Editions, his advocates, Antiochians, Allo- Rufinus, and Nicophorus call him Euse- lianus. Athenagoras says there were Seventy Fathers in this Synod, who divelled Paul of Samosata. Valef.

(b) We ought to take notice of the inscription of this Epistle: For we had here not the Names of Bishops only, but also of Presbyters, and Deacons, and of the Laity also. The time we may see in the Acts of the Council of Carthage, in which Cyprian was President, and in the Council of Eltherin. Valef.

(c) Hence we may gather, the Epistle of Dionysius, Alexand. to Paul of Samosata, which is inserted in the 11th Volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, is a supposititious, together with the ten Trigacons of Paul, and Dionysius's Answers to them. For the Fathers of the Council of Antioch do here affirm, that Dionysius did not write to Paul, but to the whole Church of Antioch. In that Epistle which goes under the name of Dionysius, we find that he wrote to Paul twice. But the title of the Epistle and Answer is not at all like Dionysius's Works. So that I am fully persuaded, although Baronius takes that Work to be true and Genuine, it is false, and adulterate. Valef.

Aurelianus those that were injured, promising to help them to their Right, for a Reward; but he deceived them too, (b) getting Money for doing nothing through their willingness, who were entangled in Suits, to give any thing for a delivery from those Troubles: He (i) supposed godliness to be gain. Neither need we declare how proud and insolent he was, being invested with secular Dignities; and desiring to be styled a (k) Ducenarius, rather than a Bishop: And how he walked in state through the * Forum, reading and dictating Letters as he walked in publick, with a numerous Guard about him, some going before and some following him.

In so much that there was an ill Opinion and an Oidium brought upon the Faith through his Pride and Haughtiness. Neither [does it concern us to examine] his vain-glorious Ambition in the Ecclesiastick Conventions, which he greedily pursues, being desirous of Glory, and affected with an imaginary Pomp: With such Devices as these terrifying the Minds of the Faithful and Ignorant. Besides, he erected for himself a (l) Tribunal, and a lofty Throne, not like one of Christ's Disciples, but had a place called his (m) Secretum, like as the secular Magistrates have. He also used to clap his Hand upon his Thighs, and stamp'd upon the Throne with his Feet.

And such as did not commend him, and shake their (n) Orraria, as they usually did in the Theaters, and did not make loud Exclamations, nor leap up and down in the same manner as his Favourites (which were a company of silly Men and Women that during their hearkening to him used such Indecencies) did; but were attentive to him with such a seemly reverence and decency as befits the House of God: Those Persons he rebuked and reproach'd. In his publick Discourses he reflected upon those Doctors of our Religion that were dead, with all imaginable scorn and contumely; but he magnified himself not as became a Bishop, but rather like a Counterfeit, and an Impostor. He abolished the Psalms, which were usually sung in honour of our Lord Jesus Christ, as novel, and the Compositors of modern Men. On the great Feast of Easter, he appointed Women to sing Psalms in his commendation in the Body of the Church, which whosoever heard might justly tremble at: He also privately sent the (o) Bishops of the neighbouring Villages and Towns, and the Presbyters who were his Flatterers to make Discourses to the People in commendation of him. For he will not Aurelianus join in a Confession with us, that the Son of God came down from Heaven, that we may now premise some things of what we shall hereafter more at large declare in writing: Neither shall this be affirmed on our bare words, but it is evident in many places up and down his (p) Acts which we have sent you: And most especially there where he says that Jesus Christ is of the * Earth: But those who chaunt out his Praises, and sing his Encomiums amongst the People, do say, that this their impious Master is an Angel come down from Heaven: Nor does that haughty Prelow prohibit these Expressions, but is himself present when they are spoken. What need we here mention his and his Presbyters and Deacons (q) introduced Women (as the Antiochians term them?) (r) Those in whom he conceals not only this, but many other damnable Crimes, (which he is conscious of, and of which he has been convicted they are guilty) that by this means he may keep them so obnoxious, as not to adventure, through a fear of their own guilt, to accuse him for his impious words and practices. Moreover, he has enriched them. And this is the reason he is beloved and admired by them who cover such things. But why do we write these things? We know (Beloved) that it is the duty of a Bishop, and of the whole Clergy, to be Examples of good Works to the People: Neither are we ignorant, that by introducing Women into their Society, some have wholly fell away from Goodness, and others have been suspected. Although therefore it be granted he committed nothing that was unchaste, yet the very suspicion which arises from such a thing, ought carefully to be avoided, lest it should be offensive to any one, and induce others to imitate it: For how can be reprove, or admonish another not to frequent the company of Women, and to take heed lest he fall, (as it is written,) who has now indeed sent away one, but keeps two that are young and beautiful with him? And where-ever he goes, he carries them along with him; and therefore indulges, and (r) fluffs himself with Delicacies. These are the Reasons that all People sigh and lament privately: But they so dread his Tyranny, and Authority, that they dare not accuse him; now, (as we have before said) any would call a Man, who professes the Catholick Doctrine, and is reckoned of our Communion, to an account for these things. But from one, who has abjured the Mystery [of our Religion,] and has boasted in that cursed Heresie of Artemas, (for why may we not manifest to you his Father: ) We judge it needful to require an account of these things. Afterwards in the Close of the Epistle they adjoin these words. Having therefore excommunicated this contumacious Enemy of God; we were necessitated to Ordain another Bishop in his stead over the Catholick Church, (as we are persuaded, not without the Providence of God) [to wit,] Domnus (the Son of Demetrianus of blessed Memory, who before him was the Eminent Governor of that See) a Man adorned with all Accomplishments requisite to a Bishop. Which we have therefore signified to you, that you may write to him. (p) Τὸν Ἰωάννην are here Gellio, or Albia, Publick Acts; such are commonly Registered; but some fully translate them Commemorative. Aurelius to him, and receive from him (f) Communicatory Letters: But as for this [Paul] let him write to Artemas, if he pleases, and let the followers of Artemas, hold Communion with him.

The Latines call them, Literæ communicatoriæ, communicatory Letters; these wherof is very ancient in the Church. They were also called formatæ, as Augustine, in Epist. 163. attests. There were two sorts of these Letters. One sort was given to the Clergy and Laity that were going to travel, that they might be admitted to Communion by foreign Bishops. Another sort were those, which Bishops sent to other Bishops, and received from them mutually, to attest and declare their mutual Communion: Concerning this latter sort the Synod speaks here. They were usually sent by the new Bishops a little after their Ordination. See August. 162 Epist. and Cyprian's Letter to Cornelius, p. 92. Valef.

(g) And let these things be here by us inserted.

Paul therefore having been deposed of his Bishoprick, and being also fallen from the Orthodox Faith, Domnus (as is aforesaid) succeeded in the Government of the Church of Antioch: But

(u) Paul being by no means willing to quit the Possession of the * Church; an Address was made to Aurelianus the Emperor, who most justly determined concerning this business; giving command that the Palace should be resign'd, to whom the Bishops of the Christian Religion in Italy and Rome should assign it by their Letters. Thus therefore the aforesaid Paul, was with the greatest disgrace thrust out of the Church by the imperial Power. Thus indeed was Aurelian affected towards us at that time; but in the following part of his Empire, his Mind towards us being alter'd, he was induced by the advice of some Men to raise a Persecution against us. Much discourse there was every-where concerning it: But the Divine Vengeance assaulted him, (being now ready, and, as I may say, almost subscribing the Edicts against us, [repressing] his design, and binding him (as it were) by the Arms; making it evidently apparent to all Men that the secularity of the Princes of this World [to persecute us] can never prevail against the Churches of Christ, unless the invincible Hand of God in his Divine and Celestial Judgment, permits it to be done for our chastisement and amendment, at those times in which he judgeth it most seasonable. Moreover, Probus succeeds Aurelian, having reigned six years. And after he had held the Empire the like number of years, Carnus together with his Sons, Carinus and Numerianus, succeeded him. Again, these having not lived three full years, the Empire falls to Dioclesian and those who were adopted with him. In whose

the Creed which was composed by the Fathers of the Council of Nice, but by them of the Nicean Council. For the more certain demonstration of this, See the 3d Tome of the Acts of the Council of Ephesus, pag. 273; where this Creed, which Baronius mentions as composed by the Fathers of this Council of Antioch, is expressly assign'd to the Fathers of the Council of Nice. Wherefore that Creed which Baronius, and Baronius, following his example, have placed in the Acts of this Council of Antioch, must be razed out. There is also extant an Epistle of the Bisshops of Antioch to Paul of Samosata in the 11th Tome of the Bisshops of Antioch, which Epistle was written about the beginning of the Session of this 2d Synod; but Baronius ascribes that Epistle to the 1st Synod, which cannot possibly be, because of the title, and the Person mentioned in it, and other Circumstances. Valef.

(a) After the Sentence of being deposed was passed against Paul, he kept his Church for some years; and would not obey the decree of the Bishops; relying on the power of Zenobia an Eastern Queen. Theodoret says, in his 2d Book Hæretic. Fabul. that Paul did flatter her, and used all means possible to get her favour. When Zenobia was conquered, the Christian Prelates petition'd Aurelianus, that this Paul, who had conspired with Zenobia against the Romans, might be removed from the See of Antioch, which was done in the third year of Aurelian.

(b) The ἑκκλησία δομνῆ the import of which words, being literally rendered, the House of the Church: Perhaps they mean the Bishop's Palace; a little after they call it δομὸν δομνῆ; which we have rendered the Palace. Valef. renders the first Phrase Ecclesie Domus, and the se-times the Persecution against us was accomplish'd, and at the same time with it was the demolishing of the Churches: But a little before this died Dionysius, after he had govern'd the See of Rome nine years, and Felix succeeded him.

C H A P. XXXI.

Concerning the Heterodox and Corrupt Opinion of the Manichees, which sprang up at this time.

AT the same time that Mad-man, (truly called Dioclesian) led (a) Manes who gave denomination to that furious Heretic, was arm'd with madness; but, as we Satan himself that Adversary of God, having produced him for the destruction of many Men. This derives person was barbarous in his whole course of life, the name in his very Discourse and Manners, he was as to his Disposition devilish and mad: He undertook from the what was agreeable hereto, and attempted to feign Greek himself to be Christ. Sometimes he declared himself word παρὰ, to be the * Paraclete, and the very Holy Spirit, being also, besides his Madness, put up with Pride: The Lear- At other times, as if he were Christ, he elected new Bishop twelve Disciples to be Colleagues of his, and new form'd Opinion. Moreover, when he had patch'd up a Collection of false and atheistical Opinions, Manes to gather'd out of various Heresies which were long he a Title since extinct, he pour'd them, like some deadly Poison, out of Persia into (b) our Country. Hence came that impious name of the (c) Manichees, which at this time abounds in many places: Such therefore was the Original of this (d) forged Doctrine which sprang up in the times before mention'd.

tick: See his Reasons for this derivation, in his marginal Notes at p. 64. of his Exposition on the Creed; Edit. Lond. 1663.

* See the Note on Chap. 14. B. 6.

(b) The Phrase in the original is ἐν τῇ πατρίδι ἡμεῖς ἀνευρέθημεν; which Valef. renders in Orbem Romanum, into the Roman Empire.

(c) Manes was not the first Author of this Heretic, though his followers were from him called Manicheans. Indeed Manes disseminated this Heretic in the days of Aurelianus, or Probus the Emperor: But he had a Predecessor, though not a Matter, called first Terebinthus, afterwards Buddas: Which Buddas had a former Master, by name Syrianius, who was the first Author of this Heretic, and lived about the Apostolical times. See the Pedigree of this Heretic drawn at large by Epiphanius, Advers. Manicheos; pag. 176, &c. Edit. Petav.

C H A P. XXXII.

Concerning those Ecclesiastick Men who were famous even in our Age, and which of them lived till the demolishing of the Churches.

AT this time Eusebius succeeded Felix, who had been Bishop of the Church of Rome five years. And (a) he, having not lived not full ten (a) This months, leaves the dignity to Crispin, who lived in Eusebius our Age: When he had prelied there about fifteen years, Marcellinus was ordain'd his Successor; Rome 8 whom the Persecution overtook: At this time years and Timæus succeeded Domnus in the Government of the Church of Antioch: After him Cyril succeeded as is evident in our memory. In his time we knew one (b) Dorotheus, who then had the dignity of Pref-which the years of all the Popes from Callistus are very well digested by the Consuls, under whom they began their Presidencies, and under whom they died. Eusebius here takes away 8 years from Eusebius, and ascribeth them to Justin. See Chap. 27. Note (a). Valef.

(b) This Dorotheus Presbyter of Antioch, Baronius (in his Notes on the Roman Martyrology) takes to be the same with that Dorotheus, who was a Presbyter of Tyre: But this is a Mistake in him; which Error Blondellus undertakes to correct; but in the interim committeth one Error more. For he confoundeth this Dorotheus Presbyter of Antioch, with those only to whom the Senate had given licence; but a great many others under pretence hereof) should make their escape secretly; who being disguised in Women's habit, went in the night out of the Gates by his procurement, and fled to the Roman Army; where Eusebius, receiving them all, like a Father and Physician, refreshed them, who had been afflicted with a (i) tedious Siege, with all imaginable care, and methods of cure. The Church of Laodicea was honoured with two such Pastors as these by the Divine Providence, one succeeding the other, [for] after the War of the Jews afore said was ended, they both removed from Alexandria into [Syria.] Indeed Anatolius did not write many Books: But so many [Works of his] came to our hands, that from them we may perceive both his Eloquence and his great Learning; especially from those [Canons] of his in which he gives us his Opinion concerning Easter: Out of which it may be requisite to make mention of these words in this place.

(k) Excerptions out of Anatolius's Canons concerning Easter.

(l) These Words ought to be separated from the Text of Eusebius, as we have here done in the Translation. For they are a Title as it were, which notheth that the Fragment following is out of another Author. Valf.

(m) Eusebius says that this Siege of the Church of Laodicea lasted several years. Valf.

(n) You have therefore in the first year New-moon of the first month, (which is the beginning of the Circle of nineteen years;) according to the Egyptian account on the 26 day of the month Phamenoth; but according to the Macedonian Computation of months, on the 22 day of the month Dysperis; and as the Romans phrase it, before the 11 of the Calends of April: On the afore said 26 day of the month Phamenoth, the Sun is found not only to have entered the first Segment [of the Zodiac], but is then going the fourth day in it: They usually call this Segment, the first Dodecatemoria, the Æquinox, the beginning of months, the head of the Cycle, and the (n) original of the course of the Planets. The Segment next before this they commonly call the end of the month, and the twelfth segment, the last Dodecatemoria, and the term of the circuit of the Planets. Wherefore we affirm that they who place the first month in this Segment, and take the 14 day (n) from it to be the Feast of Easter, are, as it happens, in no small mistake. Neither is this our Opinion, but it was known to the ancient Jews even before Christ's [coming;] and it was also in an especial manner observ'd by them; which may be understood from the words of Philo, Josephus, and Miscellus. And not from the words of these persons only, but from them who were ancienter than they; to wit, from the two (o) Agathobolus's, who were first named the Masters: And also from the (p) Famous Arifobolus, who was one of the seventy, that at the request of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus and his Father, translated the Sacred and Divine Scriptures of the Hebrews, and dedicated his Expositions on Moses's Law to the same Kings. These Authors in their Solutions of the Questions upon Exodus, say that all ought to sacrifice the Passover together after the vernal Æquinox, in the middle of the first month. Now this happens when the Sun goes through the first part of the Solar Circle, or (as some of them term it) the Zodiac: But Arifobolus addeth, that not only the Sun, but the Moon also must of necessity pass through the Æquinoctial Segment on the Feast of the Passover: For whereas there are two Æquinoctial Segments, the one called the Vernal, the other the Autumnal; and they diametrically opposite the one to the other; and whereas the Feast of the Passover is granted to be on the 14 day at evening, the Moon shall be diametrically opposite to the Sun, as we may see it is in full Moons. Wherefore the Sun will be in the vernal Æquinoctial Segment; and the Moon will necessarily be in the Autumnal Æquinoctial Segment. I know they have said a great deal more; (part whereof is probable, and part concluded from most certain Demonstrations;) by which they endeavour to make it evident, that the Feast of the Passover, and that of Unleavened Bread must always be celebrated after the Æquinox. But I omit the requiring such abundance of Demonstrations from them, off whom the Veil of the Mosaic Law is taken: And by whom (the face being now uncover'd) may be seen as in a Glass for the future, both Christ himself, Christ's Doctrines, and his Sufferings. Now, that the first month amongst the Hebrews does begin about the Æquinox, the Precepts in the (q) Book of Exodus are a sufficient evidence.

The same Anatolius has left us Institutions of Arithmetic in ten entire Books, as also several other evidences of his diligence about, and great experience in, the Holy Scriptures: Theodosius Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine first Ordain'd him Bishop by Imposition of Hands, providing him to be his Successor in his own Church. And indeed for some small time they both (r) preferred over that Church together. But the Synod against Paul being convened at Antioch, amongst the Apocryphal Books, and the ancient Fathers in imitation of them, have not been afraid to quote Apocryphal Books which seemed to confirm the truth. Gregorius Synes in his Chronicle, quotes an excellent Fragment out of this Book of Enoch's. Valf.

(r) We have the like Example in Chap. 11. Book 6. Where Alexander ruled the Church of Jerusalem jointly with Narcissus. These two are the most ancient Instances of Assistant Bishops (as they are now called.) These sort of Assistants were first instituted for the ease of Aged Bishops; but afterwards they grew customary; and were chosen not out of necessity, but ambition and pride: But the Fathers of the Council of Sardis put a stop hereto. Valf.

named the Masters: And also from the (p) Famous Arifobolus, who was one of the seventy, that at the request of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus and his Father, translated the Sacred and Divine Scriptures of the Hebrews, and dedicated his Expositions on Moses's Law to the same Kings. Diocletian (f) he going through the City of Laodicea [towards that Synod] was there detained by the Brethren, Eusebius being then dead: After the death of Anatolius, Stephen is ordained Bishop of the last before the Persecution, being admired by many for his Eloquence, Philosophy, and his other Grecian Learning: But he was not (t) so well affected towards the true Faith [of Christ,] as the time of the following Persecution afterwards demonstrated; which manifestly declared him to be a dissembler, fearful and cowardous, rather than a true Philosopher. But after this the affairs of that Church did not forthwith run to decay; for Theodotus (u) ordained Bishop of that Church by God himself the preserver of all things, immediately restored all things to their former splendour. He was a person who in deeds verified his true name, and made a true representation of the Episcopal Office; he was of all men the most eminent for his skill in Physick and in curing of the Body. And there was no Man his equal for healing of Souls; for Humanity, sincerity of Mind, Commendation, and Diligence in helping those who wanted his assistance: He was also incomparably well exercised in divine Learning. Such a person was this Theodotus, Agapius succeeded Theodotus, who had governed the Bishoprick of Cæsarea in Palestine with great care. Who, we know, was very laborious, and most sincerely solicitous for the good of the People over whom he presided; and with a liberal hand relieved all, most especially the Indigent: In this Man's times we knew Pamphilus (a most Eloquent Man, and a true Philosopher in the Practices of his Life) honoured with a Presbytership of that Church. To declare what a Person this Man was, and whence defended, would be a copious Subject. But all things relating to his life, the † School he founded; the Conflicts which during the time of Persecution he underwent in several Confessions, and lastly the Crown of Martyrdom with which he was encircled, we have fully declared in a (x) peculiar Work. Indeed this Pamphilus was the most admirable person of all that lived here. (y) Amongst those Men in the beginning of this Chapter (see) that he went to the Synod of Antioch, which was called upon Paul's account, and in his return was stopped by the Laodiceans, and made Bishop of that place. Now again we find the same concerning Anatolius; Which cannot possibly be defended, except we should say that Eusebius died some few Days after his Ordination: But in opposition to that we will produce Hieronymus's authority, who in the second year of Aurélianus writes thus; Eusebius is now famous at Laodicea. Valef.

(1) That is, he was not so well affected to the Christian Faith, as he was to Philosophy and Grecian Learning: Some will have the Greek Phrase [ἐν δυνάμει] to have reference to something else; but thus I understand it. Valef.

(u) Anatolius and Christophorus, because in the † Life publication of this place, translate it otherwise than we have done. They misinterpret ἀποβήσθαι, for a passive, and thus point it, ἀποβήσθαι ἀπὸ τοῦ θέν, &c. all things were referred to their former state by God the preserver. &c. But after diligent inspection into this place, I think the Words [ἀπὸ τοῦ θέν] ought to be referred to ἀναβήσθαι, and then the sense will be agreeable to our translation; to wit, Theodotus, who was elected Bishop by God himself the preserver of all things, restored the affairs of the Church to their former splendour. Valef.

† His own translation of the Greek words, concerning the School in which he was educated: But I understand them spoken of the School which Pamphilus founded at Cæsarea: Concerning the Library which he erected at Cæsarea, see Hieronymus's Catalogue; where he speaks concerning Matthew; see also his Epistle to Marcella. Valef.

(x) Christophorus, takes these words, ἐν ἰδία ὁνομασίᾳ to signify one Book only: But Eusebius wrote three Books of the Life of Pamphilus. Which Hieronymus attests in his Book De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis; and in his Apology against Rufinus. Valef.

(y) Ὁ τοῦ τῆς πόλεως τοῦ θέν, &c. (that is,) as we have translated it, amongst those Men who lived nearest to our times, &c. Some will have ἡλικίαν to be referred to εὐσεβίου, most eminent Alen; but that I cannot approve of. Pierius, and Meletius, of whom Eusebius afterwards speaks, lived even till Constantine's time; concerning Pierius, see Photius and Hieronymus. Rufinus does not call him Pierius, but Hierius. So does the old Roman Martyrology, at the fourth day of November. But this Martyrology, I think, is neither the old one, nor the Roman. For had it been the Roman Martyrology, we should have had mention of none but Roman Martyrs. But in it we have a Catalogue of the Martyrs of all Countries. That I think (if any desire to know which it is) is the old Roman Martyrology, which Zacharius published with the Canon of Viktorius Aquitanus, although that looks more like a Calendar, than a Martyrology. There is indeed none which is properly the Roman Martyrology: For that which Gregory the Great mentions in his Epistle to Eulogius, is St. Hieronymus's Martyrology, which the Western Church then used, as we shall hereafter at another place demonstrate. Valef.

who lived nearest to our Times, we knew these Diocletian to be most eminent, Pierius one of the Presbyters of Alexandria; and (z) Meletius Bishop of the (y) This Churches in Pontus: Pierius was egregiously c- is the m- steem'd for his [voluntary] Poverty, and his Philo- whom A- sophick Literature: He was also a Man singularly exercised in Contemplations upon the Scri- Speech a- pures, Expositions, and publick Discourses in the Church; and Meletius (whom the Learned called the (a) Honey of Attica) was such a Man as one would describe to be most accomplish'd with all sorts of Learning. The powerfulness of his Eloquence can't worthily be admired. But, should any one say that he had this Faculty by nature, [we answer,] who could excel him in his knowledge in many other Arts and Sciences, and in his various sorts of Literature? Certainly, should any person have made trial of him, he would have affirm'd that he was a Man most acute in all Sciences which have a dependence on reason; and also most eloquent: The Virtue and Piety of his Life was also correspondent to these his Accomplishments. In the time of the Persecution we knew this Man, when he absconded for the space of seven years compleat in the Regions of Palestine. After Hymenaeus Bishop of Jerusalem, a little before mention'd, Zambdas entered upon the Government of that Church; who dying not long after, Hermion, the last of the Bishops before the Persecution in our Age, succeeded in the Apostolick Chair, (b) which is preserved there even to this day. Theonas succeeded Maximus in the Bishoprick of Alexandria, who had been Bishop there eighteen years, since Dionysius's Death. In his days Abelliar, who at the same time with Pierius was honour'd with a Presbytership, was very famous [at Alexandria] who was intrusted with the care of the * Catechetick School. He in his Actions exhibited a most excellent Example (inferior to none) of a more sublime Philosophy, and a genuine Pattern of an Evangelick Converse. After Theonas had born the Episcopal Office nineteen years, Peter succeeded in the Episcopate of Alexandria. He also was esteem'd a person very eminent in his Function, which he bore twelve years compleat. Having presided over the Church almost three of those twelve years before the Persecution, he pass'd the rest of his time in a more strict and (c) A stricter course of life: but (c) There more frequent in Eusebius than the use of these Words, ἀσκήσις, and φιλοσοφία; which terms the Christians borrowed from the Philosophers, as I noted Chap. 17. Book 2. Note (a.) The Philosophers called

Arrian calls Meletius the Great, pag. 291. Where in his Catalogue of the Orthodox Bishops, he reckons Meletius Bishop of Pontus for one. Philoforgius in his first Book calls him Bishop of Scythopolis in Pontus. He says he was at the Council of Nica with Basilis Bishop of Amasia, and that he sided with the Arrians: But Arrianus in the place above-quoted, proves that to be false. Valef.

(a) Therefore the name of Meletius is derived from τὸ μέλι, or from Honey. Gregory Nazianzen, in his lambicks calls Meletius the Bishop of Amiche, ἀμικίτης ἐπίσκοπος. Valef.

(b) By these words [ἐπὶ τῆς ἐκκλησίας παλαιᾶς] it means, that the Throne of James the Brother of our Lord, was preserved at Jerusalem till that time, as 'tis recorded, Chap. 29. Book 7. So also at Alexandria, the Chair, or Throne of Saturninus the Evangelist who first founded the Church of Alexandria, was preserved there for a long time. Valef.

* This is the Catechetick School, or the School of the Divine Faith.

called those ascetics who professed a stricter kind of life. Hence it is that Arcandrius in his fourth Book, Chap. 35. calls Alexander the Philosopher ἀσκητικόν. Ascetic Philosophy is opposed to Philosophy which consists in bare words. When the Christians first made use of this name Asceta, they bestow'd it on the Clergy: A long time after that, the Monks laid claim to this name. But at the first it was used as was before shown: See Chap. 17. Book 2. Note (a.) Which may be proved by the instance here of Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, and Pierius the Presbyter; both whom Eusebius in this Chapter calls Ascetas. Eusebius also, Chap. 11. concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, calls Pamphilus the Presbyter, Asceta. Valef.

Dioctes continued to be apparently solicitous for the publick Utility of the Churches. Upon which account being beheaded in the ninth year of the Persecution, he was adorned with a Crown of Martyrdom. But having here terminated the History of the Succession of Bishops from our Saviour's Nativity, to the demolishing of the Churches; which [History] comprehendeth the space of (d) three hundred and five years; in the subsequent [Books] we will record the Confessions of those, who in our Age courageously fought for Religion, how many and how great they were, and leave them for the information of succeeding Ages.

in regard Eusebius here sums up the time which he hath comprehended in his Ecclesiastick History. He faith that from our Saviour's Birth to the demolishing of the Churches, which was in the nineteenth year of Dioctes, there were 304 years. Also in Eusebius's Chronicle the 304 year of Christ is set opposite to the 19 year of Dioctes. But in Saliger's Edition, the year in which the Persecution under Dioctes began, is reckoned the 304 year of Christ. Hence arises this difference; Saliger in his Edition of Eusebius's Chronicle, reckons not that to be the first year of Christ in which he was born, but the year following. But Eusebius reckons that to be the first of Christ in which he was born, as I before noted Chap. 5. Book 1. Note (a.) For Eusebius places his birth on the 8th of the Ides of January. Indeed, in all the MSS. of Eusebius's Chronicle (which have the Years of Christ annex'd, particularly in that of Milain, which is ancienter than any other) that is noted for the first year of Christ in which he was born in Bethlehem of Judea. Valef.

The PREFACE.

HAVING comprized the Successions of the Apostles in Seven entire Books, in this Eighth we have thought it requisite to set forth the Affairs of our own Age, (which deserve no trivial Description,) being a matter most necessary to be deriv'd down to the knowledge of Posterity. And our Relation shall take its beginning from hence.

CHAP. I.

Concerning those things which preceded the Persecution in our days.

(a) In the most ancient Maz. MS. and in the Editions of Rufinus, the first Chapter is begun at these words, Hung great, &c. Valef.

(b) The true reading of this place; which is [ἀπὸ τοῦ ἱεροῦ, of sacrificing:] the same reading Gruter found in his Copies. The Governours of Provinces were obliged to sacrifice to the Gods, and to the Emperors, and to be present at Sacrifices. Upon which account the Christians abstin'd from the Magistracy, and refused the Government of Provinces, offer'd them by the Emperors. Valef. The reading in Robert Stephens Edit. is [ἀπὸ τοῦ ἱεροῦ.]

need we mention those who were conversant in the Imperial Palaces? Or the Emperors themselves? Who permitted their Domesticks, together with their (c) Wives, Children and Servants, freely and openly to make profession of their Religion by their words and practices, even before their own faces, and in a manner suffer'd them to boast of their fearlessness and freedom in professing their Faith: Whom also they had an high esteem for, and accounted them more acceptable than the rest of their Attendants. Such a one was that metlick.

(d) Dorotheus, a person who of all Men declar'd the heartiest affection to, and fidelity in, their Service, upon which account he was more highly valued by them than the Magistrates and most Honourable Governours of the Provinces: To whom we will add the most renowned Gorgonius; and as many others as arrived to the same degree of Honour with them upon account of the Word of God. The same Affection, Obediency, and eminent Favour you might see vouchsafed to the Prelates of every Church, as well by all

(e) This Dorotheus was of the Bed-chamber to the Emperor Dioctes, or Galerius Caesar: So Nicetas affirms, in the Act of the Martyr, Indes, and Donna, chap. 23. Valef.

C H A P. II.

Concerning the Ruin of the Churches.

Diocletian (e) Private Persons as Governors of Provinces. But now, how should any one be able to describe (e) in the those numerous (f) Congregations; and the Multi- tudes of Assemblies thro' out every City which flock'd Atq. MSS [to embrace the Faith of Christ;] and those famous the rea- Concourses of the People [in the Churches? For is [μεγαλὴ συναγωγὴ, &c.] a- monish the procurators, &c. which MSS. have not these words [εὐ- ερεσις καὶ ἀγάπη καὶ τὸ τοῦτο, &c.] observance and eminent favour.] But in the King's MS. and Rob. Stephen's Edit. the reading is [μεγαλὴ συναγωγὴ, with all pri- vate Men:] in which Copies also we have those words, which we said were wanting in the other MSS. Valif.

(f) The term in the original is [ἐκκλησία] Which word St. Paul uses 2. Thess. 2. 1. where our Translators render it, our gather- ing together. ἐκκλησία, does properly signify, to collect Persons disparted in divers places into one place. In this sense Dionys. Alexan- drin. uses it B. 4. Chap. 25. of this History; where he speaks of Quadratus Bishop of the Athenians. Valif.

through too much liberty changed into looseness and sloth; when some began to envy and revile others, and we were in a manner at wars amongst ourselves, [wounding] one another with Words as it were with Arms and Spears; when Prelates dissi'd against Prelates, and the People raised Fa- ctions against the People; and when unspeakable Hypocrisy and Dissimulation had arrived to the height of mischief; then did the Divine Ven- geance, as it takes delight to do, gently begin to visit us (the Multitudes [of the Faithful] as yet meeting in their Assemblies) by degrees and with moderation; the Persecution being first begun with these Brethren who bore Arms. But when we became insensible, and entertain'd not the least thought of repenting and appealing the Duty: But, like some atheistical Persons sup- porting our Affairs to be managed regardlessly and without any inspection, we added Impieties to Impieties: When they, who seem'd our Pastors, rejecting the Sanctions of Religion, were inflam'd with mutual Contentions, studying nothing else but the augmenting of Strifes, Menaces, Emula- tion, Envy, and mutual Fla- tred, and (g) greedily chal- lenging to themselves the preeminence, as if it were a Dominion: Then forthwith

(g) That is, whilst the Bishops were at variance among them- selves concerning preeminence, or about the bounds of their Dioceses. Valif.

(According to the expressions utter'd by Jeremiah 1. Chap. 1. 2. 2. The Lord covered the Daughter of Zion with a cloud & Psalms 78. 2. in his anger, and cast down from heaven into the earth the beauty of Israel, and remembered not his footstool in the day of his anger: The Lord hath drowned all the beauty of Israel, and thrown down all his strong-holds. And, as it is predicted in the Psalms, 1. Th hath bethal here made void the covenant of his servant, and prophesied he do not a- fidelity in the earth to wit, by the destruction of the Churches. He hath broken down all his boudges; he hath made his strong-holds fear. All the multitudes of the people that kiss by the way spoil him; and further, he is a reproach to his neighbours. For he hath exalted the right hand of his enemies, and hath turned away the edge of his sword, and hath not assisted him in the war. At Rome, But he hath put an end to his purification, and hath bro- ken his throne by casting it to the ground. The days of his life he hath bespotted, and lastly cover'd him with ignominy. See to what we now all, nor with the original Hebrew; the Learned Rea- ders, upon comparing the Texts, will see the difference; we translated our Author's Words as we found them in the Greek Copy.

ALL these [Predictions] were (a) fully com- (a) in the pleated in our Times, when with our own Eyes we saw both the Houles of Prayer thrown down to the Ground, even to their very Founda- tions, and also the Divine and Sacred Scriptures committed to the fire in the midst of the Forum. Is or fully, in the [When we beheld] some Pastors of the Churches basely hiding themselves, in some in one place, some in another; others of them ig- nominiously apprehended and exposted to the scorn of their Enemies. When also, according to another prophetic expression * contempt was poured upon Princes, and be caused them to wander in the wilderness where there was no way. 107. 40. But 'tis not our [design] to describe those sad Calamities which in conclusion befel them: For seems im- it is unfit for us to record their mutual Disfenti- pertinent, ons and Folly before the Persecution. Wherefore Valif. we will relate no more concerning them, than whereby we may justify the Divine Vengeance. We will not proceed therefore to mention those who were (b) cry'd by the Persecution, nor those who wholly made shipwreck of their Salvation, and were voluntarily precipitated in- to the Gulfs of the deep: but we will in general insert such passages only into this our History, as may in the first place be profitable to our own selves, and in the next to posterity. From hence then we will begin briefly to describe the sacred Combats of those who were Martyrs for the Divine Religion. (c) It was the nineteenth

(b) Παρεκκλήσεις, τρύπαι, ἐκπεριεσθαι: For this term is used in- stead of παρεκκλήσεις. St. Paul uses the word *1. Thess. 4. 15.* where our Translation renders it tempted. 'Tis a Metaphor taken from Ship- set upon by Pirates at Sea; as the following Words declare: These Martyrs were called Pirates ὡς τὰς τρύπαις. (c) So says in his Chronicon; and so also the Alexandrian Chronicle: which when agrees Marin (in Justin) whole Words are these; Diocletian VIII. et Maximiano VII. his Coff. persecutio Christianorum: i. e. When Diocletian was the eighth time Consul, and Maximianus the seventh, the Persecution of the Christians began. The same may be concluded from the Act of Alvianus Felix (in Gest. upon Zenophilum Consularem Numidia). According to Eusebius's account this was the 305 Year from our Blessed Saviour's Nativity; but according to the Dionysian Aera, which we now make use of, it was the 323. But Baronius (in anno- not.) and Petavus (in the second part of his Rationalis Tempora) affirm that the beginning of this Persecution must be placed on the 302 Year of Christ; when Constantius IV. and Maximianus IV. Coff. Their Opinion is grounded on one only Argument, to wit, the Act of the Council of Cirta (a City in Numidia, afterwards called Constantine), which Council Augustine (in Brevicula Collat.) affirms was convened 21 Year after the Persecution began, and after the Passion of the Martyrs. Now the Act of that Council (which Augustine relates in the B. 2. against Crescens) do shew, that it was convened Diocletian VIII. and Maximianus VII. Coff. But this Argument is easily answered. For there is a mistake in those Act of the Council of Cirta; the true reading is, P. C. Diocletian IX. and Maximianus VIII. This appears evidently ex Brevicula Collat. Diei 3. cap. 17. where we meet with these words; Nam Gestis Martyrum quibus ostenditur temporis persecutionis. Gesta sunt Diocletiano IX. et Maximiano VIII. pridie Id. Ebruaris: Gesta autem Episcopalia decreti Cistenfis, post consulatum consulatus. 3. Natus Martius, &c. This passage cannot be supposed to be false. For Augustine adds there, that the Officers being commanded by the Judge to see what distance of time there was between the Passion of the Martyrs and the Council of Cirta, were deceived, and through their Ignorance told him what was false. For whereas the Act of the Martyrs were thus inscribed [Diocletian IX. and Maximianus VIII. pridie Id. Ebr.] and the Act of the Council of Cirta, thus [Gest Diocletiano Diocletiano novis, et Maximiano officiis, 3. Natus Martius,] the Officers taking [Gest consulatus] for [consulatus] made answer, That there was only one Month between the Act, both of the Martyrs, and of the Council. But there really was 13 Months space between them, as Augustine truly affirms. — There is another Argument to evince, that the Council of Cirta was not convened in the eighth Consulship of Diocletian.

Dioclesian. For whereas that Council was assembled to Ordain a Bishop over the Church of Cirta, (as Augustinus affirms) I desire to know who was Ordained Bishop of that Church by those Bishops convened in that Council? Silvanus was not. For he in this very year, was first deducted to Paul Bishop of Cirta, as 'tis apparent from the Acts of Minutian folio. Answer perhaps will be made (as Baronius does) that Paul was made Bishop of Cirta. But this cannot be true, for the Persecution began under Paul, as 'tis evident from the Acts, and Zenophilum Confession Namidia, which are related in Augustine's third Book against Crescens. See the place; and also Augustine's 165 Epistle. Thus much I have said (and could have said a great deal more) to evince that the Council of Cirta was convened 13 Months after those Acts of the Martyrs of Africa; and therefore it could not be assembled in the eighth Confulate of Dioclesian, and the seventh of Maximian; in which year the Persecution began. Vale!

Dioclesian, year of Dioclesian's Empire, in the month (d) Dystrus, (which the Romans call March.) when (the Festival of the Salutarious Passion (e) approaching) the Imperial Edicts were proposed in all places, giving command that the Churches should be totally destroyed, and the Scriptures consumed by fire; and declaring that those who were elevated to any degree of honour should be rendered infamous; and (f) those that were private persons, if they persisted in a Resolution of retaining the profession of Christianity, should be deprived of their Liberty: Such was the first Edict against us. But not long after, other Edicts arriv'd; by which command was given, that all the Prelates of the Churches every-where should first be put into Bonds, and afterwards compelled to sacrifice by all ways imaginable.

In this 8th Book of his Ecclesiastical History says it began in the Month Nautibus, which the Romans call April. Vale!

(e) Theodore (in Book 5, Chap. 38. of his Ecclesiastical History) affirms, that the Edict for the demolishing of the Churches was proposed on the Day of our Lord's Passion (i. e. Good-Friday:) The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle says it came forth on Easter-day; which was on the 24th of March: But Easter-day could not fall on the 24th of March in the 19th year of Dioclesian, as Salager and Pereus have observed. Eusebius in his Chronicon, says it came forth in March, diesse pasche. The Greek Phrase here imports only, that Easter was near at hand, when the Edict was proposed: Εγγυασιον; Rufinus renders it, dies solemnis pasche imminet, the solemn day of Easter was at hand. In the year of Christ 313 (according to the Dionysian Era) Easter fell on the 18th day of April, amongst the Eastern Churches. Vale!

(f) Tis is basilicus Rufinus and Nicophorus supposed the Servants of the Christians were hereby meant. But that cannot be the meaning of this place. For then the Imperial Edict would have been imperfed, providing only for the apprehension of those who were honoured with any degree of preferment, and of Servants, and leaving out the Rusticks and ordinary sort of People. Besides, how can Servants be said to be deprived of their liberty? Christophorus translates it privatos, private Persons. I think he means the Attors and Procurators, who were Servants to the richer sort of Men. Zonaras expounds this place very well, thus, τις δὲ τρεῖς εἶδη ὄντων, Persons of a private condition. Vale!

CHAP. III.

Concerning the various sorts of Combats which [the Martyrs] underwent in the time of the Persecution.

Forthwith therefore many Prelates of Churches having endured most severe Torments with great alacrity of Mind, exhibited Spectacles of most illustrious Combats. Many others being prepossessed with a faintness of Mind by reason of their Fear, were immediately discouraged at the first attack made against them. Every one of the residue had their courses in various kinds of Tortures. One was scourged all over his Body with Whips; another was rack'd with Tortures, and had his Flesh scraped off with Tormenting-irons that were intolerable. Under which [Torments] some made a lamentable Conclusion of their lives; but others accomplish'd their Combat after another manner. One being forcibly thrust forward by others, and constrain'd to approach their impure and most nefarious Sacrifices, was let go as if he had sacrificed, altho' he really he did not. Another (when he had neither approach'd [the Altar,] not touch'd any thing that was execrable, yet because others said he had sacrificed) silently bore that Calumny, and went his way. A third was taken up on their Shoulders half-dead, and cast forth as if he had been really so: A fourth lying upon the ground, was drawn a great way by the Feet, and then accounted amongst them who had done sacrifice. One cried out, and with a loud voice attested, that he denied to sacrifice: Another exclaim'd that he was a Christian, adorning himself with the confession of that salutary Apellation. A third affirm'd that he neither had, nor ever would sacrifice. But these being struck on the Mouth by the Soldiers with their Fists, (a great company of whom were placed there as a Guard) Glenc'd; and (a) beaten on the Face and Cheeks, were by force thrust out. So highly did these Enemies of Piety every way esteem their being thought to have perfected what they desired! But these [Proceedings] against the Holy Martyrs did in no wise prove successful to them: Whole [admirable courage] should we undertake accurately to set forth, what Expressions would be sufficient to compose such a Narrative?

tyrs on the Face and Cheeks. There is frequent mention of this sort of torture in the sufferings of the Martyrs. Our Author had said before, that the Martyrs were beaten with the Fists of the Soldiers. Here therefore he must mean these Plumbata; Otherwise, what he says is a Tautology. Vale!

CHAP. IV.

Concerning God's Illustrious Martyrs; how they filled the World with their Fame, having been adorned with divers Crowns [of Martyrdom] for Religion.

FOR who should be able to make a Relation of those infinite numbers [of Martyrs,] who demonstrated an admirable capacity of mind for the Worship of the Supreme God; not only from that time the Persecution was raised against all the [Christians,] but long before, when the times were calm and serene? For some time since, when the [Devil,] (a) who hath received power (a) He over this World, was first roused as it were out of a profound sleep, and as yet made his attempts against the Churches in a secret and occult manner, after that interval which followed the Persecution under Decius and Valerian: (For he would be the not set upon us closely and with an open War, but as yet made trial only of those that were engaged in the Milice; for he supposed the rest would be easily vanquish'd, could he first overcome them: ) Then [I say] you might have seen very many of those who were Soldiers, most willingly embracing a private life, rather than they would renounce the Worship of the Creator of all things. For when the [Roman] (b) General (who he was it matters not) first set upon persecuting the Christian Soldiers, and began to take a strict view of, and purge those that belonged to the Army; permitting them freely

(b) His name was Veturius; he was a Christian; he was a Master of the Camp, or Lieutenant-General of the Army: Concerning whom Eusebius in his Chronicon, at the 17th year of Dioclesian says thus, Veturius Master of the Camp persecutes the Christian Soldiers; the persecution against us being from that time begun by degrees. Vale!

* Φυλακιστής. It imports his doing of the Office of a Judge among his Soldiers, examining the place and order of each of them. The same term occurs Book 10. Chap. 4. where see Note (a.)

Dioclesian. to choole, whether by obeying they would enjoy that degree of Honour they were arriv'd to, or on the contrary be deprived of it, if they refused to comply with the [Emperor's] commands: Innumerable Soldiers of the Kingdom of Christ, without all delay or hesitancy, preferred their Confession of him, before the apparent Glory and Prosperity they were possess'd of. Some few of which (one or two) procur'd not only the loss of their Preferment, but Death also for their pious and resolute Steadfastness: * The Framers of the Conspiracy [against our Religion] being at that time moderate, presumed to proceed to shed the Blood but of very few: The multitude of Believers 'tis likely) terrified him, and made him afraid as yet to enter into an open War against them all. But when he prepared himself more manifestly for an Engagement, it is impossible to relate how many and eminent Martyrs of Christ were visible to the Inhabitants of all Cities and Countries.

* He means the Devil, not the Roman General, as Christoph. supposed. Valef.

Concerning what was done at Nicomedia.

I Mmediately therefore, upon the publishing of the Edict at Nicomedia against the Churches, (a) one who was no obscure person, but eminently illustrious for secular Honour and Esteem, mov'd with a Divine Zeal, and incited by an ardent Faith, took down [the Edict,] which was fix'd up in the most open and publick place [of the City,] and (b) tore it, as being impious and most detestable: [Which he did] whilst two of the Emperors made their abode in that City; one of which was senior to the rest, and the other held the fourth place in the Empire. But this Person who was the first of the Inhabitants of that City which appear'd such eminent and zealous, having suffer'd such Punishments, as were thought meet to be inflict'd on him for such a bold act, persever'd in an undisturbedness and tranquillity of Mind to his very last gasp.

(a) This person is called John in the Apocryphal of Quadrus, Ado, Nor, ker, and in the old Roman Martyrology, at September 7. Valef.

(b) The Edicts and Rescripts of the Emperors were written in papyrus. Therefore Nihis. In his 264 Epistle, says it was barely call'd Genta; but after it had been subscribed by the Emperor, it was call'd Sacra; which appears also from the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon, and from Justinian's Novels. Concerning those who were conversant in the Imperial Palace.

BUT that time produced these Divine and Glorious Martyrs (which excell'd all that ever were celebrated as admirable and famous for their Courage, both among Grecians and Barbarians;) Dorotheus, and the other Boys that were of the Bed-chamber to the Emperors: Who although they were accounted worthy of the highest station of Honour by their Masters, and were no less beloved by them than if they had been their own Sons; yet they suppos'd the Reproaches and Tortures for Religion, and those various sorts of Deaths devised for them, to be really of greater value than the Glory and Pleasure of this life. We will here relate what an exit one of them made, and leave the Readers to conjecture from him what befel the rest. In the fore-mention'd City, one of 'em was publicly brought forth before the fore-said Emperors; and commanded to sacrifice, which when he refused to do, 'twas order'd he should be strip'd and hoisted up on high, and that his whole Body should be lacerated with stripes, until he should yield, tho' against his will, to do what he was commanded: But when he continued immovable after his suffering such tortures as these, they mix'd Salt and Vinegar together, and pour'd it (his Bones being now laid bare) upon the purified parts of his Body. When he had undergone these tortures also, then Fire and a Gridiron was brought forth; and the remains of his Body were laid on [and broiled,] like Flesh dress'd to be eaten; not all at one time, but by little and little, that he might not end his life too soon: Neither were those persons who laid him on the fire, permitted to leave him, till after so great [tortures,] he should give his consent to perform what he was commanded. But, having constantly persevered in his Resolution, and gotten the Victory, he expired under his very tortures. Such was the Martyrdom of one of those Boys who were of the Bed-chamber to the Emperors; being truly worthy of his name: For he was call'd (a) Peter.

The [Martyrdom] of the rest, although not at all inferior to this, yet shall be omitted, lest our Discourse should be too tedious. Thus much only we will relate, that Dorotheus and Gorgonius (together with many others that were Attendants at the Imperial Palace) after various Combats, having finish'd their lives by being strangled, obtain'd the rewards of Divine Victory. At the same time Anthimus, the then Bishop of the Church of Nicomedia, was beheaded for the Testimony of Christ. With whom was join'd a great multitude of Martyrs. For in those days, by what accident I know not, there happen'd a

(a) Concerning this Peter, Dorotheus, Gorgonius, and the others that were Martyr'd, see the Acts of the Suffering of Index and Domas, at the 26. of December. Valef.

(b) Fire in the Imperial Palace at Nicomedia: Which being laid to our charge as the Authors thereof, by a Report ground on a false suspicion; all sorts of persons that were the Whorlippers of God in that [City] were destroy'd by heaps, some with the Sword, and others by Fire. At which time, report says, both Men and Women, excited by a divine and unspeakable alacrity, leapt into the fiery Pile. The Executioners also having bound another great company in Boats, cast 'em into the Abysses of the Sea. Moreover, the Bodies of those who were of the Bed-chamber to the Emperors, having been interr'd with decent Funeral Obsequies, they who were accounted their Masters, suppos'd it requisite to dig up again, and cast them into the Sea; lest some (as they thought) should look upon them as Gods, and worship them [in After-Ages,] should they be let alone to rest in their Graves. Such were the Exploits performed at Nicomedia in the beginning of this Persecution. But not long after, when some attempted to possess themselves of the Empire in the Region call'd (c) Melitina; and others in (d) Syria: (e) Sebastus, Chap. 6.

Note (b.) concerning Melitina. There was a City, and a Countee call'd by this name in Armenia the Less. But I never met with any thing concerning this Tyrant, who seiz'd the Empire in that Region. Valef.

(d) He means Eugenius, who for some little time tyranniz'd in Syria. Liberian (in his Oration to Theodosius, pag. 411. and in his Apology, pag. 369.) tells the whole Story. Whereto may be annex'd a Passage of the same Liberian's, out of his Oration to Theodosius, concerning the Sedition at Antioch, pag. 399. There was a Tribune of Seleucia, by name Eugenius, who had the command of 500 Soldiers. These Soldiers were order'd to open the Mouth and Passage of the Haven.

Haven. When they had laboured day and night without any intermission; being much displeased at their task, they force their Commander (Eugenius) to take the Empire upon him; threatening him with death unless he would give his assent. The Tribune being after this manner compelled, took the Purple off the Image of one of the Gods, and was saluted Emperor. He goes forthwith to Antioch, (which then had no Garrison in it) supposing that if he could possess himself of that City, it would much advance his Designs: He makes himself Master of that place about Sun-setting. But his Soldiers, agreeable to their usual Irregularities, destroyed the Country as they marched, and mist themselves with Wine and good Cheer. When being perceived by the Antiochians, they, despising the Poverty and Drunkenness of the Soldiers, killed them all with Stones and Weapons of all sorts, (the very Women giving their assistance) and their Leader also, as he was going towards the Palace: So that about the first Watch none of them were left alive. But the Emperor, who ought to have express'd his thankfulness to the Antiochians, ordered the Princes of the Antiochenian and Seleucian Order should be slain, when as neither of them deserved any punishment. Amongst them the Grandfather of Libanius (a proper cunning old Man) was killed. All this is met with pag. 411 & 363. Moreover, Libanius (in Ora. ad Theodosium de seditione) tells us, the name of this Tribune of the Seleucian Soldiers was Eugenius; and the name of the Emperor was Dioclesian, whom he calls, by his true name, Diocletian. Thus I have given you the Name and History of the Tyrant; and the time when this Eugenius made his attempts on the Empire, Eusebius here declares, in what, when Dioclesian was the eighth, and Maximian the seventh time Coff. Valef.

Dioclesian an Imperial Edict arrived, [commanding] that all the Governours of Churches every-where should be bound and imprison'd. The sight of what was done after that, no expressions are sufficient to describe: When infinite Multitudes were every-where committed to custody; and the Prisons in all places, which in former times had been provided for Murderers and Robbers of the Dead, were then filled with Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Readers and Exorcists: Infomuch that there was now no place left therein for those who had been condemn'd for their Crimes. Again, when (c) another Edict follow'd the former, wherein it was commanded that those who were imprison'd, if they would offer Sacrifice, should have their liberty to go whither they pleased: But if they refused should be cruciated with a thousand tortures: The multitudes of Martyrs in every Province cannot possibly be reckon'd up, especially those [who suffer'd] in Africa, Mauritania, Thebais, and Egypt. Out of Egypt some went into other Cities, and Provinces, and were there adorn'd with glorious Martyrdoms.

(c) This was the third Edict of the Emperor against the Christians. Before the first it was ordered, that the Churches should be ruin'd and the Scriptures burnt; and those who were honoured with any preferment (if they refused to sacrifice) should be deprived of their Dignity; the meaner sort were to lose their liberty: See Chap. 2. Another Edict soon followed this, that Bishops, Priests and Deacons should be imprison'd, and by all ways compelled to sacrifice. The third Edict comprehended all sorts of Christians, as well those of the Laity, as the Clergy: which Edict was proposed (says Eusebius in the Chap. 3. of his Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine) in the second year of the Persecution. But this seems rather to have been the fourth Edict: For the second and third concern'd the Presbyters only; by the second 'twas ordered they should be imprison'd, and by the third it was enjoyned, they should by tortures be compelled to sacrifice. Valef.

Concerning those Egyptians [who suffer'd] in Phoenicia.

SOME of them, we knew, were famous [for their Martyrdoms] in Palestine; and others in Tyre a City of Phoenicia. Whom any one that had seen, could not but have been astonish'd at their innumerable Stripes; at the Courage and Contancy of those truly (a) admirable Cham-

(a) They are the reading of the Mar. and Med. MSS. accordingly we have rendered it of those truly admirable Champions, &c. Those Champions were termed paradoxi, who had gained many Victories. See Peter Faber (in Agonistion) B. 3. pag. 603. Valef.

ons of Piety in suffering them; at their Combat with Wild Beasts, accusom'd to devour the Blood of Mankind, which immediately follow'd their Tortures with Scourges; at their Encounters in that Combat with Leopards, * huge wild Bears, * fierce wild Boars, and Bulls, which were incited against them with Fire and red-hot Iron; and lastly, at the admirable patience of those courageous [Martyrs] in enduring [the assaults] of each of those wild Beasts. We ourselves were present at the performance of these things, when we saw the Divine Power of our Saviour Jesus Christ (whom the Martyrs then bore witness of) present, and evidently manifesting itself to the Martyrs: [for] those ravenous Beasts for a long time dared not to touch or approach the Bodies of these [Martyrs] beloved by God. But they turn'd their Fury upon others, to wit, those that were (b) Infidels, who intigated and provoked 'em: But the sacred Champions only, who stood naked and by the motions of their Hands irritated them against themselves, (for this they were enjoyned to do,) they did not so much as touch. Sometimes indeed they assailed them; but, as it were by some Divine Power, they were stop'd, and retired back again: Which happening for a long time together, gave occasion of no small admiration to the Spectators; so that because the first Beast perform'd not its assault, a second and a third were let loose upon one and the same Martyr: You would have admir'd the intrepid Steadfastness of those sacred persons at the sight of all this, and that firm and immoveable fortitude of Mind, which was in young and tender Bodies: For you might have seen a Youth, who had not yet compleated the twentieth year of his age, standing still without being bound; and (having stretch'd forth his Hands, in form of a Cross) in an undisturb'd and fearless temper of Mind, contending with the greatest earnestness in Prayers to the Divine Majesty, in no wise receding or removing from the place he stood on; when the Bears and the Leopards, breathing forth rage and death, almost touch'd his very Flesh with their Jaws. But their Mouths were (after what manner I know not) bound fast as it were by Divine and unpeakeable Power, and they ran backward again. After such a manner as this, did this person behave himself. Again, you might have seen others (for they were in all five in number) cast to an enraged Bull, who tore some of the Infidels that approach'd him, tossing them into the air with his Horns, and leaving them to be taken up half-dead. But when he should have assail'd the sacred Martyrs only with rage and menaces, he could not approach them; but stamping on the Ground with his Feet, tossing his Horns this way and that way, and breathing forth rage and menaces by reason of his being irritated with red-hot Irons, he was notwithstanding drawn backward by the assistance of Divine Providence. When therefore none of them was at all hurt by him, they let loose other wild Beasts upon them. In fine, after these various and horrid assaults of the wild Beasts;

Dioclesian.

(b) By [Eusebius] the term which here occurs, Nicophorus (B. 7. Chap. 7.) thought those were meant, who stood without the Arena of the Amphitheatre, and incited the wild-beasts by their Clamours. But Rufinus supposed that the Arenarii were here spoken of, whose business it was to provoke the Beasts: Thus he renders the place, Verum bestia illa ipsos qui ad instigandum mittuntur, incredibili velocitate discerpunt; But the Beasts stare in pieces those with an incredible swiftness, who are sent in to provoke them. Christopherson thought that as well the Infidels, as those who stood without the arena, were meant. The same term occurs again in this Chapter; we have rendered it in both places Infidels. Valef.

All these Examples, Precepts, and good Documents being deposited for us in the Divine and sacred Scriptures, the blessed Martyrs, who were conversant amongst us, without any delay manifestly fix'd the eye of their Mind upon the Supreme God, and willingly embracing death upon account of Piety, they steadfastly adhered to their calling: For they found that our Lord Jesus Christ had been incarnate for us, that he might abolish all manner of Sin, and provide us with assistances for our entrance into life eternal. For * he thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took the form of a servant: And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself unto death, even the death of the Cross.

Wherefore the Martyrs (who were (c) full of Christ) zealously affecting the best Gifts, endured all manner of sorrow, and all sorts of tortures that could be invented, not only once, but some of them a second time also. And when the Soldiers that were of the Guard endeavoured with much earnestness [to strike a terror] into them, not only by all manner of menaces in words, but by deeds, they were in no wise discouraged in mind, because * perfect love casteth out fear. Whose fortitude and courage under each torture what words would be sufficient to relate? For, free leave being granted to all persons that would be injurious towards them; some beat them with Clubs, others with Rods; others some with Scourges: Again, some scourged 'em with Thongs of Leather; others with Ropes: And the spectacle of these Tortures was variously interchanged, and full of malicious cruelty. (e) Ἀμυνθεία (the term here) seems to signify something more than Iron-nails. For Hesychius interprets ἀμυνθείον by ξύλον σιγῆς, a two-edged Sword. Note here the Cruelty of the Judges; who were not contented with Iron-nails only, but used Knives also, or Razors, with which they cut the Sides of the Martyrs. Valef.

* Ἄνδ' τῆς σῶς, εὐαγγελιστῆς, signifies a Perch, Gallery, or Walking-place under-prop'd with Pillars; in such Philosophers taught and disputed: The Stoicks had their name from hence; and τῆς σῶς ἐκιδόσθου.

this they endur'd not only as long as the Governor talk'd with them, and was at leisure to hear them; but almost a whole day together: For when he went away [to hear] others, he left

(f) Officers, that were empower'd by him, to be watchful over the former [Martyrs,] whether any one of them, being overcome by the sharpness of his tortures, would seem to abandon his resolution. He also commanded they should be (g) strained with Bonds without any commiseration, and afterwards when they were dead, that they should be thrown on the ground, and dragg'd up and down. For they ought not [he said] to take the least care of us; but that all persons should so think of, and behave themselves towards us, as if we were not Men. This (b) second torture (after they had beaten us with stripes) our Adversaries invented. There were some also, who after they had been scourged, lay in the (i) Stocks, both their Feet being stretch'd to the fourth hole; in so much that they were forced to lie in the Stocks with their Bellies upwards, being unable to stand because of their fresh wounds, caused by the stripes, which they had all over their Bodies. Others threw themselves upon the ground, where they lay by reason of the innumerable wounds made by their tortures; yielding a more miserable spectacle to those that look'd on them, than in the very time of their being tortured; and bearing in their Bodies the various and different sorts of tortures invented for them. These things being thus perform'd, some [of the Martyrs] expired under their tortures, having made the Adversary ashamed by their persevering constancy. Others, being half dead, were shut up in prison, where having been sorely afflicted with the smart of their wounds, they ended their lives not many days after. The residue having been refreshed with methods of cure, became more stout and confident by time, and their abode in prison. Therefore, when afterwards command was given, that they should choose, whether by touching the detestable Sacrifices they would free themselves from all molestation, and obtain from them an execrable liberty; or whether, refusing to sacrifice, they would receive the sentence of death: Without any delay they cheerfully proceeded forth to death. For they well knew what was before preferred to us by the sacred Scriptures: For * he (says the Word of God) that sacrificeth to other Gods, shall be utterly destroyed. And a gain, † Thou shalt have no other Gods, but me. Such were the expressions of [Phileas] the Martyr, (a true Philosopher, and also a sincere lover of God,) which he sent to the Brethren of his Church, before his last sentence of condemnation, being yet in prison: Whereby he inform'd them both in what condition he was; and also exhorted them stilly to retain their piety in Christ after his death, which was now approaching.

or Officers, who were under the Præfectus Augustalis concerning whom Phileas speaks in this Epistle, and calls him ἡγεμὼν, the Governor. The name of the Præfectus Augustalis at that time was Hierocles, as Epiph. says, in Hæres. Melitian. Valef. (g) The phrase in the Original is τοὺς ὀστέας σπέρναι; which he seems a new and uncouth Expression. Valef.

dragging of the Bodies up and down is, the first sort of torture was by Stripes and Scourges; the second was, that they were laid on the ground, dragg'd about, and so drawn into prison. Valef. (i) See B. 4. Chap. 16. Note (c.)

(k) But what need we spend many words in relating (k) After Christophorus has inserted many Chapters out of that Appendix, which Robert Stephens has published at the latter end of this Eighth Book. But that Appendix is an entire Book, and separated from this Work, to wit, the Eusebius's History; in which Eusebius describes the sufferings of the Palestine Martyrs, and especially the Passion of his Friend Pamphilius.

Perrinatus. Some sordid person added this Book to the eighth Book of the Ecclesiastical History, because their Subjects were very like; whose Copies the Transcribers afterwards following, placed it in their Copies. In all the MSS. which I could ever yet see, this Book is extant after the end of B. 8. in such manner as Robert Stephens publish'd it. Christophorus therefore did ill, and contrary to the Authority of all Copies, to put this Book in here, as if it had been part of the Eighth Book of the Ecclesiastical History. Musculus was more prudent, who (following Stephens's Edition in his Version) translated the Eighth Book as he found it in the Greek, and wholly omitted this Appendix: Which neither Rufinus, nor Nicéphorus seem to have found in their Copies. Besides, the Titles of the Chapters of Book 8. (which, as usually, are prefix'd before it) were sufficient to have put Christophorus in mind, that this Appendix did in no wise belong to the Eighth Book. Valef.

Concerning what was done in Phrygia.

FOR at that time some arm'd Soldiers invested a whole City of Christians, that was very populous, in (a) Phrygia, and, having set it on fire, burnt the Men (together with the Women and Children) whilst they called upon Christ the Supreme God. The reason hereof was this, the whole Body of Inhabitants of that City, the (b) Curator, the (c) Dunmire, together with all the rest who were of the Magistracy, and all the common People, professing themselves to be Christians, would in no wise obey those that commanded them to sacrifice to Idols. Another person also, by name (d) Adalaus, (a man descended from a Noble Family in Italy, that had obtain'd a Roman Dignity, a person that had passed through all degrees of Honour in the Palace of the Emperors, and so far such that he had faithfully discharged the Office of (e) Receiver-General, which amongst them is called, The (f) Master of the Private Revenue, and that of Rationalist: Besides all this, he was famous for his virtuous Performances in Religion, and for his Confessions of the Christ of God,) was adorned with the Crown of Martyrdom, having undergone the Conflict upon account of Religion, whilst he bore the Office of Rationalist.

episcopatus conventiculo concurrebant; i. e. others were very bold to murder [the Christians] as was one in Phrygia, who burnt all the Inhabitants, together with the place they dwelt in, at one and the same time. Valef.

(b) The Curator of the City was he who look'd after the Treasure, and what-ever else in general belonged to the Revenue of the City; this is manifest from the Pandects of the Law: He is also called Legista (from the Greek word λογιστής, which is the term here in the Original,) in Leg. 3. C. de modo nullandi. &c. Hence [λογιστήν] was used to signify the performance of the Curator's Office, or Place. See Valefius's Notes on Ammon. Marcellinus, pag. 35.

(c) Δυνμύρις, is the term in the Original; which the Latines called Magistratus, or Dunmire: 'Tis taken in this sense throughout the whole Title Cap. Theod. de Decurionibus: Et in Optatus, Lib. 1. &c. in which places (and in many others) Magistratus and Dunmire are promiscuously used. The chief Magistrate amongst the Corinthians, Rhodiens, Tarsenses, Ephesians, and Philippians, was called επαρχος; and also amongst the Athenians the επαρχος got the precedence and chief place, the name of επαρχος being suppressed: See Cicero in Book 5. Epist. 11. ad Atticum. Lastly, in all Grecian Cities it was at length customary to call the chief Magistrates Strategi; as 'tis manifest from the old Coins and Marbles. See Valefius his Notes on Ammon. Marcellinus, l. 3. pag. 423. & 424.

(d) In the Adar. Med. Fab. and Savil. MSS. this person's name is "A-dalas": Adalaus; So Rufinus and Cedrenus wrote his name also. This person is mentioned in the Greek Newscum, on the third of October. There was at the same time another Adalaus, who suffered Martyrdom at Rome, and is mentioned at the seventh of February. Valef.

(e) He means the Procurator, or Steward of the Revenue. Rufinus renders this place thus; rationalis summorum parvum administrans; which is truly translated. Valef.

(f) Concerning these Magistri rei privatae, see Leg. 2. and 4. Cod. Theod. de jure fisci. These Officers are usually joyned with the Rationalists in the Cod. Theod. See Valefius's Notes on Ammon. Marcellin. Book 19. pag. 78.

C H A P. XII.

Concerning many other Men and Women, who suffered Martyrdom in a various and different manner.

WHAT need is there now of mentioning the rest by name, or of recounting the multitude of men, or delineating the various sorts of tortures [endured by] the admirable Martyrs of Christ? Part whereof were beheaded, as it happened to those in Arabia; and part were [killed] by having their Legs broken, as it befel those in Cappadocia. Some, being hung up on high by the Feet with their Heads downwards, (a)

(a) flow Fire having been kindled under them,) were suffocated with the Smoke that ascended from the combustible matter set on fire; so it befel those in Mesopotamia: Others had their Noses, the tips of their Ears, and their Hands cut off, and the other Members and Parts of their Bodies were mangled, as it happen'd at Alexandria. What need is there of renewing the remembrance of what was done at Antioch?

where some were broil'd on (b) Grid-irons set over the Fire, not till they were killed, but that their punishment might be prolonged:

Others were more ready to thrust their Right Hand into the Fire, than to touch the impious sacrifices. Whereof, some avoiding the being put to the rest [whether they would sacrifice,] before they would be apprehended and fall into the hands of those that laid wait for them, threw themselves headlong from the tops of high Houses, having accounted death to be a gain, because of the maliciousness of the Impious. Also, a certain holy Woman (admirable for her virtuous Soul, and [her comely] Body, eminently famous, beyond all at Antioch, for Riches, Descent, and Reputation,) had educated two Daughters (Virgins that were eminent for beauty, and in the flower of their Age) in the Precepts of Religion: When many, moved thereto by envy, used all manner of industry in inquiring out the place where they abscended; and it being at length understood they lived in a foreign Country, they were with much diligence summon'd to Antioch: After the Woman knew, that she and her Daughters were now encompass'd with the Soldier's Nets, perceiving herself and Daughters reduc'd to an inextricable state of peril, she exhorted the Virgins, expressly declaring to 'em the mischief that would befall them from the Soldiers, and that of all evils, Ravishment was the most intolerable, the menaces whereof it was unlawful for them to endure, even to hear: moreover, having said, that to yield up their Souls to the service of Devils, was worse than all sorts of death, and all manner of destruction; there was but one way (she declared) to avoid all these evils, which was to fly to the Lord for refuge. Immediately after these words, having all agreed to embrace the same advice, they adorn'd their Bodies

(a) Such a Fire is that, which is made of Straw and small Sprigs of Trees. It is called a flow, or slow Fire, to difference it from the αἶσθητος πυρρῆς, the unquenchable Fire, which we took notice of before. This Fire was kindled at some distance, that so the Martyrs might be choak'd with the Smoke, rather than burnt. Valefius the Martyr seems to have been killed by such a Fire, as his Act do attest. Seneca (in his third Book De Ira) seems to mention this sort of punishment, in these words, Et circumdati defixis operibus ignes. Valef.

(b) Rufinus translates ἐγκύβητος which is the term here, Grid-iron: So also the Old Gloss renders this term. Valef.

Dioclesian. Bodies with a decent dress: When they had gone (c) half their journey, having intreated their Guard for a short reefs out of the way, and that being granted them, they threw themselves into a River which ran hard by: Thus these persons [drown'd] themselves. At the same City of Antioch, another pair of Virgins, in all points divine, and truly sisters, eminent for descent, splendid as to estate, in the flower of their age, beautiful in Body, chaste of Mind, pious in their conversations, admirable for their industry, (as if the earth were unable to bear so great an ornament,) were, by the command of the worshippers of Dæmon, cast into the Sea. These things were done amongst those [at Antioch.] But 'tis horrid to hear the relation of what others suffer'd in Pontus: Some had sharp Reeds thrust up the Fingers of both their Hands from the very tops of their Nails: Others had melted Lead upon their Backs, even whilst the melted metal boiled, [which ran down and] burnt the most (d) necessary parts of their Bodies: Again, others without any commiseration endured obscene tortures (which are unfit to be related) in their Privy-Members, and Bowels, which those * courageous and just Judges invented with much earnestness and labour, demonstrating thereby the acuteness of their Wit, as if the very power and strength of Wisdom [consisted in such cruel inventions:] and striving continually (as if it had been for rewards in a Combat) to outdo one another in finding out new sorts of Tortures. These calamities therefore were not ended, till such time as [the Judges,] despairing of making any further addition to these miseries, wearied with slaughters, filled and satiated with the effusion of Blood, betook themselves to the thoughts of clemency and humanity, that in future they might seem to invent no further cruelty against us. For it was unfit (they said) to pollute the Cities with the Blood of their Inhabitants, and to defame the Government of benign and gentle authority should be extended to all persons, and that [the Christians] should not any longer be punished with death, in regard those of our Religion were exempted from such punishment by the indulgence of the Emperors. At that time therefore (f) command was given to pluck out the Eyes [of the Christians,] and that they should have one of their Legs lamed. For such was their civility towards us, and this seem'd to them the most gentle punishment [that could be inflicted] on us. In so much that, upon account of this lenity used by these impious Wretches [towards us,] it is impossible to give any further account of the Multitudes (which indeed are altogether innumerable) both of them who had their right Eyes first thrust out with a Sword, and after they had been thus prick'd out, their [Eye-holes] were sear'd with a red-hot Iron; and also of those, who had their Left-legs (as far as the bending of their Knees) made useless by being sear'd with hot Irons: After which they were condemned to the Brazen-Mines which were in the Province, not so much for the service they could do, as upon account of the Affliction and Misery they should [endure there.]. Besides all these, there were many others, who were assauled with several sorts of Combats, which 'tis not possible to give a Catalogue of; for their courageous Exploits do surpass all relation. Therefore, the noble Martyrs of Christ, having obtain'd great renown over the whole world in these [g] Combats, I did both deserv'dly amaze every-where the Spectators of their Courage; must un- and also exhibit in themselves manifest tokens of the truly Divine and (h) Inexplicable Power of our Saviour. Indeed, the mention of every particular person of them by name, would be very tedious, if not a thing impossible.

(g) You may see these things just before. Christophorus translated these words ill, thus [at this time:] and from them began a new Chapter. Valef.

(h) The term here is [ἀσκήματα, secret.]. It seems to be used for [experts, inexplicable;] in which sense Eusebius does frequently use it. But if any one will translate it [secret,] I shall not withhold it. Valef.

C H A P. XIII.

Concerning those Prelates of the Church who demonstrated the Sincerity of the Religion they asserted by [the Effusion] of their own Blood.

*N*OW, of those Ecclesiastick Prelates, who suffered Martyrdom in the most eminent Cities, the first that must be commemorated in the Monuments of the Pious, may be Antimachus, a Witness of Christ's Kingdom, Bishop of Nicomedia, who was beheaded in that City. But, of the (a) Antiochian Martyrs [we will mention] Lucianus a Presbyter of that Church, a person most eminent [for sanctity] throughout his whole life: He at first made a Declaration of the Celestial Kingdom of Christ in words, and by an Apologetick Oration at Nicomedia, in the presence of the Emperor; and afterwards he [asserted it] in deeds and real performances. But the most eminent Martyrs in Phœnicia (which were most acceptable to God and Pastors of Christ's Flock) were Tyrannius Bishop of the Church at Tyre, and Zenobius a Presbyter at Sidon; also Silvanus Bishop of the Churches at Emisa. This [Prelate last named] being together with some others, call as food to the Wild-Beasts at the very City of Emesa, was received into the number of the Martyrs. Both the other rendred the Doctrine of the Divine Faith famous at Antioch, by their most patient suffering [of Tortures] until their Deaths: [Tyrannius] the Bishop was drown'd in the Depths of the Sea; and Zenobius (a most incomparable Physician) died courageously under the Tortures, when were applied to his sides. Amongst the Martyrs of Palessine, Silvanus Bishop of the Churches at Gaza,

(f) Rufinus says an Edict of the Emperor was set forth, whereby such a sort of punishment was commanded thenceforth to be inflicted on the Christians: But I think this not to be true. (h) The term here is [ἀσκήματα, secret.]. It seems to be used for [experts, inexplicable;] in which sense Eusebius does frequently use it. But if any one will translate it [secret,] I shall not withhold it. Valef.

(a) In Read of [τὸν ἀσκήσαν], the Martyr at Antioch] in Nicomedia the Reading is [τὸν ἀσκήσαν], the Martyr of Antioch,] which doubtless is truest. For Lucianus suffer'd not at Antioch, but at Nicomedia, as Eusebius attests in this place; to whom agree Jerome [in Catalog.] Rufinus, and Nicéphorus. The same is confirmed by Lucianus himself in the Epistle he wrote to the Antiochians, when he was (together with some other Martyrs) in prison at Nicomedia. The last words of this Epistle are extant in the Alexandrian Chronicle, at the first year of the Persecution. Valef.

Dioclesian was, together with nine and thirty others, beheaded at the Mines of Braf, which are in Phæno. Alfo Pelus and Nilus, Egyptian Bishops, together with some others, were burnt to death at the same place. Amongst which number we must in no wise omit the mention of Pamphilus the Presbyter, the most admirable person in our Age, and the greatest Ornament of the Church at Cæsarea: Whose Fortitude and courageous Exploits we (b) will declare at a fit and convenient opportunity. [Moreover] of those who were persecuted by a glorious Martyrdom at Alexandria, throughout all Egypt and Thebais, the first to be mentioned is Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, a most divine Teacher of the Christian Religion; also, Faufur, (c) Diur, and Ammonius (perfect Martyrs of Christ) who were his Presbyters. Besides, Pbilas, Iseychius, Pachumius, and Theodoros, Bishops of Churches in Egypt. Moreover, there were many other eminent [Martyrs] who have an honourable mention among the Churches that are in those places and Countries. But our [design] is not to commit to writing the Conflicts of all those who suffered for the Worship of God over the whole World, nor yet to give in an accurate relation of every accident that befel them; but of those rather, who with their own eyes beheld what was done. Moreover, those [Conflicts] ourselves were present at, we will commit to the knowledge of Posterity in (d) another Work: But in this present Book I will annex to what has been declared, a Revocation of what had been practised against us, and the accidents that hapned from the very beginning of the Persecution, which will be most useful to the Readers. Therefore, before the War [was denounced] against us, (during the time that the Emperors were friendly and peaceable towards us,) (e) how great a felicity and plenty of all that is good, the

(b) To wit, in the Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, which is placed after this eighth Book. For in that Eusebius large declares the Martyrdom of Pamphilus, as may there be seen. Moreover, from this place it appears, that that Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, was written by Eusebius after his Ecclesiastical History, and after his Books concerning the Life of Pamphilus the Martyr. Christopherson (who had inserted that whole Appendix before this Chapter) was forced to omit these words of Eusebius here, lest Eusebius should seem to have forgot himself. I must indeed confess, that in the Map, Med. Fide, and Servi, MSS. the Reading is Quædam hæc, quæ nos declarant; but if that Reading be true, Eusebius must mean his Books concerning the Life of Pamphilus the Martyr; which (as before we observed) he wrote before his Ecclesiastical History. Valef.

(c) In the Map, and Med. MSS. this person is called Diur; in Robert Stephens he is named Dilius. Valef.

(d) He means doubtless his Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine. For no other Book but that can be found, wherein Eusebius relates the Conflicts of the Martyrs which he himself had seen. The Opinion of Christopherson is from this passage further disproved, who supposed the Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine was part of this eighth Book: Upon which account, after these words [in another Work] he omitted some words, and inserted others, against the authority of all Copies. Tarnæus was sensible hereof, and therefore at the Margin of his Copy, he put this Greek Scholion at these words, [Εὐσεβίου τοῦ κατὰ τὸν Πέτρον τοῦ ἐπισκόπου τῆς Ἀλεξάνδρειας]. I. e. Note, that you will meet with this writing immediately after his eighth Book. Valef.

(e) How great the felicity of the Roman Empire was in the Reign of Dioclesian and Maximian, Maximian attests in his Genetivium, about the latter end. Neither did the Romans ever succeed more prosperously in their Wars against the Barbarians, than at that time. The Barbarians were in every Engagement slain, and the Limits of the Roman Empire enlarged. If we read the Histories of those Times, we shall find that the Affairs of the Empire were never in a better posture: when four Princes, to wit, two Augusti, and as many Cæsars, did each of them severally repel the Barbarians. But although Dioclesian and Maximian obtain'd so many Victories over the Enemies of the Roman Empire; yet they Triumph'd but once, a little before they reign'd the Empire, as Eutropius and Zonaras do attest. The words of Eutropius are these; Uterque sua die privato habitu imperii insignis mutavit; Nicomedia Dioclesianus, Herulicus Adulianus, post triumphum inluyum, quem Romæ ex numeris gentibus egerant, pompa secularium ibisset, &c. Hieronymus (in his Chronicon) has placed this Triumph of Dioclesian and Maximian on the eighteenth Year of Dioclesian. At which place Statiger (in his Animadversiones) remarks, that Hieronymus has committed an Anachronism. For he says, this Triumph was performed on the twentieth Year of Dioclesian, some Months before he put off his Purple. But Statiger himself is mistaken rather than Hieronymus. For it Dioclesian triumph'd in the twentieth Year of his Empire, that is, some few Months before he resign'd it, it must be said he triumph'd about January, in the year of Christ 304. and put off his Purple on the Kalends of April of the same year; which time of his resignation Latius declares (in Epist.) Whence it follows, that he triumph'd in Winter-time, and in the depth of Winter travell'd from Rome to Nicomedia; neither of which is probable. For neither did the Roman Emperors usually triumph in Winter; nor was Dioclesian (by reason of his Age and Infirmitie of Body) able to endure the trouble of so tedious a Journey. Besides, in the nineteenth year of his Empire, in March and April, Dioclesian was at Nicomedia; at which time that Persecution against the Christians began, as our Eusebius attests in Chap. 5. Book 8. He was at Nicomedia also, when the Palace there was burn'd; as Constantine witnesseth in his Oration ad sanctorum catum, Chap. 25. which Fire happen'd some Months after the Persecution was began. Let us therefore suppose, that that happen'd in May, is it credible that Dioclesian could go from Nicomedia to Rome, triumph there, return from thence to Nicomedia, & put off his Purple there, and retire into Dalmatia to lead the rest of his life in retirement there: Is it (I say) credible he could do all this within ten Months? Besides, the Disease, by which Dioclesian was for some time put out of his Wits, seiz'd him first at Nicomedia, a little after he rais'd the Persecution, as Constantine relates. Wherefore, 'tis very improbable, that Dioclesian, troubled with such a Dilemment, underwent such a long Journey. Further, the Author of the Pangrick (spoken to Maximian and Constantine, does expressly affirm, that Dioclesian and Maximian triumph'd at Rome some years before the twentieth of Dioclesian's Empire; see his words. Statiger therefore is much mistaken, in saying Dioclesian and Maximian triumph'd in the twentieth year of Dioclesian's Empire; Hieronymus, more truly, placed it on the eighteenth of Dioclesian. In which year Latius (in Epist.) observes, that the Emperors gave command by their Edict that Corn should be sold cheap; which seems to have been order'd by them after the Triumph, to please the People of Rome. But Cærenus places this Triumph on the seventeenth year of Dioclesian. Valef.

Roman Empire was dignified with, what words Dioclesian, can be sufficient to declare? At which time those, in whose hands the Supream Power was, having compleated the tenth and twentieth year of their Empire, led their lives in a firm and continued Peace, [spending the time] with Festivities, publick Shows, most splendid Banquets, and Delights. When their Empire was after this sort enlarged without any manner of impediment, and daily augmented with an increase of greatness, on a sudden they revoked the peace with us, and rais'd a pernicious War [against us.] The (f) second year of (f) Euseb. this War was not compleated, when a new and unexpected accident subverted the State of Affairs almost throughout the whole [Roman] Empire. For (g) he that had the precedency amongst the fore-said Emperors, (having been visited by an unfortunate Disease, which drove him into a disorder'd and mad temper of mind,) betook himself to a private and Country life, together with that Empire, [Emperor] who was the next in dignity to him. These affairs were no sooner transacted after this manner, but the whole Roman Empire was (b) divided into two parts, which, as it has been re- per'd about the beginning of the second year of the Persecution, on the Kalends of April, in the year of Christ 304. the Persecution having begun in the month of March of the foregoing year. Whereas therefore Eusebius says [The second year of this War was not compleated,] his meaning must be this [It was the second year current of the Persecution.] In this sense that other place of Eusebius (which occurs in Chap. 3. of his Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, about the end of the Chapter) is to be taken. Valef.

(g) Christopherson translates these words [τοῦ ἀποστασίου τῆς ἐκείνου] thus, primo nostrorum armunarum auctor, the first Author of our sorrows; which Version is not good: But he seems to have follow'd Nicæporus herein; who (in B. 7. Chap. 16.) writes out this Passage of Eusebius; and in stead of his words here set down, uses these [τοῦ ἀποστασίου τῆς ἐκείνου]. Valef.

(h) For Constantinus and Galerius parted the Empire between themselves: Which was the first division of the Empire, as Eusebius here asserts. For although there had been more than one Augustus at the same time, yet they govern'd the Roman Empire together, without making any division of it; thus it was in the Reign of Marcius and Verus. Neither was there any division made of the Empire in the Reign of Diocletianus and Hieroclius; when those two Augusti parted neither the Provinces, nor the Legions. See Eutropius, B. 10. Orosius B. 7. Concerning this Division of the Empire (which Rome was much displeased at) Porphyrius (in his Pangrick to Constantine, written by him in the 15th year of Constantine's Reign,) speaks these words.

Imperii pars fissa poli, divisæ gemebat

ἡρώδης δὲ ἰαβάρης ἐν ἀσδοῖς, πόθεν κατέστη τὸν δολοφόνον ἀνδρῶν· ἀλλὰ τὸς ἑαυτοῦ ὁμοῦς τῶν ἐκ τῆς ἑσπέρης ἡρώδης ἡρώδης, ἀλλὰ πάλιν ἀσδοῖς πόθεν, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡρώδης ἡρώδης, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡρώδης ἡρώδης. I. c. How does this man who were the authors of their own deaths? And alms the judgment of the Church is, not to record them amongst the number of the Martyrs, who have been their own Executioners. For 'tis [an argument] of fear, rather than courage, by death to prevent the dread of punishment. [But the Church looks upon those as Martyrs,] who [suppose nothing to be dreadful upon account of the confession of Christ,] but with alacrity suffer all [tortures,] that a tyrannical and devilish fury can produce [against them.] The Author of this Scholion has made a true remark, to wit, that the Church approves not of Self-murder; when Men out of a fear of death, or through desperation, lay violent hands on themselves. But as often as they are driven to do that by the inflict of the Divine Spirit, which rarely happens; then the Church approves and admires that act: But proposes it not for imitation. See what St. Augustine thought concerning this matter, in his 1st Book, De civitate Dei, chap. 26. Valf.

Galerius upon, the left indeed her Corps to those that came to conduct her [ to the Tyrant; ] but by this Act of hers [ which refunds more than any voice ] she has manifested to all Men that now are, and shall be in future Ages, that the Courage of the Christians is the only thing that is inexpugnable, and which cannot be extirpated by death. Such indeed and so great was the fertility of wickedness produced at one and the same time; the Authors of which were two Tyrants, who had divided the East and West between themselves. And now, what Man is he, that, making his Researches into the cause of these so great [ Calamities, ] will be dubious in affirming the Perfection [ raised against us ] to have been [ the Original of all these Miseries ]? Especially, [ when he considers ] that these mighty Disturbances [ in the Empire ] were not terminated, before the Christians had the free and open profession of their Religion restored to them.

C H A P. XV.

Concerning what happen'd to the Gentiles.

I Ndeed, throughout the whole (a) ten year's space of the Perfection, there was no interruption of mutual Conspiracies and intestine Wars amongst them: The Sea was unpassable to those that made Voyages over it. Neither could any persons arrive at any Haven whatsoever, but they must endure all sorts of Scourges, be tormented, have their Sides torn with Nails, and be interrogated, by their undergoing all sorts of tortures, whether they came from the Enemy's Country: It And at last they underwent the punishment of Crucifixion, or were burnt to death. Furthermore, they provided Shields, Breast-plates, Darts, Spears, and other such-like military Instruments: Also, Gallies, and Weapons for a Sea-fight were everywhere prepared. Neither did any person expect any thing else but an Incurfion of the Enemy. After all these [ Calamities ] follow'd a Famine and a Pestilence; of which we will give a relation at an opportune place and time.

Maximian Emperor of the East, to procure Liberty for the Christians; as our Eusebius relates in B. g. Therefore the Perfection lasted ten years, as 'tis here affirmed. And so the years are noted in the MS. Copies of Eusebius's Chronicon; as Ponticus has observed. Epiphanius therefore is mistaken; who (in his Book De Ponder. & Mensur.) says this Perfection lasted twelve years: See the following Chapter, where our Author relates, that the Perfection ceased on the tenth year. Valf.

C H A P. XVI.

Concerning the Change of Affairs to a better posture.

(b) At (a) Such were the Preparations during the whole time of the Perfection; which by the Grace of God wholly ceased in the tenth year; beginning to be somewhat remis, after the eighth year. For, after the Divine and Celestial Grace demonstrated [ itself ] in a benign and propitious inspection over us, then the Governours in our times, even those very Princes who had formerly waged War against those of our Religion; having most miraculously alter'd their minds, founded a retreat; and extinguish'd the most ardent Flame of the Perfection by Rescripts favourable towards us, and by most mild Edicts. But, neither was any human cause, nor (which some one might conjecture) was the Clemency or Humanity of the Emperors, the occasion hereof; no, 'twas far from that. For, from the beginning of the Perfection unto that very time, they daily invented more and more grievous Cruelties against us, renewing the tortures [ us'd ] towards us by divers Machines [ made use of ] successively, and in a various manner. But the apparent inspection of the Divine Providence itself, which was now reconciled to its people, pursued the Author of these Miseries, and was angry at the (b) Ring-leader of the Wickedness [ committed ] during the whole Persecution. For altho' these things ought to have come to pass, agreeable to the Judgment of the Divine [ Will, ] yet * Wo (says the Scripture) to that Man by whom the offence cometh. Therefore, a punishment sent from God seiz'd him; which having made its beginning at his very Flesh, proceeded even to his Soul. For on a sudden an Impostume arose upon him (c) about the midst of the Privy Parts of his Body; after that, a (d) Fistula in ano; both these Diseases spread incurably, and did eat into his inmost Bowels. From them bred an unspeakable multitude of Worms, and a most noisome Stench proceeded therefrom; [ for, ] before this Disease, the whole Mass of Flesh upon his Body was (by reason of the abundance of Food he devour'd) grown to an immense fatness: Which being then purrified, became an intolerable and most horrid Spectacle to those that approach'd him. Wherefore some of his Physicians, being altogether unable to endure the exceeding noisomeness of the Stink [ that came from him, ] were killed: Others of them, when they could administer no Remedy, (the whole Fabric of his Body being swell'd, and past all hopes of a Recovery,) were cruelly slain.

centor ac signifer nostre persecutionis extiterat, Gr. i. e. But he, who was the next in honour to him, afterwards succeed'd him in the first and chiefest place; who also was the incendiary and first Beginner of our Persecution. Gr. Cædrenus attacks the same. Valf. * Matth. 18. 7.

(c) Ἰστέ καὶ πόθεν τῶν ἀσδοῖς. He means his Genitals; which Victor (in his Epitome) does confirm: Galerius Maximianus (says he) conspicuis Genitalibus defecit.

(d) The phrase in the Greek is, ἡλκεν ἐν ἑαυτῷ σπέρματι; which, being literally rendred, imports thus much; an Ulcer in the Fundament full of holes like a Sponge.

Concerning the Retraction of the Emperors.

*M*OREOVER, whilst he was struggling with these many and great Miseries, he began to be sensible of the villainous Acts he had perform'd towards the Worshippers of God: * Having there-led together the (a) Chief Officers of his Palace, he order'd them without any delay to inhibit the Persecution of the Christians, and by his Decree and Imperial Edict commanded that their Churches should with all expedition be built, wherein they might perform their usual Solemnities, and make Supplications [to God] for the *Emperor. Therefore, what he had given order for in words, being immediately follow'd by an actual performance, the Imperial Edicts were set forth in every City, containing a Revocation of the [Persecution] against us, according to this Form following.

those who served in any public Office. Eusebius usually means, by this phrase, the Grandees of the Palace, whom Amm. Marcellinus does commonly term antichambers, & Imperatoris proximos, the Chief Court-officers, and those nearest to the Emperor. Valef.

EMPEROR CÆSAR GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS, INVICTUS, AUGUSTUS, PONTIFEX MAXIMUS, GERMANICUS MAXIMUS, ÆGYPTIACUS MAXIMUS, THEBAICUS MAXIMUS, SARMATICUS MAXIMUS the Fifth time; (b) PERSICUS MAXIMUS, CARPICUS MAXIMUS the Second time, ARMENICUS MAXIMUS the Sixth time, MEDICUS MAXIMUS, ADIABENICUS MAXIMUS, (c) TRIBUNE OF THE PEOPLE XX, (d) EMPEROR XIX. CONSUL VIII, FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, PROCONSUL. And, EMPEROR CÆSAR ELAVIUS VALERIUS CONSTANTINUS, PIUS, FELIX, INVICTUS, AUGUSTUS, PONTIFEX MAXIMUS, (e) TRIBUNE OF THE PEOPLE V. EMPEROR V. CONSUL, FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, f. PROCONSUL. And, EMPEROR CÆSAR VALERIUS LICINIANUS, PIUS, FELIX, INVICTUS, AUGUSTUS, PONTIFEX MAXIMUS, TRIBUNE OF THE PEOPLE IV. EMPEROR III. CONSUL, FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, PROCONSUL: To the Subjects of their own Provinces, Greeting.

For that's the Reading in the most ancient Copy of Rufinus. Christophorus translated this term ill, thus, Dilectus. He knew not what was the import of the word Imperator. Imperator signifies one thing in the Titles of the Emperors, when 'tis put in the first place like a Pronomen; but it imports another thing, when 'tis subjoin'd to the rest of the Titles. For the word [Emperor] put in the second place, denotes the Victory of the Emperors, and shews how often they were titled Emperors by the Army, after they had obtained a Victory; so Dis infensus is. Valef.

(c) In all Copies, there is an omission of the number of times that Constantine had born the Office of Tribune of the People, while this Edict came forth. I have added the Figure [V] which denotes the fifth time of his bearing the Tribuneship: Which addition is grounded upon a most certain conjecture. Valef.

(f) After this word [Proconsul] (in the Max. Med. Vat. and Savil MSS. and in Nicéphorus) there are the following words; [And, Emperor Cæsar Valerius Licinianus, Pius, Felix, Invictus, Augustus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribune of the People IV. Emperor III. Consul, Father of his Country, Proconsul: To the Subjects of their own Provinces, Greeting.] Which Passage, although it occurs not in Rufinus, yet is of good authority, And first, as to Licinius's Tribuneship Power, the same must be thought of that which was of Galerius's, to wit, that it is to be begun from the time of his being made Cæsar. Now, Licinius was made Cæsar in the Year of Christ 308, on the third of the Ides of November, as it appears in the Fasti of Ilarius. Therefore the 4th year of Licinius's Tribuneship Power began in the Year of Christ 311, on the third of the Ides of November. But this disagrees with what we noted before, when we treated concerning the Tribuneship Power of Galerius. Wherefore one of these places must necessarily be false. For if it were then the fourth Year of Licinius's Tribuneship Power, it was the twenty-first of Galerius's. On the contrary, if this were the twentieth year of Galerius's being Tribune of the People, it was but the third year of Licinius's bearing that Dignity. As to the Consulate of Licinius, there is mention thereof in the Fasti of Prosper, Cassiodorus, and Victorius; where he is placed Consul with Maximianus Augustus Cæsar VIII. In my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus, I had remarked, that Licinius was made Augustus by Galerius, a little before Galerius's death; which I collected from hence, because in this Edict we now speak of, Galerius had made no mention of Licinius's being his Colleague: But since in our MSS. and in Nicéphorus, Licinius is titled Augustus in this Edict of Galerius, that Conjecture of ours is wholly destroy'd. Valef.

Amongst other things which we have constituted Galerius, for the Profit and Utility of the Republick, it was our desire in the first place, that all things should be redress'd according to the Ancient Laws, and Publick Ordinances of the Romans. And we earnestly endeavour'd to effect this, that the Christians, who had relinquish'd the Rites and Usages of their Parents, should be reduced to a good Mind and Intention. For, so great an (g) Arrogancy and Unadvisedness has (by a Considerateness as it were) possess'd and invaded them, that they would not follow those Sanctions of their Ancestors, which even their Parents 'tis likely had before Ratified: But according to their own Arbitrement, and at each Person had a desire, so they would make Laws, and observe them, and assume various Multitudes of different Factions and Dissenting about their Opinions. Therefore, when we had published such an Edict, as should [oblige] them to return to the Rites and Ordinances of their Ancestors; many of them having been expell'd to imminent Dangers, and many having been terrified [with the Menaces of Punishment] underwent various sorts of Death. But, when many persified in this Madness, and we perceived they did neither exhibit a due Worship to the Immortal God's, nor yet to the God of the Christians; having a respect to our Humanity, and that continued usage by which we have been accustomed to bestow Pardon on all sorts of Men: We have thought good that our Indulgence should most readily be extended in this matter also; that the Christians should again be [coerced], and that they may [have licence] to rebuild the Houses wherein they used to assemble themselves, that

(b) We find that the Persians were but once conquered by Galerius. (d) EMPEROR XIX. CONSUL VIII, which was in the Year of Christ 297, as 'tis said firm'd in Faust Ilarius, and in the Alexandrian Chronicle. The same is confirm'd by Licinius, in his Oration intitled Βασιλική, where he relates that the Persians, after that great Defeat they received from the Romans under the conduct of Galerius, spent forty years in Preparations to make amends for that Overthrow; and that, a little before the death of Constantine the Great, they entred upon a War with the Romans. Indeed from that Year of Christ we mentioned [i. e. Anno 297], to the Year wherein Constantine died, there are forty years. Therefore, Eusebius's Chronicle must be corrected, in which this Persian Victory is placed on the seventh Year of Diocletian's whereas it should be placed on his thirteenth Year; as it is in the Edition of Ambrosius Ponticus. Seeing therefore we can find no other Victory that Maximianus obtained over the Persians, this place ought to be pointed (as it is in Nicéphorus) and as we have done in our Translation) after this manner: ἐπελάμβαντο τὴν ὁρμήν Sarmaticus Maximus the fifth time; Persicus Maximus. In Rufinus's old Copy, there is at this place no distinction by Points; but 'tis thus, Sarmaticus quinquies Persicus bi Carpicus Sexies Armenicus Afrum C. Adiabenerum Vltor.

(c) Rufinus renders this Passage thus, Tribunus potestatis civitatis, having been Tribune of the People twenty times. This is the Reading in the MSS. From this place we may perceive, that Galerius was made Cæsar, and Colleague in the Tribuneship Power (or, Tribune of the People) at the same time; since in this Edict he accounts the years of his Tribuneship Power from that time when he was proclaimed Cæsar. Now, he was made Cæsar in the Year of Christ 291, on the Calends of March. Moreover, he put forth this Edict in favour of the Christians, in the Year of Christ 311, in his eighth Consulate, as the Inscription of the Edict declares: Whence it follows, that this Edict was written before the Calends of March. For from that time Galerius began his Tribuneship Power. Valef.

(d) Αὐτοκράτωρ ἑρκατοσάκτων; i. e. Emperor the nineteenth time.

(g) In the Fak. Savil. Max. and Med. MSS. the Reading is [ἐπαρξία καλοῦμεν, ὡς ἀντὶ καλοῦμεν], So great an arrogancy and unadvisedness have they possess'd and invaded them. Valef.

Παροξενία (which Valesius here renders arrogantia, arrogancy) is by Democritus (in his Troica) defined to be speaking ill, and not enduring to hear any Booby else. Dr. Hammond has given a large Account of the Signification of this Word, in his Note on Rom. i. Ver. 29.

Galerius. that so [in future they may be forced] to do nothing contrary to their Discipline. In a particular Rescript we will signify to ou. Judges what it shall becom them to observe. Wherefore, upon account of this our Indulgence they are obliged to supplicate their God for our safety, that of the Republick, and their own; that so both the Publick State of Affairs may in all respects be continued in an entire and safe posture, and they themselves live undisturbed in their own Habitations. These words (which we have, according to our ability, translated out of the Roman into the Greek Language,) are thus: Now therefore it is an opportune time to take a prospect of what follow'd hereupon.

The END of the Eighth Book of the Ecclesiastical History.

In some COPIES this occurs as a SUPPLEMENT to the EIGHTH BOOK.

UT the * Author of this Edict, after this Confession, was forthwith released from his Pains, and ended his Life. Report says, that this Man was the first beginner of that Calamitous Persecution: For, long before the rest of the Emperors, were instigated [to it,] he endeavour'd by force to withdraw the Christians that bore Arms [from their Religion,] especially those that were his Domesticks; some of whom he removed from their Military Dignities, most dishonourably abused others; and moreover, punish'd other some with death: And at length he moved his Colleagues in the Empire to a General Persecution against the Christians. The manner how these Emperors ended their Lives, we judge unfit to be buried in silence: Of pleated after the beginning of the Persecution, as we have (c) before manifested. And, having spent the remaining part of their time in a private and retired condition, they concluded their Lives after this manner: The (d) one, who in respect of his Age and Honour took place of all the rest, was consumed by a lasting and most painful Distemper of Body: The (e) other, who was the next to him in Honour, put an end to his Life by Hanging of himself; undergoing this [Punishment] which was agreeable to a certain Diabolical Prediction concerning him, upon account of those many Villanies he had most audaciously perpetrated. maining two, the (f) last, (who, as we (g) have (f) Gale said, was the Author of the whole Persecution, (g) See underwent those [Miseries,] which we (b) have related before. But he who in Dignity preceded this Man, [I mean] that most favourable and merciful Emperor Constantius, who during the whole time of his Government behaved himself in such sort as besitted an Emperor; who both in other matters represented himself to be most courteous and beneficent, and also was unconcerned in the Persecution raised against us; who preserved the Worshipers of God living under his Government from all manner of Injuries and Molestations, who neither demolished the Edifices of the Churches, nor attempted any other new Design against us: This Emperor (i) These [Constantius I say] obtain'd a (i) fortunate following words are truly thrice happy Conclusion of his Life: Being taken out the only person that ended his Life peaceably of Chap. 13. (k) He, being from the very beginning forthwith proclaimed Supreme Emperor and Augustus by the Soldiers, declared himself to be an Emulator of his Fathers reverend regard towards our Religion. Concerning the

MARTYRS of PALESTINE.

(a) Before I had looked into any of the MSS. I thought these words were added by Rob. Stephens, who in some Copies had found these two Supplements of the 8th Book. But when I had perceived that the same words occurred in all the MSS. I afterwards compelled by all ways imaginable to believe that all those MSS. were transcribed from one and the same Copy. Moreover, this Second Supplement is nothing else but Eusebius's Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine; which appears from the words at the end of this Supplement. For in the Mar. and Alex. MSS. these words occur there; ἡ ἑξῆς τῆς Παναγίας ἐστὶ τῆς περὶ τῶν μαρτύρων παλαιστίνης βιβλίον i. e. the End of Eusebius Pamphilus's [Book] concerning the Martyrs of Palestine. Valef.

IT was the Nineteenth Year of Dioctian's Empire, the Month Xanthicus, which the Romans call April; Flavianus being Governor of the Province of Palestine; in which Year, to wit, when the Feast of the Salutary Passion was at hand, the Edicts on a sudden were everywhere set forth, commanding the Churches to be pulled down to the Ground, and the Scriptures to be consumed with Fire; and ordering, that such as were promoted to Honours should be Degraded; and that the ordinary sort of the 8th People, if they persisted in a Resolution of retaining the Profession of Christianity, should be deprived of their Liberty. Such was the Vehemency of the first Edict against us. But not long after, other Rescripts were brought, wherein order was given, that all Prelates of the Churches every-where, should first be put into Bonds; and afterwards compelled by all ways imaginable to offer Sacrifice.

that all those MSS. were transcribed from one and the same Copy. Moreover, this Second Supplement is nothing else but Eusebius's Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine; which appears from the words at the end of this Supplement. For in the Mar. and Alex. MSS. these words occur there; ἡ ἑξῆς τῆς Παναγίας ἐστὶ τῆς περὶ τῶν μαρτύρων παλαιστίνης βιβλίον i. e. the End of Eusebius Pamphilus's [Book] concerning the Martyrs of Palestine. ## C H A P. I.

Concerning Procopius, Alphaeus, and Zaccheus, Martyrs.

(a) The same Relation is in a Confinement in Prison, was (c) immediately upon his very first arrival brought before the President's Seat of Judicature. And being commanded to offer Sacrifice to those [by the Gentiles,] of Palestine, (b) before he had experienced the Passions of Procopius the first of the Martyrs that appeared in Palestine was Procopius, &c. From whence 'tis evident, that those Acts were translated out of the Greek Copy of Eusebius into Latin. To make this more manifestly apparent, it will in no wise be unutil, to insert here the entire Acts. For many things now our knowledge are contained in them, which neither Baronius nor Nölsken happened to have a sight of. We have transcribed them from a most ancient MS. belonging to the Ninth-century Monastery, which is now in the Hands of that Learned Person Claudian Joly, Canon of the Church at Paris. Their Contents are these:

The Passion of S. Procopius the Martyr, who suffered under Fabianus the President, on the fourth of the Nones of August.

The first of the Martyrs that appeared in Palestine was Procopius: A Person [full] of Celestial Grace, who before his Martyrdom ordered his Life, so that from his very Childhood he applied his Mind to Chastity, and a virtuous Conversation. He so consecrated his Body, that 'twas, judg'd to be almost dead. But he comforted his Mind with such Divine Words, that he infused Strength and Courage into his Body, by this Rejection of his Mind. Bread and Water was his Food and Drink: He fed only on these; which he would forsake for, two, or three, sometimes for seven days together, and then return to that his Food again. Also, a Meditation on Divine Expressions had bound up his Mind so fast, that he continued indefatigable in it Night and Day. He made himself in high Example of Courtesy and Meekness, in Divine Matters; He had also attained to competency in external Accomplishments. His original Extract he had at Elia [i. e. Jerusalem]; But by Courtesy and Habitation he was a Scythopolitan. He served in three Offices in that Church; one was that of a Reader, another consisted in his Interpretation of the Syrian Tongue; and the third was an Impression of Hands, to cast out Devils. And when he (together with his Companion) was sent from Scythopolis to Caesarea, he was led from the very Gates to the President; and before he had experienced the Miseries of Imprisonment and Bonds, he was upon his very first arrival commanded by Flavianus the President, to offer Sacrifice to the Gods. But with a loud voice he answered that there was not a Multiplicity of Gods, but One Maker and Framer of all things. The President, smitten with that Expression of his, and being wounded in his own Conscience, assented to what he said. And, bestowing himself to other Arguments, [persuaded him] to Sacrifice at least but to the Emperors. But the Holy Martyr of God, desisting what he said, repeated that Passage of Homer:—It is not good [to have] many Lords, but there be one Lord, one King. Which words being heard, it being supposed that he spoke something that was of ill consequence to the Emperors, by the President's command he was led to Execution; and being Beheaded, had an entrance into a Celestial Life, or found a compendium may into Heaven, on the seventh day of Dehus, that is, the Month July, which amongst the Romans is called the Nones of July, in the first Year of the Persecution against us. This was the first Martyrdom that was consummated in Caesarea, our Lord Jesus Christ Reigning, to whom be Honour and Glory for ever and ever, Amen. These Acts are also extant in two MSS. belonging to the Library of St. Germans. Valef.

(b) The foregoing Acts of the Passion of St. Procopius renders this Passage almost word for word, thus; Primumque carceris vel vinculorum experire angustias, before he had experienced the miseries of Imprisonment and Bonds: By which words the Cruelty of the Judge is signified. For the Roman Presidents were wont first to imprison those Offenders that were apprehended and brought before them, and to interrogate them afterwards at their leisure. Valef.

(c) The foregoing Acts word this Passage thus; In ipso ingressu suo in iudice Flaviano ante sacrificium impellitur; i. e. He was upon his very first arrival, commanded by Flavianus the President, to offer Sacrifice to the Gods. Many things are here omitted in the Greek Text of Eusebius, which must be made perfect by those Acts in Latin (the Translation whereof we have before inserted.) For when Eusebius had here said expressly, that Procopius upon his first arrival was brought before the Judge, he adds nothing concerning the place from whence he came, where he was apprehended, or to what place he was brought: Nothing of which ought to have been omitted. Besides, Eusebius does accurately relate the Decent and Country of other Martyrs mentioned in this Book; and if any of them had attained any degree of Ecclesiastick Honour, he does usually take notice of that also. But of this Person (who was the Chief, and Leader of all the Palestine Martyrs) we see no such Remarks made. This, 'tis probable, was not the fault of Eusebius, but of his Expressors. For, in the Latin Acts, which, as we before evidenced, were translated out of Eusebius, all these Circumstances are manifestly declared. See the Translation of the Latin Acts, in Note (a.) in this Chapter. Valef.

stified Gods, he said that he knew but one only God, to whom Sacrifice was to be offered, according to that manner which he himself had appointed. But when he was bidden to Sacrifice to the four Emperors, having uttered a Sentence which was in no wise pleasing to them (that which he said, was these words of the Poet [to Homer]; It is not good [to have] many Lords, but there be one Lord, one King) he was

Diocletian, was forthwith beheaded, (d) on the eighth day of the month (e) Deifus, that is ( f as the Romans stile (d) The) before the seventh of the Ides of June, on Latin Copies do vary a little here: In Claudius Joly's Copy (the Translation of which you have in Note (a.) in this Chapter,) the words are, Deifus Septima Julii mensis, que nonas Julias dicitur apud Latinos; i. e. on the seventh day of Deifus, [that is the ] month July, among the Romans is called the Nones of July: In the two MSS. Copies belonging to the Library of St. Germanus, the Reading is thus, Dies erat Septima Julii mensis, que 7. Idus Julii dicitur apud Latinos; i. e. It was the seventh day of the Month July, which amongst the Romans is called the seventh of the Ides of July: In the Greek Text of our Eusebius here; the words are these, αὐτὸς ἡμέρῃ 8ης τοῦ μηνὸς Δεφίου, τὸν ὅστις ἐστὶν ἡ 7ῆς ἰδέων τοῦ μηνὸς Ἰουλίου; (as the Romans stile it) before the seventh of the Ides of June. By their words in the Latin Copies of the MSS. in St. Germanus's Library, the Title before Claudius Joly's Copy of these Acts is to be amended, where 'tis said Procopius suffer'd on the seventh of the Nones of August. Notwithstanding, in all the Martyrologies, the Martyrdom of Procopius is fit on the eighth of the Ides of July. The Greeks also celebrate the Memory of the Great Martyr Procopius on the same day; it may be seen in their Martyrium. But that Procopius is a different person from ours, although he was born at Jerusalem, and suffer'd at the same time almost; and in the same City, as our Procopius did. For our Procopius was a Reader, and an Exorcist, as Eusebius attests: But the other was a Captain of Egypt. The first Procopius was a Christian from his Childhood; the second was at first a Whiplapper of Demons. Our Procopius was beheaded, having suffered no Tortures, and so crowned with Martyrdom by a most unaccountable and cruel manner of death. The other Procopius suffer'd a tedious and most cruel Martyrdom, having undergone most horrid tortures under two Presidents of Palestine, Jussus and Flavianus. Upon which account he is reckon'd by the Greeks amongst the Μεγαλομάρτυρες. Great-Martyrs: See Book 6. Chap. 32. Note (b.) Lastly, our Procopius was taken at Sycharopolis, brought to Cæsarea in Palestine, and there beheaded. The other was apprehended in Egypt, and Martyr'd in Cæsarea, a City of Phœnicia (which was also call'd Tamara) if we may believe Simon Metaphrastes. Valf.

(f) It is, I perceive, taken for granted amongst all Men, that the Months of the Syro-Macedonian years were wholly the same with the Julian Months, from that time when Julius Cæsar publish'd his Year. For Salazar and our Petravius do in many places affirm this; and the only difference (as they say) was, that the Syro-Macedonian began their Year from Oscher. But there are many things which make me dissent from their Opinion. For first, Bede, (in his Ephemeris, and in his Book De ratione Temporum) says, that the Months of the Greeks he got from Apollonius, which answers to Dionysius. But Apollonius, in his Life of Euphrasius, Bishop of Gaza, attests, that those of Gaza began their Year from the Month Dius. For these are his words at pag. 1390. Primo mensis qui ab eis vocatur Dios, deinde etiam secundus, qui dicitur Apellus, i. e. In the first month which they call Dius, then also in the second which is termed Apellus. The Emperor Julianus (in Antiochia) confirms this, where he expressly says, that Lous was the tenth month amongst the Syrians. Now, if they began their Year from Oscher, then Lous (which answers to August) would be the eleventh month, but the eleventh month. The same is manifest by Julianus (in Antiochia, pag. 70.) in these words, ὁ μηνὸς αὐτὸν ἐν ταῖς ἑξήκοντα ἡμέραις ἐστὶν ὁ καλεῖται ἐν τοῖς ὁμοῖς ἑξήκοντα ἡμέραις; ὁ μηνὸς αὐτὸν ἐν ταῖς ἑξήκοντα ἡμέραις ἐστὶν ὁ καλεῖται ἐν τοῖς ὁμοῖς ἑξήκοντα ἡμέραις; i. e. The Calends of the Syrians were come, and Cæsar goes to the Temple of Jupiter Philias again. Then came the Calends of January. (For, in my Notes on Book 23. of Ammonius Marcellinus, pag. 255, I have shewn that the μηνὸς αὐτὸν signifies the same with the Calends of January, and Cæsar goes to the Temple of the God Genius (as Concerning the Temple of this God Genius at Antioch, see Eusebius's Hist. Book 1. Chap. 16.) There passing by the ominous day, he renewed his vows in the Temple of Jupiter Philias according to the custom of his Antiochians. Seeing therefore Julianus attests, that the New-Moon of the Syrians Year did a little precede the Calends of January; it is manifest that the beginning of the Roman and Syrian Year was not the same. But, it may be plainly collected from the same place of Julianus, that Dius was the first Month of the Year amongst the Antiochians: For Julianus says, that on the Calends of the first Month of the Syrians, he went to the Temple of Jupiter, to sacrifice, because their first Month was fac'd to Jupiter, and received its name from him. For it was call'd Διὸς ἀπὸ τοῦ Διὸς, from Jupiter: And the first Month was rightly call'd after his name, who was thought to be the principal cause, and origin of all things. Now if Oscher were the first Month of the Syrian Year, that passage in Julianus would have been impertinent. For, when the Antiochians would deride Julian, for his assiduity in worshipping the Gods, they produce the example thereof; [The Calends of the Syrians were come, and Cæsar goes to the Temple of Jupiter Philias again: Then came the Calends of January, and Cæsar goes to the Temple of the God Genius.] There must therefore necessarily be some little space of time between the Calends of the Syrians, and the Romans, that so Julian might deservedly be derided by the Antiochians for his too frequent offering of Sacrifice. It is therefore necessary, that either Apellus must have been the first Month amongst the Syrians, (which is Bede's Opinion), or else Dius. Thus far concerning the beginning of the Syro-Macedonian Year; which we have demonstrated to be different from the beginning of the Julian Year. We will now enquire into the Syro-Macedonian Months, and see whether they began and ended at the same time that the Roman Months did. Indeed, this place in Eusebius does plainly shew, that the beginning of the Months amongst the Syrians and Romans was not the same. For it makes the eighth Day of the Month Deifus to be the same with the seventh of the Month June. Therefore the Syrian Month Deifus began one Day before the Roman Month June. Moreover, Marius (in the Life of Porphyrius) affirms, that the Months of the Inhabitants of Gaza preceded the Roman Months five Days. His words are these, *Pluit autem Dominus, &c. Our Lord sent a continued Rain from the eighth day of the Month Audynus to the tenth. Now Audynus amongst the Romans is January. For their Months precede the Roman Months five Days. But on the eighth day we celebrated the Feast of the Epiphany, professing God. From which words 'tis apparent, that the beginning of the Months amongst those of Gaza was almost the same with the beginning of them amongst the Egyptians. Further, Epiphanius (in his Book De Ponderib. Chap. 20.) makes the sixteenth day of May the same with the twenty-third of the Grecian Month Artemisius. The Form for the Months amongst the Tyrrians was different from this; they made use of the Macedonian Account of the Months. For, in the Acts at Tyre (which are related in the Ninth Act of the Council of Calcedon) the tenth Day of the Month Perisius is confounded with the twenty-fifth of February: And in the fifth Act Council. Constatinus, sub. Mene, the twenty-eighth Day of the Tyrian Month Lous is said to have been the sixteenth Day of the Roman Month September. From all this it may be concluded, that the Account of the whole Year, and of the Months, was not of one and the same form amongst the Syrians. For those of Gaza computed them after one way, those of Tyre after another, and those of Cæsarea used them a third manner. But, I am fully persuaded, that the Cæsareans used Months, wholly computed after the Julian Form. For, in all places of this Book of Eusebius's concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, wherever mention is made of the Macedonian Months amongst the Cæsareans, (the mention whereof does frequently occur in it;) the Days of those Months do always agree with the Days of the Roman Months; excepting this only place in this first Chapter. Therefore, I think, that the Reading in the Text of Eusebius here should be thus, 8ης ἡμέρας Ἰδίων, on the seventh Day of the Month Deifus. Valf.*

(f) the fourth Day of the Week. This was the Diocletian, first Martyrdom that was consummated at Cæsarea in Palestine: But after him, very many Pre-Diocletian of Churches in that Province, having at the same time cheerfully undergone most grievous tortures, exhibited to the Spectators a relation of it, on the illustrious Combats. But others, dispirited by the fear of their fear, were immediately discouraged at the very first attack made against them. Every one of the rest underwent various and inter-changeable sorts of tortures: One was scourged with innumerable stripes, another was rack'd with the Pleth of his Sides scarp'd off with Iron Nail-staves, and was loaded with an insupportable burthen of

ent Christians having received a full Account of the seven Days of the Week from the Jews, named them as they did. Therefore they called them the first of the Sabbath, the second of the Sabbath, &c. Tertullian in his Book De juminis. Sometimes they called them feria: Feria is the same with Sabbath. Therefore, as the Jews termed the Week-days the first, the second, the third of the Sabbath; and so on to the seventh-day, which they called the Sabbath; so the ancient Christians termed them the first, second, and third Feria, &c. making an alternation only in this, that they did not keep the Sabbath-day holy, as did the Jews; but observ'd their Sabbath on the first day of the Sabbath, which they also call'd Sabbat, or the Lord's-Day. So Isidore in his Book, De Naturæ Rerum, Chap. 3. Bede (in his Book De Ratione Temporum) says the Week-days were call'd Feria, because the Clergy-men, by the Decree of Pope Sylvester, were order'd to keep every day holy. But this Opinion cannot be true; for the Days of the Week were call'd Feria long before Pope Sylvester's time, as Tertullian informs us. Moreover, not only the Christians, but the Gentiles also received the Computation of the Week from the Jews, as Isidore informs us, in the Close of his last Book against Arianism. But the Gentiles call'd the first Week by the names of the seven Planets; which names continue still in use amongst most Nations, being as it were certain Reliques of the ancient Error of the Gentile: See Tertullian in his Book Ad Nationes. Valf. The Ecclesiastical Year of old began at Easter, the first Week whereof was all Holyday, the Days being distinguish'd by prima, secunda, tertia, &c. added unto Feria. From thence the Days of any other Week began to be call'd Feria prima, secunda, &c. See Mr. Jo. Gregory of Oxford, in his Tract De ævi & Spæchis, Chap. 5. The Original of the Names, which we in England give to the Days of the Week, may be seen in Vergerius Antiquitates, pag. 68, &c. Edit. Antwerp, 1604.

* Πρώτη αὐτῶν, were termed primus Martirium, the first Martyrdom: So the Latin Acts render it; whence it appears, the Translator thereof did read μαρτυρίον. Valf.

Dioclesian, Bonds, by reason of which some happen'd to have [the Sinews] of their Hands weakened and made feeble. Nevertheless they all endured whatever befel them agreeable to the secret Judgment of God. For one being taken by the Hand by some others, who led him to the Altar, and thrust the impure and detestable Sacrifice into his Right Hand, was dismiss'd, as if he had Sacrificed. Another, who had not in any wise touch'd [the Sacrifice,] yet when others affirmed that he had sacrific'd, went silently away. A third, taken up half-dead, was cast forth as if he had been so really; and being loosed from his Bonds, was computed amongst their number who had offer'd Sacrifice. A fourth, crying out, and making protestation that he would not perform what he was enjoy'd by them to do, was stricken on the Mouth, and being silenc'd by a great company of persons purposely appointed upon that account, was forcibly thrust out, altho' he had not sacrific'd. * So highly did they every way esteem their being thought to have perfected what they desired! Of all these therefore, who were so numerous, only Alphesus and (g) Zacheus obtain'd the Crown of Holy Martyrdom: Who, after they were scourged, and had their Flesh scraped off with Torturing-Irons, when they had endured most grievous Bonds and cruciating Pains therein, after various other tortures they were put into the Stocks, where for four and twenty hours space their feet were distended to the fourth hole, and having confess'd that there was but one only God, and one King Jesus Christ, as if they had utter'd something that was blasphemous and impious, they underwent the same sort of punishment with the first Martyr [Procopius,] and were beheaded on the seventeenth day of the Month Dius, which day amongst the Romans is before the fiftieth of the Calends of December.

(g) He was a Deacon of the Church of Gadara Concerning whom we have this passage in the Martyrology at the 18th of November: The commemoration of the Holy Martyr Michaeus, Deacon of Gadara, and Alphesus. The blessed Zacheus was led before the Tribunal, having an heavy Iron-Chain about his Neck. Vale!

Concerning Romanus the Martyr.

*(a) The Greeks, in their Account, make mention of two Romanus's both Martyrs: the one, they say, was condemned by Alcibiades the Prefect at Antioch, in the Reign of Galerius: The other was a Deacon of Gadara (concerning whom Eusebius here speaks) who, as they affirm, suffered under Dioclesian. But, in as much as they confess, that both of them suffered on one and the same day, for they affirm that both of them had their Tongues cut out, that they both spoke after they were cut out, and that both of them were afterwards strangled in prison, 'tis plain, that the Greeks mistake in their making of them two distinct Martyrs. I wonder that this Opinion of theirs should please Romanus in his Notes on the Martyrology. If there were two Martyrs called by the same name, to wit, Romanus, and if they both suffered Martyrdom on the same day at Antioch, why does Eusebius mention but one here? It will perhaps be answered, that Eusebius was resolv'd to speak of the Martyrs of Palestine only in this Book, and therefore that he only mentioned Romanus the Deacon, because he was a Palestinian. But Eusebius has made mention of this Martyr in another place, to wit, in his second Book concerning the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, where he acknowledges but one Romanus who was Martyr'd at Antioch. *Vale!

*(b) Amongst the Primitive Christians, especially in the smaller Towns, because the Clergy were few in number, one and the same Clergy-man performed two or three Offices. Hence 'tis, that in the Acts of Procopius the Martyr, (which are related before) Procopius is said to have born three Offices at the same time in the Church of Synopolis, to wit, the Office of a Reader, of an Interpreter, and of an Exorcist. After the same manner therefore Romanus was both a Deacon, and also an Exorcist in the Church of Gadara. See Petrus Author Question. Vero. 3. Novi Testamenti, Chap. 101. *Vale!

(c) Exorcist in the Church of Caesarea: Coming to Antioch at that very time when the Churches were demolish'd; and having seen many (d) Men, Women, and Children flocking in Crowds to the Temples of the Idols, and offering Sacrifice, he judg'd the sight thereof to be a thing intolerable, and being incited by a Zeal for the Divine Worship, he drew near; and crying out with a loud voice, [began] to rebuke them. Being forthwith apprehended upon account of this his boldness, he demonstrated himself (if ever any other person did) to be a most courageous Witness of the Truth. For, when the Judge had condemn'd him to be burnt to death, having gladly received his sentence of Condemnation with a cheerful Countenance and a Mind most courageously dispos'd, he was led to execution. Then being bound to the Stake, and the combustible matter being laid together, whilst the Officers, that were about to kindle the Fire, waited for the Determination of the (e) Emperor who was then present, he cried out, where am I this, he was by command brought before the Emperor, in order to his being punished with a new sort of Punishment, [to wit,] the cutting out of his Tongue. Having most courageously endured this punishment, he gave a real Demonstration to all Men, that the Divine Power is always present with those who undergo any sort that they of Torture whatsoever for Religion, which does mitigate their Pains, and corroborate them with an alacrity of Mind. This courageous person therefore being sensible of the newness of his punishment, was in no wise terrified, but willingly put forth his Tongue, and with a most cheerful alacrity produced it to those who cut it out. After which punishment he was put into Bonds, and being for a long time afflicted in prison, in conclusion (when the (f) twentieth year

(d) Many of those persons had renounced Christ, as Eusebius declares in his second Sermon concerning the Resurrection; where he speaks of the Tortures inflicted on Romanus, which he mentions not here. Vale!

(e) I suppose he means Galerius Caesar; For Dioclesian made his abode then at Nicomedia. The Caesars, like Apparitors and Officers, went all over the Bounds of their own District. Indeed, in that Year when the Persecution began, Dioclesian lived (together with Galerius) at Nicomedia, in April, as Eusebius attests in his eighth Book. Also, a little after the Persecution began, when the Imperial Palace at Nicomedia was burnt by Lightning, Dioclesian was at that City, as Constantius informs us in his Oratio Ad Ceterum Sanctorum. Wherefore he could not be at Antioch, when Romanus was condemned to be burnt; which happened about the beginning of the Persecution. For Romanus was strangled at the 14th of the Calends of December, after he had lain in prison five Months, as Eusebius here attests. Vale!

*(f) This place is in an especial manner to be taken notice of, because it most evidently declares the Year wherein Dioclesian's Persecution began. For Eusebius says, that in the first year of the Persecution the Emperor's Vicennalia (i. e. the Festivals for his having arrived to the twentieth year of his Reign) were kept; which can only fall on that year, wherein Dioclesian was the eighth time Consul, and Maximian the tenth. For, in this year (which was the year of Christ 303.) Dioclesian's twentieth year was begun at the fiftieth of the Calends of October; that being the first of Dioclesian's Reign, Carinus II. and Numerianus Coll in the year of Christ 284; as 'tis set forth in the Alexandrian Chronicle. But, there arises no small difficulty from what Eusebius here says, to wit, that Romanus suffered Martyrdom on the seventeenth day of November, when Dioclesian's Vicennalia were kept. Whence it seems to follow, that the first day of Dioclesian's Reign must have been in the month of November, and not in September, as the Alexandrian Chronicle attests. Wherefore, 'tis necessary, that either in our Eusebius, or else in the Alexandrian Chronicle, the name of the month should be mistaken. Unless we say, that Dioclesian's Vicennalia were kept at Antioch not on the same day which was the first of his Empire, but a little later. Eusebius indeed says (in his Chronicon) that Constantine's Vicennalia were kept at Nicomedia, and in the following year celebrated at Rome.*

Disquisition. of the Emperor's Reign was come, wherein, (g) according to the usual indulgence, liberty was publicly proclaim'd to all persons in all places that were in bonds, he only, lying in the Stocks, and having both his Feet defended to the distance of five holes, was strangled, and (according to his desire) was adorn'd with [the Crown of] Martyrdom. This person being a Palestinian, altho' he suffered [Martyrdom] without the limits of his own Country, yet deserves to be reckon'd amongst the Martyrs of Palestine. These things were after this manner performed in the first year of the Persecution, when it rag'd against the Prelates only of the Church.

Crimes must be discharged from their imprisonment; the Emperor's Edict being set forth for that purpose, which they called an Indulgentia. See the Con. Theodof. tit. de indulgentia criminum. Valef.

C H A P. III.

Concerning Timotheus, Agapius, Thecla, and Eight other Martyrs.

AFTERWARDS, in the second Year, when the rage of the Persecution against us was become more violent and sharp, Urbanus being at that time Governour of the Province, the Imperial Edicts having been then first brought, wherein it was by a general command order'd, that all persons in all places and Cities whatsoever should publicly offer Sacrifice and Incense to the Idols; Timotheus underwent innumerable tortures at Gaza, a City of Palestine: After all which he was consumed by a remiss and slow Fire, and having exhibited a most genuine proof of his sincere Piety towards God, by a patient suffrance under all his torments, he obtain'd the Crown belonging to the sacred and victorious Champions of Religion. Agapius also, and that Thecla (a) who lived in our times, having (together with the fore-said Timotheus) given a demonstration of their most undaunted Courage and Steadfastness of Mind, were condemn'd to be devour'd by Wild-Beasts. Who is he that would not have wonder'd at the sight of what follow'd hereupon, or that would not have been astonish'd at the hearing a relation thereof? For when the Heathens celebrated their publick Festivals, and [exhibited] their usual Shows; there was a great report, that (b) together with those others whom they had a mighty esteem for, the [Christians] also, lately condemn'd, were to be expos'd to a Combat with the Wild-Beasts [in the Amphitheatre]. This report therefore being increased and spread

(a) These words [of] Thecla, who lived in our times, are not without reason, added by Eusebius. For by them it was his intent to manifest, that this Thecla should be distinguished.

gilted from the other Thecla, who was Companion to St. Paul the Apostle. In the Martyrdom, at the 19th of August, this Thecla is called, a Berytina, Berytus; the meaning whereof I know not. For this Thecla here spoken of was a Palestinian, not born at Berytus a City of Tyberia. Yet, it may be, this Thecla was a Theriacan; for neither were all those, whose Martyrdoms Eusebius here relates, Palestinians; nor does he in this Book, treat of the Martyrs in the masculine gender, who suffered Martyrdom in Palestine. Valef.

(b) The reading here is, ἐν τῇ ἀλυσὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ ἀγῶνισαν; our Rendition whereof is, together with those others whom they had a great esteem for. Chrysostom read ἐν ἀλλοῖς, but took it in the neuter gender; for thus he has rendered it; inter aliaque magnopere ipsi in opatione erant ad contemplandum, amongst other things, which they had a great esteem for the spectators of. I suppose it to be spoken in the masculine gender; and that he means those more eminent Berytians, who amongst the Grecians were termed ἀγῶνας, i.e. the stoutest and strongest sort of Men, who set themselves out to combat with the Wild-Beasts before the People in the Amphitheatre. Such a one was he, whom the People in the Amphitheatre at Constantinople call for, in these Words, Ὁ τῶν ἀγῶνων ἀγῶνας ἀγῶνας; which Words Cassiodorus [interprets]. Lib. 2. this renders, exultet bestia arteque parabolis compansatur. Valef.

every-where, six Youths, whereof one was born Disquisition. in Pontus, by name Timolus, another born at Tripolis a City of Phœnicia, whose name was Dionysius, the third was Sub-Deacon of the Disquisition. Church, his name Romulus; besides the two Egyptians, (c) Panfilus and Alexander; and another Alexander (c) In the ander, Name like to the former, born at Gaza: Maz. and Mod. MSS. [these six young Men, I say,] having first bound their Hands together, that they might thereby manifest their great readiness and alacrity to [undergo] Martyrdom, ran in great haste to Urbanus, as he was going to the Amphitheatre, and confess'd themselves to be Christians: And, by their being prepared to [endure] all sorts of tortures, they demonstrated, that they who make their boast in the Worship of the supreme God, can in no wise be terrified at the furious assaults of the Wild-Beasts. The President himself, and those who are called Publici, stood round him, having been forthwith struck with no small amazement, [these Confessors] were [order'd to be] shut up in prison. Nor many days after two others being added to their number, (one whereof, by name Agapius, having before them undergone horrid and various sorts of tortures, had formerly been [signalized] for several Confessions: The other mingled boldly necessities to them, his name Dionysius) all these, being now made up eight in number, were beheld on one and the same day at Cæsarea, [to wit,] on the twenty fourth Day of the Month Dysmus, which precedes the ninth of the Calends of April. At the same time happen'd a change of the Emperors, he that had the precedency of all the rest and the next to him in place, [having left off their Imperial attire] put themselves into a private habit: And the Affairs of the Empire began to be in an ill posture. The Roman Empire being soon after divided, there brake out an implacable War between [the Romans] themselves: Neither could the Divisions, and (which were the Consequences thereof) the tumults be made up and appeas'd, before the Christians throughout the whole Roman Empire had a Peace raised and firm'd to them. For, as soon as this Peace (like Light after a cloudy and most darksome Night,) drest forth its Rays upon all Men, the publick Affairs of the Roman Empire were again restor'd to their pristine Sabidity, Amity, and Peaceableness; all persons recovering that mutual Friendliness which had been deriv'd from them from their Ancestors. But we will give an exact account of these matters at a more opportune place and time. Now we are to prosecute the subsequent Series of our Narration.

C H A P. IV.

Concerning Apphianus the Martyr.

Maximinus Caesar, (a) from the very time of Maximian's his coming to the Empire, (as if he would demonstrate to all Men the tokens of his innate hatred against God, and of his own impiety,) (a) Christophorus has rendered attempted a more violent Persecution against those of our Religion, than the preceding Emperors he translates it, Maximinus Caesar, who by his own power and strength had possess'd himself of the Empire: As if ὑποκρίναι, which is the Greek term here, signified, by his own power and strength. Indeed, Maximinus proclaimed himself Augustus, as our Eusebius relates in Chap. 12. Book 8. But he was made Cæsar by Galerius Maximianus. Moreover, Eusebius speaks here of Maximinus, whilst he was only Cæsar, and of the time when he had that title first conferred on him, to wit, in the second year current of the persecution, immediately after the resignation of Diocletianus, and Eleutherius. The import therefore of Eusebius's words words is this, that Maximinus, as soon as he was made Cæsar, shewed a proof of his impiety, by a most cruel Persecution of the Christians. Wherefore [αὐτῶν] must be rendered [from the very time.] Now, Maximinus was made Cæsar in the year of Christ 304, on the Calends of April, as Idatius (in fastis) declares: Which agrees very well with the account here given by our Eusebius. For he relates that Maximinus (after the Renovation of Dioclesian) was created Cæsar in the second year of the Persecution; immediately after which promotion (that he might shew his Power) he renewed the Persecution against the Christians. But this must not be understood of that very year, where-in Maximinus was made Cæsar: For during that year (Affairs being then in Confusion, and Galarius scarce well settled in the Empire) Maximinus was quiet. Therefore Eusebius mentions no Martyrdoms in Palestine during that year. But in the year following, which was the third of the Persecution, Maximinus set forth his Edicts against the Christians, and renewed the Persecution, as Eusebius expressly relates in this Chapter. Val.

[had done.] When therefore no small Iniquitude was imputed on all persons, and they were dispersed some in one place some in another, every one making it his chief business to avoid the danger, and all the Provinces were involved in a most terrible commotion, where expressions can be sufficient for us deservedly to set forth the divine love, and the bold and free confession of God, made by that blessed and truly innocent Lamb, Apphianus the Martyr, who exhibited an admirable example of Piety towards the only God, in the sight of all the Inhabitants of Cæsarea, (b) before the Gates of that City, when he had not fully completed the twentieth year of his age? Indeed, whilst he resided at Berytus, where he had formerly spent much time upon account of [furnishing himself with] (c) secular Literature, (d) he had his descent from very rich Parents: It is wonderful to relate how, during his continuance in that City, he subdued youthful Lusts: And having in no wise been debauch'd in his Morals, either by the vigour and youthfulness of his Body, or the society of his young Companions, he became a lover of temperance; leading an orderly, chaste, and religious life, according to the (e) Precepts of Christianity, and framing his Convert [agreeable thereto.] If it be [supposed] convenient that we should mention his Country, and commend it, because it produced so courageous a Champion of Piety; we will most readily do it. If any one therefore knows (e) Palestina, a City of no mean note in Lybia; therewith this young man was born. After his return from his studies at Berytus, (his Father being promoted to the chiefest place of Honour in his own Country, he was unable to endure the converse of his Father, and thence that were his Relations, because they refused to live according to the Sanctions of Religion: But having been inspired as it were by a Divine Spirit, and (by reason of his innate desire after Philosophy, or rather after the divine and true Wisdom) making small account of the reputed Glory of this Life, and contemplating the Delights of the Body, he secretly withdrew himself from his Relations: And being not at all sollicitous about a daily provision for his subsistence, because of his hope and faith in God, he was led by the Hand [as it were] to the City of Cæsarea, by the Divine Spirit, where the Crown of Martyrdom for Religion awaited him. Being

(f) conversant there with us, having in a short time made a great proficiency by reading the sacred Scriptures, and furnish'd himself with courage of Mind by congruous exercises of a strict and severest abstinence; at length he made such a glorious conclusion of his life, as was ever law could not but be astonish'd thereat; and he that shall hear the bare relation of it, cannot but deservedly admire his confidence, his fearlessness, his continued earnestness and constancy of Mind, and above all the boldness of his attempt, which g) contains most evident signs of a zeal for Religion, and of a Spirit more than human. For when Maximinus renew'd the Intolerencies practis'd towards us, in the third year of our Persecution [under Dioclesian], and when the Tyrant's Edicts were first sent abroad over all the Provinces, [ordering] the Governors to make it their chief care and business, that all the Inhabitants in every City should publicly offer sacrifice; and when the Criers had made proclamation over all the City Cæsarea, that the Men, together with the Women and Children, should by the Governor's order go to the Temples of the Idols; and moreover when the Tribunes of the Soldiers had summon'd every particular person by name out of a written Roll; (all the [Christians] every-where being put into confusion by this unspeakable storm of Afflictions) this foresaid person, (having communicated to no body what he was about to do, it being unknown to us who lived in the same House with him, and even to the whole military Guard that stood round the Governor,) fearlessly approach'd Urbanus, as he was offering Sacrifice; and having with an intrepid Mind catch'd hold on his right Hand, stop'd him immediately from sacrificing. Then, with a divine gravity and confidence of Mind he prudently advis'd and exhorted him to desist from that erroneous way [of worship.] For 'tis absurd [said he] to relinquish [the Worship] of the one and only true God, and offer sacrifice to Idols and Demons. This the young Man attempted, induced thereto ('tis very probable) by a Divine power, which openly proclaimed

(f) Symeon Metaphrastes, who professes he transcribed the Martyrdom of Apphianus (or, as he calls him, Amphianus) out of Eusebius, has altered this passage, thus, And having been conversant with us in divine Studies, and instructed in the sacred Scriptures by the great Martyr Pamphilus, he obtained no mean habit of virtue; by which he opened a passage for himself, whereby he procured the Crown of Martyrdom. But Eusebius attests here, that Apphianus was not instructed in the sacred Scriptures by Pamphilus the Martyr, but by himself: Which, as I judge, is the truest account. For our Eusebius was a Person much learn'd than Pamphilus. But the Menaia of the Greeks, and the Menology set forth by Cassius, agree with Symeon Metaphrastes: Excepting only in this, which Metaphrastes relates, that Apphianus (after he was returned from his studies at Berytus), when he came to Cæsarea, was there instructed by Pamphilus. But in the Menaia, and in the Menology, Apphianus (with his Brother Isidorus) is said to have been instructed by Pamphilus at Berytus; no mention being made of Eusebius. So careful were the latter Greeks, that the best of Martyrs should not be said to have been instructed by Eusebius Pamphilus, who, as they persecuted themselves, was an Heretic. Val.

(g) The reading I judge, should be [ἐν τῇ πόλει τῆς παλαιᾶς, ἥτις καὶ τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐκείνον ἐκείνην ἔπεισε, ἀποφύγειν τὴν λατρίαν.] Val.

(a) Idatius in his Fastis, calls it Idatius, the knowledge whereof was not till the year 1600, when the Menology. At Berytus he was a scholar of the Law, a many have taken notice from Origen that he was a scholar of Origen and others. Hence 'tis, that Eusebius has the term conversant, that is, secular, or mundane literature. Gregorius Nyssenus (in de vita, Nicolaï ad filium) calls Berytus de vita Origenis, and so Origen was a scholar of Origen at Berytus. In the Alexandria of the Greeks, at the second year of the Persecution, with his Brother Isidorus, is mentioned to have been made in the Christian Religion by Pamphilus the Martyr, at Berytus. Val.

(b) Ramus in his Fastis, calls it Idatius; which we have rendered, according to the Menology of Constantine; Idatius seems to be put for Idatius, Idatius, Idatius, Idatius: Which way of expression is frequently used by Eusebius. Val.

(c) In the Menology, it is called Apphianus; in the Men. MS. Apphianus, in the Men. MS. Apphianus; but in the Margin notice is given that it should be Idatius, which is Idatius. I never met with any thing concerning Apphianus, a City of Lybia, where, a City of Lybia is mentioned by Prodicus and Stephanus. And, in the Constantinopolitan Council, among the Bishops of the Province of Lybia, who subscribed to that Synod, the last that is recounted is Theophilus, Araxenus; Also in the Synod of Chalcidon there is mention of Leontius Bishop of the Araxi. In the Menaia of the Greeks, Amphianus is said to have been born in Lybia. Val.

Maxim. most courageously endured various sorts of tortures, he was thrown into the Sea, and ended his life after the same manner that his Brother did. These things happened thus to Adelfus, altho' (as I said before) some small time after.

Concerning the Martyr Agapius.

MOREOVER, in the fourth year of the Persecution against us, on the twentieth day of the month Dius, (which is before the twelfth of the Calends of December,) being Friday, such [a Martyrdom] was performed in the same City of Cæsarea, as worthily deserves to be recorded in writing, Maximimus the Tyrant being himself present, and exhibiting publick Shows to the People because of his Birth-day. Whereas it was an ancient custom, that (if at any time) in the presence of the Emperors, splendid Shows and such as were more pleasing to the Mind should be exhibited to the Spectators, (new and strange Spectacles, such as were different from the usual Sights [being at such a time procured, which consisted] partly of Beasts brought out of India, Æthiopia, or some other place; and partly of Men, who, having before accustomed themselves those Sights. What tyr of our Religion but for the only true

(b) At first I thought the reading here should be τοῦτον ἔτος, in the second year: For to Eusebius had said above in Chap. 3. But the vulgar reading [to wit, ἡ τρίτης, the second of that name] is best, for he is called Agapius the Second, to distinguish him from the former Agapius, who had suffered two years before; concerning whom Eusebius speaks in the said third Chapter. Valef.

(c) This place is corrupted, and imperfect. Christophorus reads, [Ἀγαπίου δευτέρου, brought out of Prison], which reading is not amiss. But I think there is a whole line omitted here; which I thus make up, Ἀγαπίου δευτέρου, ἐν αὐτῇ πόλει καὶ τῷ ἴδιῳ χρόνῳ [Brought out of Prison] [wherein he had been confined now three years.] Agapius was cast into Prison at the beginning of the second year of the Persecution. Therefore, this was the third year of his confinement. Valef.

foretold his Disciples) might be accomplished in him, that they should be brought before Kings for their testimony of him. He is therefore brought into the midst of the Stadium, together with a certain Criminal, who was said to be guilty of murdering his Master. After this, he who had killed his Master, being exposed to the Wild-Beasts, obtain'd mercy and compassion [from the Emperor,] almost after the same manner that Barabbas did in our Saviour's time. At this, the whole Ambitheatre resounded with shouts and acclamations of joy, because the Emperor had out of his compassion saved a bloody Murderer, and vouchsafed him Honour and Liberty. But this Champion of Religion is first called for by the Tyrant; after which, having, with the promise of Liberty, desired him to renounce the profession [of Christianity,] he professed with a loud voice, That (not for any crime, but) upon account of the Worship of the Framer of all things, with alacrity and pleasure, he would courageously undergo what [Punishments] soever should be inflicted on him. And, having said thus, he annexed Deeds to his Words, ran to meet a Bear which was let loose against him, and most willingly offer'd himself to be devoured by that Beast. After the Beast had torn him, having some Breath left in him, he was carried back to Prison; where, after he had lived one day, on that following, Stones were hang'd at his Feet, and he was drown'd in the midst of the Sea. Such was the Martyrdom of Agapius.

C H A P. VII.

Concerning the Virgin Theodosia, and concerning Domininus, and Auxentius, Martyrs.

MOREOVER, the fifth year of the Persecution being now current on the second day of the month Xanthicus, which is before the fourth of the Nones of April, (a) on the very Lord's-day, the day of our Saviour's Resurrection, and also at Cæsarea, (a) In the Theodosia a Virgin born at Tyre, one that was a Believer and a most modest Maid, not eighteen years old complete, approach'd some Prisoners, Theodosia, (who were Confessors of the Kingdom of Christ, the said and sat before the (b) Prætorium,) both to salute them amicably, and also (as 'tis probable) to request them that they would be mindful of her when they came to the Lord. Having done this, as if he had committed some nefarious and impious fact, the Soldiers lay hold of her, and carry her before the President. He, in regard he was a furious person, and one of a most cruel temper of Mind, [ordered] that she should be cruciated with sharp and most horrid tortures, and that her Sides and Breasts [should be furrow'd] to her very Bones; [after this] Breath being still left in her, having with a pleasant and cheerful countenance undergone all these tortures, by the President's command she was drown'd in the Sea. After he had done with her, he went upon [the Examination of] the other Confessors, all whom he condemn'd to the Brazen Mines at Phoenix in Palestine. Furthermore, on the fifth day of the month Dius, that is (according to the Roman account) on the Nones of November, in the same City, to wit, Cæsarea, the said President condemn'd Silvanus (who then was a Presbyter and a Confessor, but some small time after suffered not on Easter-day, but only, on a Sunday. Valef.

(b) αὐτὴ ἡ ἀρχὴ is so the Greek words it. Christophorus renders it, Ante tribunal constitutus, state before the tribunal; Which Version I do not approve of. I have rendered it, before the Prætorium; i. e. before the palace of the President. For those Prisoners stood before his Palace, waiting, until the President (because when they were to be brought) came forth to the Tribunal. This rendition is confirmed by the following Words. Valef.

was honour'd with a Bishoprick, and happen'd to finish his life by a Bishoprick, and some others that were his Companions (after they had given demonstration of a most resolute courage and constancy in behalf of Religion) to labour in the same Mines of Brags; having first given order, that the Flexures of their Feet † should be fear'd with a red-hot Iron, and so rendred infirm and useless. At the same time that this sentence was pronounced against 'em, he condemn'd Domminus (a Man very famous for innumerable other Confessions, who for his singular freedom [in speaking] was much taken notice of by all persons throughout Palestine) to be burnt alive. After he [had been thus punished,] the same Judge, (a crafty Inventor of mischief, and one that studied new Devices and Designs [to extirpate] the Doctrine of Christ,) found out such sorts of punishments for the Worshipers of God, as were never heard of before. He condemn'd three [and compelled them] to (c) fight with one another in such a fort as the Champions usually did: Auxentius, a venerable and holy old Man, was by him condemn'd to be devoured by the Wild-Beasts. Again, he [gave order] that some, who were arrived to the complete age and stature of Men, should be cut and made Eunuchs, and then condemn'd them to the same Mines. He shut up others in prison, after they had undergone the sharpest Tortures. Amongst which number was Pamphilus, my dearest Companion, a person that was the most eminent of all the Martyrs in our age for his singular Virtue and Piety: Urbanus first made tryal of his skill in Rhetorick and Philosophick Literature, after that he compell'd him to offer sacrifice; which when the Martyr refused to do, and [Urbanus] perceived that he despised his menaces, he was exceedingly exasperated, and gave order that he should be tormented with the acutest sorts of torture. Moreover, this most enraged * Man, (being in a manner satiated with the flesh of the Martyrs sides, which he [had caus'd to be torn off] with torturing-irons, whereof he made a continued and reiterated use, pertinaciously desiring thereby to get the Victory [over the Martyr] having after all these tortures, procur'd nothing but shame and ignominy for himself,) at length order'd him to be cast into prison amongst the other Confessors therein confined. But, what sort of punishment this person (who after so fierce a manner insulted over the Martyrs of Christ,) was to expect, would be inflicted on him at the Divine Tribunal, for his cruelty towards the Saints, is easily known from those beginnings [thereof which he underwent] in this life. Immediately after those audacious Cruelties which he had practis'd towards Pamphilus, the Divine Vengeance forthwith seiz'd him, whilst he was as yet possess'd of the Government. Which on a sudden, in one night's space, strip'd him (who but the day before sat as Judge upon a lofty Tribunal, was attended with a military Guard, govern'd the whole Province of Palestine; who also was Companion to the Tyrant himself, for he was his chief Favourite, and did usually eat at the same Table with him) of all these great places and preferments, and reduc'd him to a disconsolate and helpless condition; clouded him with ignominy and shame in the sight of those very persons, who had formerly admired him as their Governour; propos'd him to the whole Nation, over which he had been Ruler, as a miserable and dispirited Wretch, pouring forth effeminate Intreaties and Supplications; and lastly, constituted Maximinus himself (of whose favour he had in former times bragg'd and boasted, having been dearly beloved by him by reason of the Cruelties he practis'd towards us Christians) his inexorable and most severe Judge in the very City of Cæsarea. For, after many reproaches, which he suffer'd upon account of those crimes, of which he was convict, the Emperor himself pronounc'd sentence of death against him. But thus much we have said by the by. There may happen a seasonable opportunity, wherein we shall be more at leisure to relate the Exits and calamitous Deaths, by which those impious Wretches (especially Maximinus and those about him who were his advisers,) that were the greatest Sticklers in the Persecution against us, finish'd their lives.

(c) See the following Chapter; from whence we are informed, that those who were condemn'd to such Combats, were delivered to the Procurators of Caesar, who caus'd them to practise and exercise daily, that so at last they might be fit to engage in a Combat. Falsif.

C H A P. VIII.

Concerning other Confessors, and concerning the Martyrdom of Valencina and Paul.

WHEN the Storm [of Persecution] had now without any intermission rag'd against us until the sixth year, [there was] a very great number that were Confessors of the Divine Religion, who (a) heretofore had liv'd in Thebais, at Porphyrites, a place that had its appellation from the name of the Marble dug out there: Of which [company] an hundred Men, (wanting three,) together with their Wives and very small Children, were sent to the President of Palestine. Concerning all which persons, after they had made their confession of God [the Framer] of all things, and of Christ, Firmilianus the President (who was sent thither as Successor to Urbanus,) gave order, agreeable to the Emperors command, that they should have those very Sinews of their left Legs, by which they bent their Knees, fear'd in two with red-hot Irons; and that their right Eyes, together with the Membranes and Balls thereof should be first cut out with Swords, and after that [their Eye-holes] scared even to the very bottom with red-hot Irons: After which, he order'd they should be sent to work in the Mines that were in the Province, that they might be worn out there with labours and miseries. Nor did we behold these persons only undergoing such punishments, but those Palestinians also; (who, as we manifested a little before, were condemn'd to practise the Champions exercises, in order to their being made fit to engage in the Gladiators Combats;) because they would not endure, either to receive those Provisions which were allow'd them out of the Imperial Treasury, or to practise such exercises as were necessary to render them accomplish'd Combatants. For which reason they were brought not only before the (b) Procurators, but Maximinus him- (b) He self: And, having given a demonstration of their means, as I judge, the Procurators of the company of the Gladiators, and of the Morning Exercises, of whom there is frequent mention in the old Inscriptions. For the Gladiators, that were maintained by stipends paid out of the Imperial Exchequer, were committed to their care, and they gave them their allowances out of the Treasury. Valisf.

(a) αὐτοὶ γὰρ, heretofore, must be referred to the Verb ἔζηον; not to the term [καθημερίαν], had its Appellation; as Christophorus thought; who renders this place thus; in loco Porphyrite appellato, qui jam antea ex venâ lapidis qua ibi nascitur, nomen duxerat; i. e. in a place called Porphyrites, which had before, gotten its name from a vein of stone, which is there dug out. Valisf.

invincible constancy in the confession [of Christ], and of their courageousness in enduring Famine and Scourges, they suffer'd the same punishments with the foremention'd persons: some other Confessors in the City of Caesarea being added to their number. Soon after these, others were taken at the City Gaza, (c) who were

(c) Christophorus supposed these persons to be Priests and Deacons, who had convened the People to hear the sacred Scriptures read: Which at that time they were compelled to do in private Houses. For, their Churches and Churches being then demolished, the Christians had only Private-houses to assemble themselves in. Valef.

of which number, as to her Sex a Woman, but a person of a masculine and courageous temper of Mind, unable to endure the menaces of Ravishment; having utter'd some expressions against the Tyrant, (because he committed the Government [of Provinces] to such cruel Judges,) was first scourged: Then, being hung up a great height on [an Engine of] Wood, she was tortured in the sides of her Body. But when the Officers, appointed for that purpose, did, by the Judges order, apply their tortures to her with a most continued and exquisite vehemency, another Woman, who (like the former) had taken upon her the vow of Virginity, (as to the composition of her Body she was indeed no very taking object, and her aspect was despicable, but she was endow'd with a courageous temper of Mind, and was corroborated with a valour above her Sex, and far excell'd those Championesses amongst the Grecians, so much famed for their freedom in speaking;) being unable to endure the sight of those merciless, cruel, and inhuman practices, cried out with a loud voice to the Judge, out of the midst of the crowd, How long will you thus unmercifully torture my Sister? The Judge, highly exasperated by that expression, forthwith gave command the Woman should be laid hold on.

* That is, having acknowledged herself to be a Christian. She was then hal'd forth before him; and * having assumed to herself our Saviour's venerable appellation, first she was solicited by kind words to offer sacrifice: Which when she refused to do, they drew her by force before the Altar: But she, behaving herself like herself, retain'd her former alacrity of Mind, with an intrepid and undaunted Foot trampled upon the Altar, and overturn'd that, together with (d) what lay upon it. Upon which account the Judge, enraged like a Savage Beast, first gave order, that she should suffer more and greater tortures in her sides, than any one had before undergone: [For] he seem'd in a manner desirous to gorge himself with her raw flesh. But when his rage was satiated, he order'd they should both (namely this last with her whom he called Sister) be fastned together, and condemn'd them to be burn'd to death; the (e) former of these persons, 'tis said, was born in the Country of the Gazites: You must understand that the other, well known to most Men by the name of Valentina, had her original extract at Caesarea. But supply this with what expressions can I deservedly set forth

(d) This Virgin's name is wanting: But we will supply this with what expressions can I deservedly set forth detect, from the Grecian Menology; where this passage occurs, at the 15th of July: On the same day, the holy Martyrs, Valentina and Thea, which were Egyptians, being brought to the City Dio Caesarea before Firmilianus the Judge, made confession of Christ's Name, who is our God; after which, their left feet being burnt, and their right eyes pulled out, they were killed with a sword, and their bodies burnt. But this account disagrees with our Eusebius's relation here. For he says, the one was born at Gaza, the other at Caesarea: And he makes no mention of the burning of their feet, or of the pulling out their Eyes. Valef.

that Martyrdom (which follow'd immediately hereupon,) wherewith the thrice-blessed Paul was adorn'd? This person, having had sentence of death pronounced against him at that very interim these Virgins were condemn'd, when he was to be put to death, entreated the Executioner (who stood ready to cut off his Head) to allow him a short space of time. Having obtain'd his request, with a clear and audible voice he first pray'd for all those who were Professors of the Christian Religion, beseeching God, that he would be reconciled to them, and quickly bestow on them liberty and security: Then he supplicated for the Jews access to God by [the Faith of] Christ: After this, he proceeded in an orderly method, putting up the same petitions even for the Samaritans; and besought God for the Heathens, that they, now entangled in error and an ignorance of God, might arrive to an acknowledgment of him, and undertake the [profession of] the true Religion; neither did he [in his petitions] omit to mention the promiscuous crowd that surrounded him. After all these (O the great and ineffable patience and mildness of his Mind!) He besought the Supreme God for the very Judge by whom he had been condemn'd to die, for the Emperors, and also for the Executioner (who stood ready to strike off his Head,) both in the hearing of him himself, and of all those also that were present, beseeching [God] that the sin they committed [by taking away his life] might not be imputed to them. Having with a loud voice made these petitions, and melted almost all that were present into compassion and tears, because he was unjustly put to death; (f) nevertheless he made himself ready, and, yielding his naked Neck to be cut asunder by the Sword, he was crown'd with Divine Martyrdom, on the twenty fifth day of the Month Panemus, that is, before the eighth of the Calends of August. Such was the Exit of these [Martyrs]. Not long after, an hundred and thirty Champions, of the same Country, (g) having by Maximinus's order undergone the same calamitous [tortures] in their Eyes and Feet, with those formerly mention'd who suffered in Egypt, were condemn'd and sent away, part of them to the forementioned Mines in Pales-tine, and part to those in the Province of Cilicia.

judgment, is not to be despised. Mention is made of this Paul's Martyrdom, in the Menology, at the 15th of July. Valef.

CHAP. IX.

That the Perfection was afresh renewed: And concerning Antoninus, Zebina, Germanus, and other Martyrs.

NOW, after such valiant Exploits as these, perform'd by Christ's Noble Martyrs; when the Flame of Perfection was somewhat abated, and as it were, extinguish'd by their sacred Blood; when those in Therbas (condemn'd for [their Confession of] Christ to labour in the Mines there,) were permitted to enjoy rest and liberty; and when we hoped to see some few calm and serene days; then did * He (who had gotten the power of persecuting) re-assume his Rage against the Christians, upon what account, or by what impulse, I know not. For, on a sudden, Maximinus's Edicts against us were sent to all places throughout every Province:

Maximianus

(f) In the Acts & Scrit MSS. in stead of quod ad- huc inuoluntate he made himself ready, to make himself ready in the reading of the usual manner was, which reading, in my

Devil

Province: And the Presidents and (a) Præfets of the Prætorium by Injunctions, Letters, and publick Orders excited the Civitates in every City, the Magistrates and (b) Tabularii to put in execution the Imperial Edict, (c) which contained an Order, That the decay'd Idol-Temple should with all diligence be repaired; that all persons, Men, Women, Servants, and young Children should be compell'd to do Sacrifice, and by all means imaginable forced to eat part of the Flesh which had been offer'd; that the Provisions expos'd to sale in the Markets should be defiled with such things as had been sacrific'd; and that some should be order'd to sit and watch before the [publick] Baths, so the end they might pollute such as came to cleanse themselves therein, with the execrable Sacrifices. Whilst these things were after this manner put in execution, the Anxieties of the Christians, as it was likely, were renew'd and increased: Yea, the Gentiles that were Unbelievers [look'd upon] what was done to be intolerable, and condemn'd these Barbarities, as absurd and too outrageous: For, even to them such Actions seem'd abominable and odious. When [therefore] such a fierce Storm [of Persecution] was impendent on all persons every-where, the Divine Power of our Saviour did again infuse fo great a courage and confidence into his Champions, that, when nobody induc'd or urg'd them to it, they contemn'd these high Menaces of their Adversaries. Wherefore, three Believers with a joynt consent rush in upon the President then offering Sacrifice to Idols, and call out to him to desist from his error: For there is [said they] no other God, but he that is the Framers and Maker of all things. Being hereupon ask'd who they were, they boldly profess'd themselves to be Christians: At which Firmitianus was highly exasperated, and pass'd sentence of death upon them, (d) without inflicting on them any previous tortures. One of these was a Presbyter, by name (e) Antoninus; the name of the second was Zebina, by Country an Eleutheropolitan; the third was call'd Germanus. On the thirteenth day of the Month Dins, that is on the Idea of November, all this was done to these persons. On the same day they had a Fellow-traveller added to their number, a Woman of Scythopolis, by name (f) Ennathas, who was adorn'd with the (g) Badge of Virginity. She had not indeed done what the former [three] did, but was carried by force and fer before the Judge. Therefore, after she had been scourged and most grossly abused; [all which injurious ulages were audaciously perpetrated, without any order from the superior Magistracy, by one of the Tribunes in the neighbourhood, call'd Masey, a Man worse than his name, one indeed that was stout and of an undaunted courage, but as to his Morals, in all respects very impious, of a cruel disposition, and odious to all his Acquaintance. This Fellow stripp'd the Blest Virgin stark naked, (in such a manner that she was cover'd only from her Loins down to her Feet, but the rest of her Body was bare;) led her round the City Cæsarea, and look'd upon it as a piece of Gallantry to dragg her through all the Market-places in the City, and scourge her; after [say] she had endur'd so many stripes, having given a demonstration of her most undaunted courage and constancy of Mind before the Presidents Tribunal, the Judge commanded she should be burnt alive. This Man improv'd his Inhumanity and Rage, shown towards God's Worshipers, to the height, and transgress'd even the Laws of nature; for he was not ashamed of denying burial to the dead Bodies of those sacred persons. Upon which account he gave order, that the dead bodies [which were expos'd in the open Air, to be devoured by Wild-Beasts,] should be carefully guarded Night and Day: And you might have seen for many days together no small number of Men, busily obeying this beastly and barbarous order: Some of whom (as if this had been a matter of high concern and moment) watch'd on a Tower, that the Dead might not be stoln away. Also, the Wild-Beasts, Dogs, and Fowls that prey'd on flesh, scatter'd here and there pieces of Men's Bodies: And the whole City was strew'd all over with Men's Bowels and Bones. So that, nothing did ever seem more cruel and horrid, even to those who before had been our Enemies; all persons bewailing not so much their calamitous condition towards whom these things were done, as the abuse that was put upon themselves, and on Mankind in general. For, even to the very Gares [of the City] such a Spectacle was propos'd to publick view, as surpass'd all the bounds of expression, and exceeded any the most tragical relation; [to wit] the flesh of Men's Bodies, which were devour'd not in one place, but lay scatter'd everywhere. Yea, some affirm'd they saw Limbs of Men, whole Bodies, and pieces of Bowels even within the City. After these [horrid Butcheries] had been practis'd for many days together, there happen'd this Miracle. The Weather was fair, the Air clear, and the whole Face of Heaven most serene and bright; when, on a sudden, from all the Columns which under-prop'd the publick Galleries throughout the City, there fell many drops, in the form of Tears: And the Market-place and Streets, (no moisture having fallen from the Air,) were wet and besprinkled with Water which came from an unknown place. In so much that a report was immediately spread

(d) Eusebius notes this, as a thing new, and unusual; not that he design'd to praise Firmitianus the President's Clemency, because he did not torture the Martyrs; but he would hereby shew the Precipitancy and Rage of the Man; in regard he commanded, the Martyrs (who had provoked and confus'd him) should be immediately led away to execution, he put to death, without suffering any tortures before their execution; as the common usage was. For the Roman Judges did usually torture the Christian Martyrs before they dispatch'd them, to the end those valiant Champions might not finish their lives by too easie a death. Nor was this usually done to the Martyrs only; but generally as often as any heinous Offenders were brought to examination, they were first tortured. And although the guilty Person confess'd the fact, yet did not the Judge presently order him to be releas'd from his tortures; but continued to inquire out the Consequences: For example, how often he had done the fact, with what weapons, and in what places: Then he questioned him about his Companions and Accomplices. See Terullian, in his Book Ad Nationes, and in his Apologetic, Chap. 2. Valef.

(e) In the Greek Menology, this Man is call'd Antonius, where (besides Zebina and Germanus) there is a fourth Companion of theirs named, to wit, Nicophorus. For the 12th day of November this passage occurs: The birth-day of the holy Martyrs Antonius and his fellows, who were [put to death] in the times of Maximinus. Antonius was an old Man; Nicophorus, Zebina, and Germanus were in the flower of their age. They were taken at Cæsarea, and after they had boldly confess'd Christ, were slain. Here you see, the Author of the Menology has render'd πρεσβύτερος an old Man, not a Presbyter. Valef.

amongst all people, that the Earth, unable to bear the horrid Impieties then committed, did shed Tears in an inexplicable manner; and that the Stones and senseless matter wept at what was done, to reprove the barbarous and unmerciful Dispositions of Men. This thing will, I doubt not, be look'd upon as fabulous and a ridiculous story by succeeding Generations: But they did not account it such, who had the certainty thereof confirmed to them by the authority of those times in which it happened.

CHAPTER X.

Concerning Peter the Asceta, Asclepius the Marcionite, and other Martyrs.

ON the fourteenth Day of the following Month, called Appellens, which is before the nineteenth of the Calends of January, some other Egyptians, (going to minister to the Confessors in Cilicia) were apprehended by those persons, that were set at the Gates [of the City] to examine such as passed by: Part of whom received the same sentence with those they were going to minister to, having their Eyes and Feet rendred useless. But three of them were put into bonds at the City Ascalon, where after they had given an admirable demonstration of their Courage, they finish'd their lives by a different sort of Martyrdom. One of them, by name Ares, was burnt to death: The other two, whose names were (a) Probus and Eliaz, were beheaded. On the eleventh day of the month Andynans, which is before the third of the Ides of January, (b) Peter the Asceia, called also Asclamus, (who came from Anreas a Village that lies near to Eleutheropolis), being refined by Fire like the purest Gold, exhibited an illustrious proof of his Faith in God's Christ, at the City Cæsarea. For when the Judge and those about him intreated him earnestly to be compassionate towards himself, and take pity upon his own youthfulness and vigour; he contemned [their Exhortations,] and preferred his confidence in the suprem God before all things, yea, even Life itself. Together with this person [suffered] one Asclepius, (reported to have been a Bishop of the Sect of the Marcionites, out of a zeal to Piety, (as he thought,) but such an one as was not according to knowledge,) and finished his life in the same fiery Pillar. These things were performed after this manner.

CHAPTER XI.

Concerning Pamphilus, and twelve other Martyrs.

(a) Symeon the Metaphrastes has transcri-

THE time now calls upon me to record that great and famous Spectacle, which they [exhibited] who were perfected by Martyrdom together with Pamphilus, [a person] whose name and memory I have a great honour and high esteem for. They were in all twelve, being vouchsafed a (b) Prophetic, or rather Apocalyptic Grace, and equal to 'em in number; Pamphilus was their Principal, the only person amongst them that was adorn'd with the honour of a Presbytership in the Church at Cæsarea: (c) A man eminent for all manner of Virtue, even throughout his whole life; [whether we consider] his renunciation and contempt of the World, or the liberal contributions [he made] of his Goods to those that were necessitous; or his disregard of worldly preferments and expectations; or, lastly, his Philosophick, severe, and Asceitick course of life. But, he was most especially eminent, even beyond all men in our times, for his earnest and unwearied studies in the sacred Scriptures, for his indefatigable assiduity about those things he proposed to himself to do, and for the good offices he did to his Relations and all other persons that made their addresses to him. This person's other virtues and egregious performances, which require a larger relation, we have already comprized in three Books, being a peculiar Work which we wrote concerning his life. If therefore any are desirous of knowing these things

(d) In the more fully, we remit them thither; at present (d) let us prosecute our subsequent Narration concerning the Martyrs. The second person, after Pamphilus, that entered the combat, was Valens, a Deacon of Alia, honourable for his holy gray Hairs, and as to his aspect a venerable old Man; better skill'd in the sacred Scriptures than Moses, any of the rest. For he had imprinted them in his memory so perfectly, (f) that no difference could be discerned between his reading out of a Book, and repeating by heart, whole pages of any part of sacred Writ. The third person, famous amongst them, was Paul, born at the City Jamnia, a man very fervent and zealous in acting, and filled with a warmth and ardour of Spirit. Before his Martyrdom he had been engaged in the Combat of Confession, having endured the searing [of his flesh] with red-hot Irons. After these persons had spent two years time in prison, when the arrival of some other Egyptians Brethren was by him

Books Concerning Pamphilus's Life, and after his Ecclesiastick Hist. Valerius supposes it may be thus amended: ὅς μὴ ἐνδὲς πρὸς τὸν ἑσπερινόν τιν' ταχέως, τὸ δὲ πρὸς τὸν ἑσπερινόν τιν' ταχέως, τὸ δὲ πρὸς τὸν ἑσπερινόν τιν' ταχέως [which reading we have followed in our Version; and it agrees with Symeon Metaphrastes's interpretation, as 'tis evident from Græcizant Herueticus's Translation in Lipomanus's Edition at the month of February:] see Note (a) in this Chapter. But Herueticus has rendered ἀσπασμοὶ religiosi, to get by heart; whereas that term signifies, to recite by heart, as we observed before. Valer.

(f) 'Tis easily discernable, that the Greek Text is here corrupted; I suppose it may be thus amended: ὅς μὴ ἐνδὲς πρὸς τὸν ἑσπερινόν τιν' ταχέως, τὸ δὲ πρὸς τὸν ἑσπερινόν τιν' ταχέως [which reading we have followed in our Version; and it agrees with Symeon Metaphrastes's interpretation, as 'tis evident from Græcizant Herueticus's Translation in Lipomanus's Edition at the month of February:] see Note (a) in this Chapter. But Herueticus has rendered ἀσπασμοὶ religiosi, to get by heart; whereas that term signifies, to recite by heart, as we observed before. Valer.

bed this whole Relation of the Martyrdom of Pamphilus and his Companions, out of our Eusebius, adding some things, and altering others, as he usually does. But he seems to have been furnished with more perfect Copies of Eusebius, than those we now have, which will manifestly appear to the Reader; who may agree with Metaphrastes's account hereof in that Latin Version of him, which Lipomanus and Surius put forth: Tome the third, at the fifth of June; pag. 139. Edit. Venet. Anno 1531. Valer.

(b) He means the Minor Prophets, who were twelve in number: This passage is more clearly express'd in Metaphrastes, thus: h it is worth our while to admire the number of the Ides, which represent a certain Prophetic and Apocalyptic Grace. For, it happened that they were in all twelve; of the same number with the Patriarchs, Prophets and Apostles, as we are informed. Valer.

(c) This passage also is more perfect in Metaphrastes, after this manner: He was Pamphilus, a Man truly pious, loving and friendly to the truth of his name; [the import of Pamphilus, is friend to all men:] the ornament of the Church at Cæsarea, &c. See Lipomanus and Surius's Version of Metaphrastes at the fore-cited place. Valer.

(a) In the Greek this name is Probus; But, I suppose, it should be Probus. For I never met with such a proper name as Probus. This mistake arose from hence; in ancient MSS. Probus is written like Ascl. In the Fok and Sav. MSS. 'tis Probus. Valer.

(b) Mention is made of this Person in the Greek Mena, at the 14th of October; although Eusebius says he suffered on the 3d of the Ides of January. In the Mena he is called Asclamus: But, in the *Mena*logy Asclamus is, by a mistake, put for Asclamus, or Asclamus: The import of the passage there is this: On the same day is the Commemoration of the holy Martyr Petrus Anselmus of Eleutheropolis, who being in the flower of his age, and of a vigorous mind, behaved himself most admirably in the conflicts he underwent for Religion; and, having despised earthly things, was by fire offered up as a victim well-pleasing to God, in the fifth year of Dioctianus's and Maximian's Empire. In which passage, this is observable, that the sixth year of Dioctianus's Empire is put for the sixth year of the Persecution. Valer.

the occasion of their Martyrdom, who also suffer'd with them. These Egyptians had accompanied the Confessors sent into Cilicia, to the Mines there. As they were returning to their own Country, at the entrance of the Gate of Caesarea they were examin'd (in the same manner with those before-mention'd) by the Guard (men of a barbarous disposition) who they were, and whence they came; and, having concealed nothing of the truth, as if they had been Malefactor taken in the very act, they were put into bonds. They were five in number; and when they were brought before the Tyrant, and had spoken boldly and freely in his presence, they were forthwith committed to prison. The next day (which was the 19th of the month Peritius, according to the Roman account before the 14th of the Calends of March.) order was given, that they, together with Pamphilus and his foremention'd Companions, should be brought before the Judge. In the first place, he made tryal of the Egyptians invincible wholly disregarding those that on all sides were tormenting of him: But, as if he had had neither Flesh nor Body, seem'd to be altogether insensible of his tortures. But the Judge, doubtful and perplexed in his Mind, was in a great rage, supposing that the Christians were about erecting a City that would be an Enemy, and in an hostile manner oppose the Romans. Upon which account he was very diligent in his enquiries about it, and in searching out that Country in the East spoken of [by the Martyr.] But when he perceived that the young man (after he had tortur'd him with innumerable stripes, and inflicted on him tortures of all sorts,) was immutable and firmly persisted in what he had said before, he pass'd sentence of death upon him. Thus were the tragick [Cruelties,] us'd towards this Martyr, concluded: And when he had practis'd the like Preface of Tortures upon the rest, he destroy'd them by the same sort of death. Being then wearied out, and perceiving that he did in vain inflict tortures upon these

(a) Egyptians (the term here us'd) seems to be taken passively, for εγυπτιασθαι. For Eusebius's meaning is, that Firmitianus's Judge was well versed in passing legal sentences, and in extracting examinations by tortures. But because the same term is taken in an active sense hereafter in this chapter, it ought also to be taken so here. By the term [ἄσπετος] Eusebius means, the scourger and torturer, Valer.

(b) These selves by names different from those given them by their Parents, which were perhaps the names of Idols; therefore you might have heard them name themselves Elias, Jeremiah, Isaiah, Samuel, or Daniel, representing not only by their actions, but by their proper names also, the true and genuine Israel of God, which [consists] of those that are (i) inwardly Jews. After, [I say,] Firmitianus had heard the Martyr give himself such a name, being wholly unacquainted with the powerful import thereof, in the second place he enquir'd, what Countryman he was: The Martyr express'd himself in this his second reply agreeable to his former answer, and said, Jerusalem was his Country; meaning that Jerusalem, of which Paul speaks—*But Jerusalem which is above, is free, which is the mother of us all: And [in another place,] Ye are come to mount Zion, and unto the City of the living God,

(c) Eusebius alludes to that passage in St. Paul, (Rom. 2. 28, 29.) where the Apostle makes two sorts of Jews: Some that were Jews in outwardly; others that were such by inwardly: The former, as he affirms, are not truly Jews, because they observed the bodily Ceremonies only of the Law: The latter are really Jews; whose Circumcision is that of the Heart in the Spirit, and not in the Letter. See Origen, Chap. i. Philocal. Valer.

the heavenly Jerusalem: The Martyr meant this [Jerusalem.] But the Judge, having his mind depressed with low and terrene thoughts, was extraordinarily inquisitive what City this was, and in what Country it lay. Then he applied tortures, that he might [force him thereby to] confess the truth. But he, having both his hands wrested behind his back, and his Feet broken with certain new Engines [of torture,] stiffly affirm'd, that he spoke true. Again, being after this often asked, what City that he spoke of was, and where it lay, he replied, that that was their Country only, who were God's Worshippers: For none but they should enter it; and it was situate Eastward, and towards the rising Sun. After this manner did the Martyr Philosophize again, agreeable to his own sentiments,

(k) when his desires were fatiared, he pass'd to Pamphilus and his Companions. And [although] he had by experience found, that in defence of their Faith they had before demonstrated an acerbity of mind not to be vanquish'd by tortures; [yet] he again asked them, whether they would now be obedient to the Imperial commands; and when he could get nothing out of any one of them, besides that last confession which is made in Martyrdom, he condemn'd them to undergo the same punishment with the foremention'd Martyrs. These things being finished, a Youth, (i) one that belong'd to Pamphilus's Family, (in regard he had been educated under the genuine discipline and converse of so eminent a person;) as soon as he understood that sentence [was pronounc'd] against his Master, called aloud out of the midst of the crowd, and requested that their dead-bodies might be interr'd. But [the Judge, (who deserves not to be called a Man) but a wild Beast, or any Creature else [that can be thought] more fierce than a wild Beast] shew'd no compassion towards his youthful years; and, having found, upon his bare asking the young man that he confess'd himself a Christian; I well'd with rage as if he had been wounded by some Dart, order'd the Torturers to make use of their utmost force against him. But after he saw, that he refused to be obedient to his commands in offering sacrifice, he order'd that his flesh (as if it had not been the body of a Man, but either Stones, or Wood, or some such senseless thing) should without any intermission be torn even to his very bones and inmost recesses of his Bowels. Which being performed for a long time together, the Judge perceived his attempts were vain; [for although] his Body was mangled all over with the tortures, [yet] he

(k) Eusebius seems to mean Firmitianus's desire of knowing from the Egyptian Martyr, where that Jerusalem was, which they called their Country. Whence we may make this remark by the by, that 'tis sufficiently evident, (as we observed before, Book 4. Chap. 6. Note (c)) there was no City upon Earth at that time call'd Jerusalem. Otherwise Firmitianus's President of Palestine, would never have been so earnest in his enquiries of the Martyrs, where Jerusalem was situated. But, the Greek word [ἱερουσαλήμ] cannot, I think, be taken in that sense I have mentioned. Indeed, this place is obscure, and (if I mistake not) faulty. Therefore Symeon Metaphrastes, when he transcribed this passage from Eusebius, on set purpose omitted these words. Valer.

(l) As this Symeon Metaphrastes adds some words, which deserve to be set down here. Nondum autem didum, &c. [The Judge] had scarce made an end of speaking, when a young Man, belonging to Pamphilus's family, called out at some distance; and, coming out of the midst of the crowd into the presence of those who sat round in the place of Judicature, requested that their Bodies might be interr'd. This was the Blessed Prophylas, one of Pamphilus's own brethren, and full eighteen years old. [See Voeltz's preface in the Art of Writing;] but one that conceded these praises by his wonderful behaviours, in regard he had been educated under so eminent a person. Valer.

Maxim- he continued silent, and was as insensible of pain, as if he had in a manner been lifeless. [Never- theless] the Judge, still persevering in his mer- ciless and inhuman cruelty, immediately condem- ned him to be burnt in the same habit he was in by (m) a slow fire. And thus this person (al- tho' he was the last that entered the combat, yet (prevented his Master after the flesh, in that he obtain'd his depar- ture out of this life before him; those, who were bu- died about [vanquishing] the former Martyrs, hitherto making some delays. You might therefore have seen Porphyrius [for that was his name,] in quality like a valorous Champion who had been Conqueror in all manner of exercises belong- ing to the sacred Games, proceeding forth to his death after he had suffer'd to great tortures, with a Body covered all over with Dust, but with a cheerful Countenance, and a Mind full of joy and confidence: He was most truly filled with the tor of those that were (p) Asceta in their Studies and Exercises of Piety; and, like a Father, and a Patron, demonstrat'd himself to be an Over- seer as it were, and an helper of desolate Orphans and Widows that were destitute of assistance, and of those that were reduced to poverty and sickness. Where- fore, by God (who is more delighted with such [per- formances] as these, than with the smoke and blood of Sacrifices) he was deserv- edly accounted worthy of that admirable and high call- ing, [to wit,] Martyrdom. This was the tenth Cham- pion, who, after the others before-mention'd, ended his life on the very same day; whereon (as it is probable) the great Gate of Heaven was open'd by the Martyr- dom of Pamphilus, (suitable to the worth of that person) which gave both him, and his Companions, an easy entrance into the Celestial Kingdom. Also, Theo- dulus (a venerable and pious old man, belonging to the President's own Family, for whom Firmilianus had a greater esteem than for all his other Domesticks; partly upon account of his age, having seen his Children to the third Genera- tion; and partly in respect of the singular affec- tion and conscientious fidelity, which he had con- tinually retain'd towards him;) having follow'd Selenus's steps, and performed the same things that he did, was brought before his Master, a- gainst whom he was more exasperated than a- gainst any of the former [Martyrs;] and being forthwith put upon a Cross, he underwent the same sort of Martyrdom our Saviour suffered. Moreover, one being yet wanting, who might render the number of the foreaid Martyrs com- pletely twelve, Julianus intervenc'd to make up their number. At that very interim he was com- ing from a remote Country, and had not enter'd the City; but, being informed [of the slaugh- ter] of the Martyrs, ran immediately [in the same habit he had on] out of the road, to see that spectacle. When he saw the dead Bodies of those holy persons lying upon the ground, being fil- led with an extraordinary joy, he embraced e- very one of them, and kissed them all. Whilst he was doing this, the [Soldiers] that were the Instruments to commit those Murders, appre- hend him, and bring him to Firmilianus. He, doing herein what was agreeable to his [usual cruelty,] order'd that this person also should be consumed by a slow fire. This was Julianus also accounted worthy [to receive] the Crown of Martyrdom, leaping for joy, and being ex- ceeding glad; and with a loud voice giving great thanks to the Lord, who had vouchsafed him so great an honour. This Julianus was by Country a Cappadocian; as to his Morals, he was eminently pious and circumspect, and famous for his most genuine and sincere Faith: He was very active and diligent in all things, being inspired by the Holy Ghost. Such was the File [of Martyrs,] who were vouchsafed to arrive at Martyrdom in company with Pamphilus. The holy, and truly sacred Bo- dies of these persons were, by the impious Presi- dent's order, watch'd for the space of four days, and as many nights, and expos'd to be devour'd

* See B. 6. Chap. 19. Note (p.) (n) This Garment is in the Greek term'd ἡλικία (see its de- scription in A. G. c. 12.) him, with his Mouth he attract'd the flame on e- very side of him: And after this one expression, which he utter'd when the flame began to touch him, [to wit,] Invoking Jesus the Son of God to be his helper, he most courageously continued silent even to the very last gasp. Such was Porphyrius's com- bat: Whole Contamination Selenus a Confessor that had formerly been a Soldier, having related to Pamphilus; as being the conveyer of such a message, he was immediately vouchsafed to be joy'd in the same lot with the Martyrs: For he had no sooner related Porphyrius's death, and salu- ted one of the Martyrs with a kiss, but some of the Soldiers seize him, and carry him before the President. Who, as if he resolv'd to hasten Selenus, that he might be Porphyrius's Companion in his journey to Heaven, forthwith order'd he should undergo a capital punishment. This [Selenus] was born in Cappadocia, but had attained no mean degree of honour amongst the choicest young men that belong'd to the Roman Milice.

For he far excell'd his Fel- low-soldiers in the (o) fitness of his age for military ser- vices, in strength and sta- ture of body, and in valour: In so much that his aspect was much discouf'd of a- mongst all men, and the shape of his whole body greatly admired, upon account both of his stature and comeliness. About the beginning of the Persecution, he was eminently famous for his enduring stripes in the combat of Confession: But after he had left off his mili- tary course of life, he became a zealous Emula-

(m) In stead of [ὑποπόδιον τῆς πυρρᾶς] a fire at a distance] Christophorus seems to have read [ὑποπόδιον τῆς πυρρᾶς] a flow, or remiss fire: See his Translation. Heretics also has rendered it thus, *Pronomiat sententiam ut tradatur omni & leviori igni, he pronounc'd sentence upon him, that he should be set into, and consumed by] a soft and gentle fire. The flame is confirmed by Eusebius's following Words: For he says, that Porphyrius was fill'd to a Stake, and that the Pile, which lay round him, but at some distance, was kindled; that to the Martyr might be consumed by a slack fire. We read of the same sort of punishment in the passion of Timonius, and of other Martyrs. Eusebius uses [ὑποπόδιον τῆς πυρρᾶς] in the same sense hereafter, where he mentions Julianus. Further, we must take notice that both Porphyrius and Julianus were Catechu- mens; as Metaphrastes informs us. Valef.*

(o) ἡλικία is the term in the original; it peculiarly imports that Age, which is fit for warfare; which Livy titles militarem aetatem, the military Age; beginning from the seventeenth year of a Man's age, scilicet Plutarch (in Graccho.)

Maxim- But the asceta did converse publicly in the Cities. Whosoever therefore lived a more strict and severe course of life according to the Precepts of the Gospel, and leit all they had, upon God's ac- count, were term'd Asceta, & thus one Peter is call'd Asceta, and a Virgin is term'd Ascetica, being in this Book of Eusebius; Shoul- any one term these Monks, doubt- less he would be much mistaken. St. Jerom says expressly, that there was no Monk in Palestine before Isidorian. But Peter, the Asceta, lived in Palestine long before Isidorian's time. Valef.

by Beasts that prey on Flesh. But when (as it miraculously happen'd) no Wild-Beast, or Fowl, or Dog approach'd them [during that time,] at last [Divine Providence for ordering the matter,] they were taken away whole and untorn; and, having been allow'd such Funeral Rites as befit them, received the usual Interment. Whilst the discourse concerning the [President's] furious rage against these persons was yet ripe all Mens mouths, Adrianus and Eubulus (arriving, from that Country call'd Manganau, at Caesarea, to give a visit to the rest of the Confessors,) were examin'd also at the Gate of the City, for what reason they came thither. And, having confest the truth, they were brought before Firmilianus: He (as he had usually done before) was in no wise dilatory in his Proceedings towards them also; but after he had furrow'd their Sides with many tortures, condemn'd them to be devour'd by Wild-Beasts. Therefore, after two days space, on the fifth of the month Dyffrus, (that is, before the third of the Nones of March, the day whereon the nativity of the q. public Genius (as the Heathens account it) is celebrated at Caesarea, Adrianus was cast to a Lyon; and, after which a Sword was thrust through his Body, and so he ended his life. On the next day after save one, that is, on the very Nones of March, which is the seventh of the month Dyffrus, Eubulus (after the Judge had entreated him with much earnestness, that by offering sacrifice he would procure for himself that which they account Religion,) preferring a glorious Death for his Liberty before this transitory Life, (when he had been exposted to the wild-Beasts, and been made a Sacrifice after the same manner with the former Martyr,) was the last that cloed up the Combats of the Martyrs at Caesarea. Moreover, it will be worthy our recording here, how Divine Providence soon after punished these iniquitous Presidents, together with the Tyrants themselves. For Firmilianus, who had been so reproachfully outrageous against Christ's Martyrs, having with some others been adjudg'd to undergo a capital punishment, was beheaded. And these were the Martyrdoms, accomplish'd at Caesarea, during the whole time of the Persecution.

CHAP. XII.

BUT, what happen'd to be done in relation to the Prelates of Churches (a) during this interval of time, and afterwards; how, instead of being continued Pastors of Christ's Rational Flock, which they had not rightly and duly governed. Divine Justice, judging them as it were they were to be understood concerning the time of the Perfection; I am not of his mind. For Eusebius speaks concerning what happened, when the time of the Perfection was in some measure abated. Therefore [ἐν τῷ χρόνῳ] signifies postea, afterwards; according to Eusebius's usual way of expressing himself, both in other places, and also hereafter in this Chapter. The following Words [ἐξ ἧς ἔτι πάλιν χρόνος] denote the whole interval of time from the beginning of the Perfection to its seventh year, as Eusebius informs us in the following Chapter. Vale!

fit for such Offices, condemn'd them to be employ'd in looking after (b) Camels, a brutish sort of Creatures, whose Bodies are naturally crooked and misshapen; and how it adjudged them to be Keepers of the Emperor's Horses; also, what and how great Injuries, Dishonours, and Tortures they suffered from such, as during those times were the Emperor's Procurators, and Governours of Provinces, upon account of the sacred Vessels and Treasures belonging to the Church; moreover, the ambitious desires of many, the inconsistent and illegal Ordinations, and the schisms amongst the (c) Confessors themselves; besides, what those modern raisers of Disturbances with much earnestness attempted against the remains of the Church, introducing innovations successively one after another, being without intermission Authors of Evils even in the midst of the Calamities caused by the Persecution, and heaping Mischief upon Mischief: All this [I say] I think fit to omit, a relation hereof being in my judgment inconvenient, and which (as I said in the (d) beginning of this Book) I do altogether dislike, and am relolved to avoid. Supposing it therefore to be most accommodate for an illustrious concerning the admirable Martyrs, to speak, write, and insill into the Ears of Believers what ever is of importance to, and commendable in, our Religion, and those passages which are virtuous and praise-worthy; I thought good to adorn the close of this Book with [a Relation of] that Peace, which afterwards appeared to us from Heaven.

Altho' in that place of the Pentateuch, the Emperor's Cuneis are not spoken of, but their Cuneis is meant, belonging to every City. They were used to fetch Wood and other burthenes, as appears from the 13th. Lev. in the 14th Title. But Eufebius does here speak of the Emperor's Horles, and Camels, to the feeding whereof some Bishops were condemned. Now, there is a great difference between their two Offices. For the former was a civil Office, to which the Decurions of the white Order were promoted, as 'tis said in the fore-quoted Law. But the latter was a penal servitude, to which Criminals were condemned, as may be collected from Eufebius's words here. Moreover, these Camelarii (keepers of Camels) were under his care and custody, as appears from the Novels, (i. e. Constitutio of Constantine in the 12th Title of the 1st. Code, de Aquat. (i. e. de Alacris, Libell. 22. pag. 277.) under whom were the Magistri of the Flocks, and of the Stables, as appears from the Notitia Imperii Romani. See the Advs of Arnobius the Pope. Calci-

(c) He means the Schism between Meletrius Lycopollitanus and Peter Bishop of Alexandria; concerning which see Athanasius and Epiphanius. He means also Donatus's Schism in Africa, against Cecilianus the Bishop. Vale!

(d) The place Eusebius here speaks of is not to be found in this Book. Whence 'tis apparent, that this Book, concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, is imperfect. Any body may perceive that the beginning of it is wanting. But this defect may be made up from Chap. 2. Concerning Silvanus, John, and Thirty nine other Martyrs.

THE seventh Year of the Persecution against us was now complicated; and our Affairs, (having by little and little obtain'd some thing of a tendency towards a quiet posture by an abatement of their Heats who had been our malicious Detractors,) proceeded on to the eighth year, when no small number of Confessors were gathered together about the Brals Mines in Palefine, and enjoy'd their liberty to such a degree, that they erected Buildings to make Churches of: . But the Governour of the Province (a cruel and wicked person, as he manifested himself to be, upon account of what he did against the Martyrs) making a journey thither, and being inform'd of their

(b) It was a sort of punishment amongst the Romans, that free-men, (i.e. those that were free of Rome) should be condemned to look after the Emperor's Horſes and Camels, and to ſuch like offices. This employment was called Camelaſia, and it is reckoned amongst the perſonal Offices, in the Pandects (Tit. de Muner. l.

their way of living in that place, acquainted the Emperor therewith, writing what he judged suitable to calumniate them. Afterwards, the Governour of the Mines came thither, and (as if he had had an Imperial Order so to do,) having separated that Company of Confessors, allotted Cyprus to be the place of habitation for some of them, and Libanus for others. He dispersed others of them in several places throughout Palestine, and gave order they should all be wearied out with various sorts of laborious Employments. Then he pick'd out four, which seem'd to be the most eminent persons amongst them, and sent them to the Commander in Chief of the Military Forces in those parts. Two of these were Egyptian Bishops, by name Pelent and Nilus; the third was a

(a) His name was Heli; who together with Patermuthius, was burnt to death; as 'tis recorded in the Greek Actes, at the 17th of September. Plotius mentions Patermuthius, in his Biblioth. Chap. 113; where he speaks of the Books written by Pamphilus the Martyr, during his Imprisonment, in defence of Origen. (a) Presbyter; and the fourth was Patermuthius, a person signally renown'd amongst all men upon account of his sedulity in doing all men good offices. This Commander, having ask'd these men to renounce their Religion, and not obtaining his request, order'd they should be burnt to death. Again, there were others at the same place, (who were allotted a particular Country to inhabit in by themselves,) to wit, such of the Confessors, as either by reason of their age, or the mangling of their Members, or because of other bodily Infirmiti-es, were freed from doing service in those laborious employments. The prin-

(b) By these Words Eusebius seems to declare, that this Silvanus was not Bishop of Gaza: For Eusebius only says that Silvanus was born at Gaza, and made Bishop over those Christians that wrought in the Mines in Palestine. The Grecks (in their Actes, at the 14th of October) seem to have taken these Words of Eusebius in this sense. For they say that Silvanus was Presbyter of the Church at Cyrene: And after he had suffered most acie tortures at Cyrene, was comm'd to the Libani, where the Office of a Bishop was conferred on him by the Christians. So the Armenians. But Eusebius (in Book 6, Chap. 12.) does evidently call him Bishop of Gaza. Valef.

cipal among these was Silvanus, (b) a Bishop born at Gaza, a person that demonstrated himself to be a truly religious and most genuine Example of the Christian Profession. This man after he had been signally eminent in all sorts of conflicts [undergone upon account] of Caesariensis, from the very first day (as I may say) of the Persecution, and during the whole time it lasted, was reserved for this opportunity, that he might in the last place seal up as it were all the Combats [of the Martyr] in Palestine. Many Egyptians were with him; amongst whom there was one * John, who for strength of Memory far surpass'd all Men of our age. This Man had been deprived of his Eye-sight before. Nevertheless, in the conflicts of Confession (wherein he got great renown) when one of his Feet (after the same manner that others were served) was rendered useless by being sear'd with red-hot Irons; his Eyes also (alho he could not then see) were burnt out with searing-irons: To such an height of cruelty and inhumanity had the merciless and incompassionate Executions then arriv'd in their carriage [towards the Christians!]. 'Tis needlett to extol this Man for his Morals, and the Philosophick Life he led, especially since he was not so admirable upon that account, as for his strength of Memory; [for] he had whole Books of the sacred Scriptures written (not on Tables of Stone, as the Divine Apostle says, nor on Parchments, or Paper, which are devoured by Moths and time, but) on the fleshy Tables of his Heart, that is, on his bright Soul, [which were legible] to the most clear Eye of his Mind. In so much that, whenever he pleas'd, he could produce out of his Mouth, as it were out of a Treasury of Learnings, sometimes the Books of the Law and those of the Prophets, another while the Historical parts of Scripture, and again at other times the Evangelick and Apostolick Writings. I was, I confess, amazed, when I first saw this Man standing in the midst of a numerous Ecclesiastick Congregation, and repeating some parts of the Divine Scripture. For as long as I could only hear his voice, I supposed him to have read what was usually rehear'd in such Assemblies. But when I approach'd very near, and saw plainly what was done, to wit, all the rest [in the Assembly] standing round, and having their Eye-sight clear and perfect, and him making use of the Eyes of his Understanding only, in reality delivering Oracles like some Prophet, and far surpassing those that were found and healthy in body; I could not forbear praising and glorifying of God. And I thought that I really beheld a firm and most evident instance to persuade me to believe, that he is to be accounted truly a Man, (not who appears so to be by the external shape of his Body, but) who is such in respect of his Mind and Understanding. For altho' this person had a mangled and deformed Body, yet he demonstrat'd the strength of his internal Faculties to be great and most powerful. Moreover, God himself vouchsafed to allot these forementioned persons (who, living in a place apart by themselves, spent their time according to the usual manner in Prayers, Fasting, and in the performance of other severe exercises of Religion,) a blessed and salutary death; reaching out to them his propitious Right Hand. * But that malicious Enemy * The Devil of all Goodness, unable to endure them any longer, in regard they were carefully arm'd against him with their continual Prayers to God, resolv'd to have them killed and removed from off the Earth, as being troublesome to him. Which God permitted him to attempt and perform; both that he should not be hindred from doing mischief, agreeable to his own mind and purpose; and that they might at length receive the Rewards of their various Combats. Thus therefore nine and thirty persons were beheaded on one and the same day, by an Order from the most impious Maximin. These were the Martyrdoms perpetrated in Palestine during the space of ten years, and such was the Persecution in our days; which having been began from those times wherein the Churches were demolish'd, was much increased in the times succeeding by the Governour's Infolencies. Amidst which, their various and different Combats who were Religious Champions, made an innumerable company of Martyrs throughout every Province; to wit, in Libya, and throughout all Egypt, Syria, and all those Provinces, which reach from the East round to the Country of Illyricum. For those Regions situate beyond these now mentioned, that is, all Italy, Sicily, France, and those which lie towards the Sun-setting, Spain, Mauritania, and Africa, having not endured the rage of the Persecution full out the space of the two first years, were vouchsafed a sudden visitation from God, and [obtain'd] peace: Divine Providence taking compassion on the Simplicity and Faith of those Men. Further, an accident (a parallel to which the Records from the very first beginning of the Roman Empire cannot shew) happened now first in these our days, contrary to all expectation. For, during the Persecution in our times, the Empire was divided into two parts. Those Brethren which were Inhabitants of the one part, that just now mentioned, enjoy'd peace: But such as dwelt in the other part of the Empire, endured innumerable Conflicts [renew'd against them] successively. But when Divine Grace gave some Indications of its candour and compassionate Visitation of us, then those very Governours of ours (who before had been raiders of the Wars waged against us in our days,) having most miraculously altered their minds, founded a Retreat; extinguishing the flame of Persecution kindled against us, by Rescripts published in favour to us, and by mild Edicts. (c) 'Tis requisite, that we record their Retraction.

Book is wanting; to wit, the Retraction, of the Emperor, or Galerius Maximianus's Edict, ordering a stop to be put to the Persecution. But this defect may be easily made up from the last Chapter of the Eighth Book of the Ecclesiastick History. Valef.

Concerning the counterfeited Cessation [of the Persecution.]

THIS Revocation contained in the Imperial Edict (a) mentioned before, was published in all parts of Asia, and throughout the adjacent Provinces. After which Publications thus made, Maximin the Eastern Tyrant, a person as impious as ever breathed, and a most deadly Enemy to the Worship of the supreme God; being in no wise pleased with these Rescripts, instead of the foremention'd Edict, issues out a verbal Order only to those Governours within his Jurisdiction, that they should stop the Persecution against us. For, in regard he durst not in any wise oppose the Decree of his Superiors, * having concealed the foremention'd Edict, and taken such care, as that it should not be publicly propos'd in the Provinces under his Jurisdiction; he gives order by word of mouth only to those Governours under him, that they should put a stop to the Persecution against us; of which Order they inform one another by Letters. For Sabinus, who was then honoured with the Prefecture of the Pretorium (the chiefest Office (c) among them) in a Latin Epistle to the Governours of the Provinces declared the (d) Emperor's Pleasure; <sup>(e)</sup> In stead of [with them]

them] the reading in Nicophorus is [with him,] with him, shewing that Sabinus was Prefect of the Pretorium to Maximin. But our Copies do all agree in the former reading, that is [with them,] in the plural number; which is the truest. For, although Sabinus bore the Prefecture of the Pretorium (which we may call the Office of Lord Chief Justice, or of Lieutenant General under the Emperor, to govern Provinces in Civil Causes; See Pancirol. in Notitiam Imper. Orient. cap. 5.) under Maximinus Caesar in the East; yet because he was made Prefect by Galerius, therefore he is styled the Prefect of the Emperors, meaning Galerius and Maximinus. For the Caesars had not the power of creating Prefects; but they were made by the Augusti, as may be shewn from many places in Amm. Marcellinus. Hence 'tis, that Sabinus in his Edict (which Eusebius does here insert) always speaks of the Emperors in the plural number, to let the Governours of particular Provinces understand, that that was the Command of the Emperors, to wit, Galerius, Constantine, Licinius, and Maximinus. (in this Epistle of his to the Presidents of the Provinces) makes very little mention of this Constitution, because he would not displeasure Maximin. Further, by the word [Emperor] Christophorus thought Maximin was meant. But I like Rufinus's Version better, who supposed Galerius to be understood thereby; and besides, Eusebius usually calls Maximin by the name of Tyrant, not Cesar. Valef.

Maximin the Contents of which Letter we have thus translated:

The Majesty of our most sacred Lords the Emperors, by their earnest and most devout Care, have long since determined to render the Minds of all Men conformable to the true and holy Rule of Living; that by this means they who seem to have embraced Usages different from those of the Romans, might be induced to exhibit due Worship to the Immortal Gods. But the obstinate and most untractable Perverseness of some Mens Minds was arrived at such an height, that neither could the Justice of the [Imperial] Decree prevail with them to recede from their own Resolutions, nor the imminent Punishment annexed strike any terror into them. Since therefore it might have happened, that upon this account many would have precipitated themselves into danger; the Sacred Majesty of our Lords the most Pious and Eminent, (according to their innate Clemency) judging it disagreeable to their own most sacred Intent, that upon this occasion Men should be surrounded with such great danger; enjoyed

* I suppose, these are the terms of honour, which their great Officers had given to them in all Address; and which they themselves also made use of, when they mentioned themselves in any Letters they wrote to others: The Words in the Greek are καταστάσεις, which Vulgius renders devotion and obsequium, by him translated Reverence.

* Devotion to write to your Prudence: That if evidence be brought against any Christian for his following that way of Worship observed amongst those of his own Religion, you should secure him and set him free from all danger and vexation, and that you should condemn none to be punished upon account of this pretence. For since it has been manifestly evidenced, that during so long a tract of time they could by no means be persuaded to desert from their perverse Stubbornness; your Prudence therefore is enjoined to write to the Curators, to the Magistrates, and to the Presidents of the Villages [belonging to] every City, that they may understand, that for the future they are not to take any further care concerning (c) this affair.

(c) I doubt not but in stead of [τοῦ ἀρχιεπισκόπου] this decree, it ought to be [τοῦ ἀρχιεπισκόπου] for the Christians. With ancient Nicopolitan comes book 7, Chap. 24, who has expressed this place thus, that they should not trouble themselves any further about the Christians. Valef.

Hereupon, all the Governours of Provinces, supposing that the Letter written to them [by Sabinus] contained [Maximin's] true and genuine meaning, did by their Letters communicate the Emperor's pleasure to the Curators, Magistrates, and Presidents of the Villages. Nor did they urge these things to them by Letters only, but much more by such deeds, as that the Prince's Command might thereby be put in execution; bringing forth, and setting at liberty those Prisoners which they had in hold for Confession of the Faith of God; and also releasing them who had been adjudged to the punishment of working in the Mines. For they supposed that this would in reality be well-pleasing to the * Emperor, but herein they were mistaken. These things being thus finished, on a sudden (like some bright-shining Light which darts forth its Rays after a thick darksome Night,) you might have seen Churches gathered together throughout every City; full Assemblies; and the usual (f) solemnity of solemn services. Dionysius Alexander, used this term in the same sense, as we noted before. There was a twofold Synaxis; one of the Prayers; the other of the Sacrament. Athanasius mentions the former, in his Apology to Constantius. Valef.

lemn Services performed at these Meetings. All the Infidels were not a little astonished at these things, wondering at so great and unexpected an alteration of Affairs; and crying out, that the God of the Christians was the Great and only True God. Also, those of our Religion, who had faithfully and manfully strove in the Combat of Persecution, obtained great confidence and freedom amongst all Men. But as many as through weakness of Faith had made shipwreck of their Souls, with much earnestness ran to seek for a remedy; begging and praying for an assisting Right Hand from them that were strong, and supplicating God to be merciful to them. Moreover, soon after this, the Noble Champions of Religion, released from their servitude in labouring in the Mines, return'd to their own Countries; and being glad and jocund, travelling through the Cities, were filled with an inexpressible Joy, and a Confidence unutterable. Thus did numerous Companies of persons that were Christians perform their Journeys, lauding God with Hymns and Psalms in the midst of the High-ways and Market-places. And you might now have seen those, (who but lately had been in Bonds, groaning under most severe Punishments, and driven from their own Countries) with joyful and pleasant Countenances possessing their own Habitations again: In so much that they, who formerly [threatened to] murder and destroy us, when they saw this Miracle which did so far surpass all Mens expectation, rejoyc'd with us at what had happened.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Change of Affairs which did afterwards ensue.

BUT the Tyrant (who, as we said before, Ruled in the Eastern parts) no longer able to endure these things, (he being a professed Enemy to Goodness, and one who laid wait to ensnare all good Men) suffered not this state of Affairs to continue (a) the space of six months complete. But, inventing all the ways imaginable to subvert the Peace, first he attempted (upon some pretence or other) to hinder us from assembling in the * Cemeteries. Afterwards (b) he sends an Embassy to himself against us, having solicited the Antiochians, by the means of some impious persons, that they should petition to obtain this from him (under the notion of the greatest favour,) to wit, that he would empower them to suffer no Christians to dwell amongst them: He also excited the Inhabitants of other Cities to do the like. The Chief of all these was one Theoctetus, an Antiochian; a turbulent Person, an Impostor, and a wicked Man, (whose Nature was not answerable to his † Name;) he was at that time (c) Curator of Antioch.

See the Appendix to the eighth Book of this History. When Maximinus Caesar heard of his death, he renewed the Persecution against the Christians, and proclaimed himself Augustus; whereas he was only Cesar before, and was compelled to obey the Commands of Galer. Augustus. Valef.

* See Book 7. Chap. 11. Note (f.)

(b) What is meant by this elegant passage [αὐτῶν τῶν κατὰ τὸν ἁγίον ἀντιστάσεων] neither Christophorus nor Musculus understood: the meaning of it is this: Maximin sent underhand how cunning Men to solicit the Antiochians, to send Embassadors to his Court, to request of him, that they might have liberty to drive out all Christians from amongst them. Hence Maximin, who did underhand procure this Embassy, may well be said to have sent this Embassy to himself, and he himself to have been the Embassador; this transposition of Words is frequent and familiar in Eusebius. Valef.

† The Import of Theoctetus in the Greek, is, a Son of God.

C H A P. III.

Concerning an Image newly made at Antioch.

WHEN this [Theotecnus] therefore had several ways made his attacks against us, and had taken all imaginable care to hunt those of our Religion out of their Coverts, (as if they had been Thieves and Malefactors,) and had invented all the ways and methods of calumniating and accusing us, and had been the occasion of putting many Men to death: At last he creates an Image of (a) Jupiter Philus, and (b) consecrates it with Magick Charms. And, having invented and instituted, in honour of it, impure Ceremonies, execrable Initiations, and most detestable Expiations; he gave the Emperor himself a demonstration of the impotence of his Oracles, by which he effected what he had undertaken. Moreover, this Man, to please the Emperor by his Flattery, stirreth up the Demon against the Christians; feigning that God commanded, that the Christians (as being his Enemies) should be banished the City, and all the Countries adjoining to the City.

(a) This Temple of Jupiter Philus at Antioch is mentioned by Julianus Africanus, and by Lactantius (it is false not in Antioch). Valef.
(b) The Ceremonies of the Gentiles, used in the erection and consecration of Images to their Gods, were various. For Jupiter Cæsius was consecrated with one sort of Rites, Hercules with another, and Philus with a third. Jupiter Cæsius, whose Image they kept in their Store-houses, was consecrated with a little Tub. Amideus (in Ægyptus), that is, in P. B. De Ritibus Særis, apud Athenas, B. 11: Cap. 6.) relates the Ceremonies of Consecration. Jupiter Hercules was consecrated with Pots: See Aristophanes in Danaidibus. After the same manner were the Images consecrated, which they erected to Mercury, and other Gods. And this they termed, Σχεμα ἰδενον, to Consecrate with Pots: to these Pots they layed all sorts of pulc, of which they offered sacrifice to those Gods they consecrated. In memory of the food eaten in all times, and of the fragility of the Ancients. But when they desired to be at greater cost in treating their God, then they killed a sacrifice at the erection of his Image; which they termed ἱερὸν ἰδενον, to Consecrate with a slain Sacrifice. See Aristophanes (in Irene) and his Scholasti, pag. 693. See Suidas also, in the word σάκρον. Besides these Ceremonies, they used sometimes Magical Consecrations: So Theotecnus did here, in the Dedication of an Image to Jupiter Philus. Valef.

C H A P. IV.

Concerning the Decrees [of the Cities] against the Christians.

WHEN Theotecnus, (the first person that acted against us) had had this desired success, all the other Magistrates, inhabiting the Cities under Maximin's Jurisdiction, hastened to establish the same Decree; also, the Governours of Provinces, perceiving that this was acceptable to the Emperor, prompted those that lived within their District, to do the same thing: Moreover, when the Tyrant had by his Rescript most willingly assented to their Ordinances, the Flame of Persecution was again kindled afresh against us. At length, Priests of the Images were constituted in every City; and moreover, such Men as had been most eminent in State Employments, and had acquitted themselves honourably in the publick Offices they had born, were by (a) Maximin himself created Chief Priests. These Men were very diligent and earnest about the Worship of their Gods. For, (that I may speak briefly) the great Superstition of this Emperor had such an influence as well upon the Governours, as the Private Persons within the Limits of his Government, that it induced them all to act any thing against us in compliance to him: And they thought, that to murder us, and to invent some new mischievous Stratagems against us, was the most grateful Acknowledgment they could pay for the Favours they expected to receive from him.

(a) By this Decree, Provincia-um. Concerning whom see Book 8. Chap. 14. Note (b). A Sacerdos Provincia was created by the Votes of the Decuriones, i. e. the Senators, or Aldermen of the City. Now those Men especially were advanced to this Dignity, who had with honour acquitted themselves in the discharge of all Offices belonging to the Court; as we may see in Cyd. Theol. Tit. De Decurionibus. Eusebius here takes notice of it as a thing new and unusual, that Maximinus himself should elect the Sacerdotes Provincia. Valef.

C H A P. V.

Concerning the forged Acts.

HAVING therefore forged some (a) Acts of Pilate concerning our Saviour, which were stuffed with all manner of Blasphemy against Christ; by [ Maximin ] the Emperor's Order they send them throughout all his Dominions; commanding by their Letters that these Records should be posted up in all places, both in the Country and in the Cities; and that such as were School-masters should give them to their Scholars in stead of their Lessons, and make them study them, that so they might have them imprinted on their Memories. Whilst these things were done after this manner, the Chief Commander in the Army at Damascus, a City of Phoenicia (whom the Romans call a Captain) having chased some infamous Women out of the Marketplace, compelled them by threatening them with tortures, to (b) testify, by subscribing the said publick Records, that they were formerly Christians; and that they were conscious to their prophane practices; and that in their very Churches they performed obscene and lascivious actions; and what-ever else he would have them say, that might bring a scandal upon our Religion. The Testimonies of these Women he inserted into the said Acts, and sent them to the Emperor: By whose order these very Records were published in every City, and in all other places.

By Pontius Pilate, and punished by him; the Acts of whose passion are extant? Moreover, these Acta gishdialia Tarachi, &c. were performed when Diocletian was Consul the fourth time, and Maximinian the third, as the inscription of the first interrogatory sheweth. Whence 'tis plain, that these Acts of Pilate were forged long before the Persecution; the contrary to which Eusebius affirms in this place. But, that I may freely speak my sense, the inscription of these Acta gishdialia is in my judgment false; and it should be corrected thus, rebus Diocletian non Consul the ninth time, and Maximinian the eighth: For (1) there is, in those Acts, mention of the Imperial Command, whereby 'twas ordered that all Men should sacrifice to the Gods. Now this command was issued out on the nineteenth year of Diocletian's Empire. (2) In the ninth Chapter these Words occur. The President said, you curse the Prince, who have secured a lasting and continual Peace. Andronicus said, I have cursed the Plague, and the Blood-thirsty, which destroy the World. This expression [concerning the securing a lasting and continual Peace] cannot agree with the fourth Consulate of Diocletian; for at that time the Barbarians attacked the Roman Empire on every side. Besides, I can't see how Diocletian and Maximinian can be termed, Blood-thirsty, till after the 19th year of Diocletian, when the Persecution began. Lastly, which is another Argument, Eusebius affirms, that their Acts of Pilate were forged in the time of this Persecution. Valef.

(b) Rufinus has rendered the Greek Phrase here (which is ἀποκαταστασας) thus, Acta proferri, to attest the truth of the said Acts by signing of them: For an evidence may be given both by word of mouth, and in writing also. Valef.

Concerning them that suffered Martyrdom in those Times.

BUT not long after, this Captain was his own Executioner, suffering a condign Punishment for his malicious Wickedness. And now
Q 2 Banish-

Maximianus. Banishments and most horrid Persecutions were a fresh raised against us; the Presidents in every Province renewing their cruel Infrurections against us: In so much that some of the most eminent Asserters of the Divine Faith were apprehended, and without any Commiseration had the sentence of Death pronounced against them. Three of them having professed themselves Christians, were cast to the Wild-Beasts and devour'd by them at Emesa, a City of Phœnicia: Amongst them was a Bishop, one (a) Silvanus, a very old man, who had born that Office forty years compleat. At the same time also, (b) Peter, that most eminent Prelate of the Alexandrian Church, (the chiefest Ornament and Glory of the Bishops, both for his virtuous Life, and his Study and Knowledge in the sacred Scriptures) being apprehended for no crime at all, was beheaded contrary to every bodies expectation by Maximian's order on a sudden, and without any specious pretence. Likewise many other Egyptian Bishops suffered the same death that he did. (c) Lucianus also, Presbyter of the Church at Antioch, a very pious Man, much famed for his Contineny, and his Knowledge in the sacred Scriptures, was brought to the City of Nicomedia, (d) where the Emperor then kept his Court; and after he had made his Apology, in defence of that Doctrine which he asserted, before the President he was committed to Prison and murder'd. In fine, Maximin, that professed Enemy of all Virtue, did in a short time load us with such Burthens of Afflictions, that this latter storm of Persecution raised by him seemed to us far more grievous than the former.

(a) This Silvanus is a distinction from that Silvanus which Eusebius mentions in his Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, chap. the last. For this was Bishop of the Emperor was Bishop of Gaza. The first was beheaded in the Mines at Palestine with 39 other Martyrs; in the eighth year of the Persecution. But this Silvanus was cast to the wild Beasts at Emesa, on the ninth year of the Persecution. Concerning this Man's Martyrdom Eusebius has said something before, in his eighth Book, although not in its proper place; see Book 8. Chap. 13. Valf.

(b) Eusebius mentions this Man's Martyrdom before in the eighth Book, Chap. 13, but not in its proper place. For the eighth Book does not go beyond the eighth year of the Persecution. But Peter Bishop of Alexandria was Martyr'd in the ninth year of the Persecution (which Eusebius expressly affirmeth in the end of the seventh Book) upon the seventh of the Calends of December, as we read in the Excerpta Chronologica published by Scaliger. Ursinus says the time; and so does Ado, and the old Roman Martyrology. The Greeks celebrate his birth-day on the 24th of November. The Acts of his Passion are extant in a MS. in Greek, which the Reverend Father Franciscus Combesius has, and will shortly publish, with many other things. Valf.

(c) Eusebius has mentioned this Man's Martyrdom at Book 8. Chap. 13, though not in its due place. But here he remarks the time more distinctly, wherein Peter and Lucianus suffered; to wit, under Maximin; not in the Reign of Galerius Maximianus, as Baronius would have us believe, at the year of Christ 311, cap. 3. Altho Baronius is mistaken in placing the Martyrdom of Peter Bishop of Alexandria on the year of Christ 310, for he suffered in the year of our Lord 311, on the ninth year current of the Persecution. Baronius's error arose from his beginning the Persecution a year too soon; which mistake we have sufficiently confuted before, at Book 8. Chap. 2. Note (-). Moreover, in regard Lucianus's Martyrdom happened under Maximin, the Martyrdom of Antimachus Bishop of Nicomedia should in my judgment, be placed under Maximin also. Indeed Antimachus suffered a little before Lucianus, as Lucianus informs us in his Epistle to the Autiochians, which I made mention of in Book 8. Chap. 13. Note (a). We may also make the same conclusion from the Acts of Lucianus the Martyr; where, instead of Maximinus, we read Maximianus, which is a common error in the Greeks. Valf.

(d) When Galerius was dead, Maximinus took possession of Asia and Bithynia, which Provinces (together with Ibrycum, and Thracia) were governed by Galerius. For Galerius kept these Provinces for himself, as Eutropius informs us; the same is attested by the old Author of the Excerptions, which I published at the end of my Annals. Maximinus therefore made his abode at Nicomedia, which was the chief City of Bithynia; where the Emperors had a Palace ever since Diocletian's time. Further, the following Words do evidently manifest, that by the term [Emperor] Maximinus must be meant. Wherefore I wonder at Baronius, for asserting that Lucianus suffered under Galerius, not under Maximin; when as Eusebius, contemporary with Lucianus, assures he was killed by Maximin. Valf.

C H A P. VII.

Concerning the Edict against us, which was [engraven on Brazen Plates and] hung up on the Pillars.

Moreover, in the midst of every City (a) (which was never seen before) the Decrees of Cities, and also the Imperial Edicts against us, were engraven on Brazen Plates, and propos'd to open view. And the Boys in the Schools had nothing in their Mouths * all day long but Jesus and Pilate, and the Acts which were forg'd to disgrace us. I judge it pertinent to insert here this very Rescript of Maximinus's, which was engraven on Plates of Brass: Both that the proud and arrogant Insolency of this Man's Hatred towards God may be manifested: And also that it may hence be made apparent, that Divine Justice (which hates the Impious, and keeps a continual watch against them) did with in a very short time pursue and overtake him: By which Divine Justice he was enforced to alter his Sentiments soon after concerning us, and to confirm them by his Edicts in Writing. But these are the Contents of his Rescript.

Nor is it deny'd by our Eusebius. But that which he asserts is now never seen before, is the engraving of their Edicts upon plates of Brass. For (as we observed before, Book 8. Chap. 5. Note (b)) the Imperial Edicts were written on Paper. Valf.

A COPY OF THE TRANSLATION OF MAXIMIN'S RESCRIPT, IN ANSWER TO THE DECREES OF THE CITIES AGAINST US, TRANSCRIBED FROM A BRAZEN PLATE AT TYRE.

Now at length the infirm Confidence of Man's Mind, having shaken off and dispersed the Cloud and Mist of Error (which heretofore invested the Senses of Men, not so much wicked as wretched, being involved in the fatal Night of Ignorance,) may discern, that it is undoubtedly governed and strengthened by the indulgent Providence of the immortal Gods. It is incredible to express how grateful, how pleasing and acceptable a thing it was to us, that you gave such a Proof of your Pious Resolution towards the Gods. Indeed, before this time no person was insensible of the Obediency and Religious Worship you shew'd to the immortal Gods; (b) for your Faith is made known to them not in bare and empty Words, but by uninterrupted and miraculous, Christophorjon and Maj eminent Acts, upon which account your City may culus deservedly be filed the Seat and Mansion of the thought immortal Gods. For it is manifestly evident by many instances, that She flourisheth by the (c) Arrival and Presence of the celestial Deities in Her: But lo! Now your City (careless of all its own particular Concerns, and having no regard to the Petitions, which in times past it did usually make to us) for the welfare of its Affairs,) when heretofore it was sensible that the Promoters of that accursed to the Tyrants themselves. Maximin does attempt to blacken the faith of the Christians by their words, he calls it, ἀσκήσιον πνεύματος msc. a faith of bare words: as if the Christian faith had nothing in it but words, and were void of all reality. Valf.

(c) The antients believed, that on set days the Gods descended into those Cities for which they had a kindness: Hence it is that the Inhabitants of Delos and Miletus solemnized the coming of Apollo: and the Argivi, the advent of Diana. This coming of the Gods we find mentioned up and down in the Poets, as in Virgil. Hence it is, that upon old Coins, and in the Calendar, we find written Adventus Imp. Valf.

Vanity did begin to creep again, and [perceived] that (like Fire which is carefully left and raked up,) it broke forth into violent Flames; the Brands thereof being rekindled, immediately without the least delay made its Address to our Piety, as to the Metropolis of all Religion, petitioning for a Redress and an Assistance. 'Tis evident that the Gods have insinuated into your Minds this wholesome Advice upon account of your constant and faithful Perseverance in your Religion. For the most High and Mighty Jupiter, (who presides over your most famous City, and preserveth your Country Gods, your Wives and Children, your Families and Houses from all manner of Destruction and Ruin) hath breathed into your Minds this salutary Resolution; whence he hath evidenced and plainly demonstrated, what an excellent, noble, and comfortable thing it is, to adore him, and to approach the sacred Ceremonies of the immortal Gods with a due Obediency and Veneration. For what Man can there be found so foolish and so void of all Reason, who perceives not that it comes to pass by the favourable Care of the Gods towards us, that neither the Earth does deny to restore the Seeds committed to it, frustrating the hopes of the Husbandmen with vain Expectations; or that the returning to a right and sound Temper of Mind, let them rejoice the more upon that account; in regard, (being delivered as it were from a Storm unforeseen, and from a fatal Disease,) they shall in future reap the sweet Enjoyments of a happy Life. But if any shall wishfully persist in that their execrable Vanity and Error, let them be banished and driven far from your City and its Vicinage (according to your request :) That by this means your City, being (agreeable to your commendable Diligence in this Affair) freed from all Pollution and Impiety, may wholly devote it self (according to its natural Inclination) to attend upon the Sacrifices and Worship of the immortal Gods with all due veneration. Now, that you may be sensible how acceptable your Address in this Case was to us, and how ready and forward our Mind is voluntarily to comply with and reward good Desires even without any Decrees or Supplication; we permit your Devotion to ask the greatest Favour you have a mind to, upon account of this your Religious Attempt. And now therefore make it your business, to ask this, and have it granted. For you shall obtain it without any delay. And this great Boon granted to your City shall endure throughout all Ages, both as a Testimony of your most Religious Piety towards the immortal Gods; and shall also be an Evidence to your Children and Descendants; that for this your good Course and Resolution of Life you have received due Rewards from our Gracious Goodness.

There is no Man but knows that all these Calamities, (yea far more horrid than these) have happened heretofore. And all these Evils fell upon us, because of that pernicious Error and most vain Folly of these wicked Men, at such time as it abounded in their Souls, and turbed the whole Earth all most with Shame and Confusion. After the interposition of some words, he continues: Let Men now look into the open Fields, and see the flourishing Corn, waving its weighty Ears; let them view the Meadows gloriously bedecked with Flowers and Grass caused by the seasonable springing

This Rescript against us was fixed up, on the Pillars throughout every Province, and did utterly exclude us from all hopes of Safety, as far as it lay in Human power to do: In so much that (according to that Divine Oracle) * Even the elect themselves, were it possible, would have been offended at these things. But now, when all expectation [of assistance from above] was amongst most of us in a manner expired and extinct; while they, who were commissioned to publish the foregoing Edict against us, were in some Countries yet on their Journey; God, the Protector of his own Church, (repressing the outrageous Insolence of the Tyrant against us, by stopping his Mouth as it were;) did on a sudden demonstrate his Celestial assistance in defence of us.

For two sorts of Earthquakes (contrary to each other) are here spoken of by Maximian; to wit, (1) βραχυσταλίας; which (as Ammianus Marcellinus describes them, Book 17, pag. 98. Edit. Paris 1636.) Erumum molissimum sublimis sursum propellens immoventes moles, raise the ground after an horrid manner, and drive forth vast quantities of earth: (2) αὐτοῦ, which (according to Ammianus Marcellinus description, loc. citat.) grandiori motu perfoliis subito vorantibus, terrarum partes absorbent, having on a sudden made vast fissures in the ground by a most violent motion, swallow up parts of the Earth. See Valerius' Notes on these words of Ammianus Marcellinus; pag. 142. Maximian means here that Earthquake which afflicted the City of Tyre, in that Year before Diocletian's Persecution, as our Eusebius relates in his Chronicon. Valer.

Concerning what afterwards happen'd in the time of the Wars, of the Famine, and of the Pestilence.

* FOR Showers and Rains which would then * The have been seasonable (it being Winter) most ancient withheld their wonted Streams from the Earth: Upon which happen'd a Famine, not so much as MS. begins thought of or expected, which was followed by a Pestilence. There raged also another violent at these Disease, (it was an Ulcer, which was properly words; call'd a Carbuncle, upon account of its violent burning.) This Ulcer spread itself over all the parts of the Body, and was very fatal and dangerous to them that were afflicted with it. And because its chief Seat was for the most part longest about the Eyes, it blinded a great many Men, Women, and Children. Besides all these Calamities, the Tyrant did now engage in a War against the Armenians, who had been old Friends and Allies of the Romans. This * person hated * Maxi- by God, endeavour'd to compel these Men (who were all Christians, very studious and industrious about the Service of God,) to sacrifice to Idols and Demons, and so rendered them Foes Q 3 instead instead of being Friends, and bitter Enemies instead of Confederates. All these Calamities therefore, hapning on a sudden at one and the same time, did curb and confute the arrogant boasting of the insolent Tyrant against God; who had impudently brag'd, that in regard of his care in worshipping Idols, and persecuting us, neither War nor Famine, nor Pestilence, had hapned in his Reign. Therefore all these Calamities coming to pass together, and at the same instant, were as Prologues and Fore-runners of his imminent Ruin. Both He and his Armies suffered much in the Expedition against the Armenians: And the residue, who inhabited the Cities under his Government, were miserably oppressed with the Plague and Famine: So that one Measure of Wheat was sold for two thousand five hundred

Note (b.) Blot; almost all persons being destroy'd either by the want of Sustainance, or the Pestilential Disease: Some did not refuse to sell to the wealthier sort, even those things which were most dear to them, for a little morsel of Food. Others selling their Estates by parcels, were reduced to the greatest want and extremity. Other some chew'd in pieces little handfuls of Grais, which they had pluck'd up, and making no distinction, but eating poisonous Herbs together therewith, which corrupted the healthful Constitution of their Bodies, they perished. Also in every City divers Women of good Families, being reduced through want to shameless necessity, came forth to beg in the Market-place: Their modest Countenances and neatness of Drefs were an evidence of their genteel Education: Some were pined away and dried up like the Ghosts of persons departed, so that they went reeling and tottering this way and that way, and being not able to stand, fell down in the midst of the Streets, and lying stretched out upon the Ground with their Faces downward, they craved that even the least morsel of Bread might be given them: And at their very last gasp cried out, that they were hungry; being only strong enough to utter this most doleful expression. But others that seem'd to be rich, astonish'd at the multitude of Beggars, when they had given away a great deal, afterwards became uncompassionate and inexorable, expecting that they themselves should ere-long suffer the same Extremities with those that now begg'd of them. So that now the dead Carcasses which lay in the midst of the Market-places and By-Streets naked and unburied for many days, were a most lamentable Spectacle to the Beholders. Moreover, some were devoured by Dogs, upon which account those that survived, betook themselves to killing of Dogs; being afraid lest they should run mad, and devour them who were yet alive. Neither did the Plague more leisurely destroy whole Households and Families; but more especially those whom the Famine could not dispatch, because they were furnished with great store of Provision. Therefore the rich Presidents of Provinces, the Prefects, and a great many that were of the Magistracy, (as if the Famine had purposely reserved them to be devoured by the Pestilential Distemper) suffer'd an acute and sudden death. All places, By-Lanes, the Markets and Streets, were full of Lamentations. There was nothing to be seen but mournful songs at burials, (a) together with their usual pipes and other funeral-musick. Thus death fighting with the two forementioned weapons, wit, the Pestilence, and the Famine, did in a short time destroy whole Families; In so much that you might have seen two or three dead bodies carried out of the same house together to the (b) grave. Such were the rewards of Maximin's arrogance, and of the Decrees which the Cities issued out to the against us. During these sad times all the Heathens had evident demonstrations of the care and piety of the Christians exhibited towards all men. For only they (amidst so many and great calamities on all sides) in reality declared their true compassion, and good nature: Some of them imploy'd themselves, every day in taking care of and in burying the dead (for vast numbers died, whose funerals no body took care of.) Others gathered together into one body, all those in the City who lay under the pressures of the Famine, and distributed bread to them all. So that, when the same of this action was divulged amongst all Christians; Men; they all glorified the God of the Christians, and did acknowledge them to be pious, and the only true worshippers of God, being convinced both of sufficiently by their works. Affairs being in this posture, God the great and celestial defender of the Christians, (having by the afore said calamities manifested his wrath and indignation against all Men, because of their barbarous cruelties shown towards us,) did again restore to us the gracious and glorious spendour of his Providence; darting forth upon us (involved in the thickest darkness) the most miraculous light of his peace: And made it apparent to all Men, that God himself was always the Overseeer and Inspector of our Affairs; who does sometimes the same; indeed chastise and correct his People with scourges of affliction: But after sufficient chastisement, he does again shew himself gracious and merciful to those that confide in him.

stead of their pipes, &c. Thus he erroneously translates the place. But all our MSS. and Nicetanus keep to the common reading. Valer.

(b) By what is here related concerning the burial of the dead, we may gather that the custom of burning dead bodies was at that time wholly disused amongst the Romans. But, when this custom was inl abolished 'tis difficult to determine. The Romans seem to have taken up this custom of burying in Graves from the Jews, and Christians: Concerning which we have a place very observable in Macrobius: For (says he in his Saturnal B. 7. Cap. 7.) Although in our days the custom of burning the dead is antiquated and disannul'd: Yet History teacheth us that in those days, when they burned the dead, they pay'd great respect and honour to them. Valer.

After this, Constantine the Emperor and Licinius his Colleague, (who was not then fallen into that extravagant Madness which afterwards deprieved his Intellectuals) having both together worshipped and reconciled themselves to God the Author of all the Good which had happen'd to them, did with an unanimous accord and consent enact a most compleat and full Law in behalf of the Christians. And they sent a relation of the Miracles which God had done for them, and an account of their Victory over the Tyrant, together with this their Law, to Maximin who as yet was Emperor in the Eastern parts, and pretended Friendship towards them. But he, like a Tyrant, was discontented and dejected at this News: Yet being afterwards unwilling to seem to yield to others, and also out of fear to them who had confirmed the Edict, daring not

(i) JOVIUS MAXIMINUS AUGUSTUS, to SABINUS. I suppose it well known to Your Gravity, and to all Men, that our Lords and Fathers Diocletian and Maximian (when they persecuted that almost all Men, deserting the religious Worship of the Gods, joynd and applied themselves to the Sect of the Christians,) did rightly and duly decree, that all those Persons who had apostatized from the Worship and Service of their Gods, should be recalled to the Worship of the Gods by a publick Punishment and Chastisement. But when with an happy Omen when I first came into these (k) Eastern Provinces, flavianus and Galerius were created Caesars, Galerius, by marrying Diocletian's Daughter, and living with him in the East, came to be called Caesar Jovianus; and Constantine, by marrying Herculus's Daughter-in-law; and living with him in the Western parts, was called Caesar Herculus. Afterwards when Galerius died, Maximin, who was by him created Caesar, assumed to himself the surname of Jovianus; which English men takes notice of. See the Chronicon Alexandrinum. Valef.

(k) Under the name of the East, Egypt also is contained. For the Government thereof was committed to Maximinus Caesar. For Maximinus (after he was made Caesar by Galerius) received the jurisdiction over all those Provinces, which Diocletian had reserved to himself. And hence it came to pass, that Egypt was reckoned amongst the Eastern Provinces a long while after. So Amm. Marcellinus (B. 14. where he reckons the Provinces of the East,) reckons Egypt and Mesopotamia amongst them. Further, Egypt was originally under the Corner of the East, as we are informed from an ancient Inscription; the Contents whereof are these; M. MAECIO MEMMI O. FURIO BALBURI O. CECILIANO PLACIDO C. V. C. OMIT. ORIENTIS. EGYPTI. MESOPOTAMIAE. CONSULI ORDINARIO, &c. Valef.

and found that very many Men (who might be serviceable to the Republick) were Exiled and Confined by the Judges; for the reason aforesaid, to certain places appointed them; I gave a charge to all the Judges, that none of them should for the future treat the Subjects of their Provinces so barbarously; but that they should rather regain them to the service of the Gods by courteous Persuasions and kind Exhortations. During the time therefore that our Commands were, according to our Injunction, strictly observed, it happened that there was not one in all our Eastern Provinces either confined, or injured: But, in regard no Trouble or Disquietude happened to them, they were the rather reduced to the Worship of the Gods. After this, in (l) the last Year, when I successfully made a Journey to Nicomedia, and there abode, the Citizens of that City came to see me with the Images of their Gods, begging of me year past, with much earnestness that those sort of Men might (m) the by no means be permitted to inhabit amongst them. But in regard I understood that a great many Men (n) of that Religion lived in those parts, I gave them this answer That I was very well pleased with, and thankfull to them for their Address, but did not perceive that that was the desire of all Men in general. If therefore, any do persist in the [Christian] Superstition, every one of them may have his very free liberty, to choose what pleases him; and if (whereas) they will embrace the Service of the Gods, they also may do that. I thought it requisite to return a xivian kind reply to the Nicomedians, as well as to the other Cities, who with much importunity had pre-Bithynia, sent me with the same Petition, to wit, That so I might Christian might dwell in their Cities; (m) for so I gathered the preceding Emperors (as I observed) had always done; and it now so pleased the Gods, (by whom rich and all Men are preserved, and the publick State of had received Affairs continued in a sedate posture,) that I should be for grant that earnest Address of theirs, which they presented me with concerning the Divine Worship of their Gods. Wherefore although I have very frequently (m) This fore this time, as well by Rescripts as (n) Com-very in- mandis, ordered your Devotion, that the Presidents of tricate Provinces should not be rigid or severe in their Pro- and ob- ceedings against those within their Districts, who were, are, and are studious about the observation of the Rites and there is a Usage of the Christian Religion; but that they patiently tolerate, and with moderation comply with in these Words. [Ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ τῇ] which some have translated propterea quid, because, but the adverb [Ἐν τῇ] may be rendered ita, so, and then this is the meaning of the place, (viz.) I returned a kind reply to the Nicomedians, which the Emperors my Predecessors always were careful to do. The next difficulty is in these Words [ὑποφύει ἔτι, it therefore pleased the Gods, &c.] But we rather read ὑποφύει, and it now so pleased the Gods, &c. By this means [ὑποφύει] is fitly opposed to the preceding Words [ἔπειτα ἀπὸ τῶν ἀρχαίων, the ancient Emperors, &c.] according to this emendation we have translated the place. Valef.

(n) Maximin does here make distinction betwixt ὑποφύει and ἐνδοξα, Letters and Commands. Letters or Rescripts were sent by the Emperors to the Magistrates or Presidents, into their Provinces when they were absent from Court: Mandata or Commands were given them when they were present. When they were with him, before they went to their Provinces, all which Commands were bound up in a short Liber. And this was one of the chief of their Charges given them (to wit,) that they should be careful of their health. The Civilians speak much concerning these Mandata Principum. Valef.

Constant. and Licinius. them yet, lest they should suffer any Affronts or Molestations from the (o) Beneficiarii, or any others, I thought it agreeable and opportune to remind You Gravity by these Letters, that You should rather win the Subjects of Our Provinces to embrace the Wor-

(o) Those Soldiers were called Beneficiarii, or Beneficiaries, that were promoted by the favour of the Tribune; they were privileged from several Duties and Military Subjects to the Worship of the Gods by fair Words and kind Exhortations. Moreover, that this Injunction of Ours may come to the knowledge of all our Subjects, let it be Your care to (p) publish this Our Order by an Edict proposed by You.

(p) It was usual that the Prefects of the Pretorium should, immediately upon receipt of the Emperor's Law, publish it to the Subjects by their Edict. Sometimes they did promulge the Emperor's Law before their own Edict; sometimes they proclaimed their own Edict, and only mentioned in it the Emperor's Law. Thus did Severus, in the next Chapter of this ninth Book. But Rufinus says that he proclaimed the Emperor's Law before his own Edict. True it is, we must confess, that the Emperor's Laws were published before the Edicts of the President most commonly. Of this we have a notable instance in the Conference at Carthage, where after the reading of the Emperor's Letter to Marcellinus the Tribune and the Notarius, Marcellinus's Edict was read. We must suppose the same thing concerning the Emperor's Rescripts: Which were always placed before the Edicts of the Magistrates. So did Himerius, Rhetorick of Egypt, in his Epistle to the Governor of Alaotia; which Athanasius has related in his Apology. Valef.

When Maximin had issued out this Procept (being necessitated to it, and having not done it of his own accord) for all this he was not look'd upon by all Men to mean unfeigningly, or worthy to be confided in, because formerly (after the like Indulgence) he had demonstrated himself to be of a mutable and perfidious Disposition: None therefore of our Religion durst either (q) meet together in their Ecclesiastick Assemblies, or shew themselves in publick; for the Rescript did not in expresse words allow of this; it only contained an Order that we should be preserved secure from violence and abuses: But it permitted us not either to celebrate our Assemblies, or to build Churches, or to perform any of those Solemnities usual with us: Although Constantine and Licinius, the Patrons of Peace and Piety, (r) had by their Letters acquainted him, that they had both permitted us to do these things, and also had granted the same to all under their Government by their Rescripts and Decrees. But the most impious Tyrant was resolved not to yield thus, till such time as, having been prosecuted by Divine Justice, he was at length forc'd to it, whether he would or no.

(q) By ἐκκλησίαν ἐκκλησίαν, i. e. to meet together in their Assemblies; instead of ἐκκλησίαν ἐκκλησίαν, which word I greatly approve of as explaining the place. Valef.

(r) These words [ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐκκλησίαν] Maximulus and Crispologus render thus; Maximulus, ut ista concederet, scripturam, they had written to Maximin that he should grant it. But I think Eusebius's meaning was otherwise, (to wit,) Constantine and Licinius wrote to Maximin, that they had given free liberty to the Christians to exercise their Religion, to celebrate their Assemblies, and to build Churches, &c. For it seems unlikely and something arrogant, that Constantine and Licinius should command Maximin, their Collegue, to grant these Privileges to the Christian. Valef.

Concerning the Victory obtain'd by the Pious Emperours.

THIS was the reason which (a) did press him on every hand. When he was no longer able (a) Isidorus the Translator did not understand this word of force of mind, but thought it was a word of spirit, even against his Collegues in the Empire, who were far his Superiors in Birth, Education, Desert, Prudence, and (which is the chiefest Accomplishment of all) in Humility and Piety towards the only true God. Through confidence and insolency he arriv'd to such a degree of audaciousness, as to (b) challenge the Precedency, and placed his name first in all Titles and Honours. Then (c) his madness breaking forth into utter deparation, having violated the League which he had made with Licinius, he rais'd a bloody and implacable War. Afterwards in a short time he put all things into confusion, and every City into a strange consternation; and having gather'd together all his Forces, being a very great Army, he march'd forth to fight against Licinius; being extraordinarily puffed up in mind with confidence of the assistance of Demons which he supposed to be Gods, and with his innumerable Army of Men. But when he came to engage in a Battle, he was destitute of a Divine care and protection; and the Victory was by the one only and supreme God given to Licinius. First of all his (d) Foot Forces were routed, in which he did most confide; then his Guards deserted him, revolting to Licinius the Conqueror, and he forthwith, unhappy Wretch, threw off his Royal Robes, (which did not become him,) and timorously, ignobly and unmanfully shrowded himself amongst the crowd [of common Soldiers.] Afterwards he fled; and (being very solicitous about making provision for his own safety) hid himself in the Fields and Villages, hardly escaping the Enemies hands; by which he did truly verifie thofe

(a) By these words [τῶν ἐναντίων ἐν τῇ ψυχῇ ἀναγκά] is meant, to place his name first in all Titles of Law and Decrees. Also, in all Inscriptions on publick Works, Statues and Images, Maximin placed his name before his Collegues, Constantine and Licinius: Although they were Augusti before him. But Maximin challenged the first place, because he was created Cæsar before them. Valef.

(c) Nicetiorus changes these words [ἐν τῇ ψυχῇ ἀναγκά] thus [ἐν τῇ ψυχῇ ἀναγκά] thus [ἐν τῇ ψυχῇ ἀναγκά] extending his Pride to utter madness; which Rendition is not amiss. For Maxima is, in Chrysostome, taken for pride in many places. Valef.

(d) By [ἐπὶ τοὺς ποταμούς] the term here us'd, Eusebius means Maximin's foot forces. Of all Historians only Zosimus mentions any thing of this Battle between Maximin and Licinius in Illyricum; in his second Book: He says, that Licinius at first suffer'd some loss; but afterwards, renewing the fight, he put Maximin to flight, who fled towards the East, thinking to raise a new Army. This Relation does well agree with this of Eusebius here, for he says that Maximin having lost his Army fled into his part of the Empire, that is, into the East. This Battle therefore was fought in Europe; in the year of Christ 312. Constantine and Licinius being the third time Confessors; as Socrates well observes, in his third Book De Occidentali Imperio. firm, unerring, and Divine Oracles, which say; There is no king that can be saved by the multitude. Psal. 33. of 16.

Constant. of an host, neither is any mighty man delivered by his great strength. A horse is counted but a vain thing to save a man, neither shall he deliver any man by his great strength. Behold the eyes of the Lord are upon them that fear him, upon them that put their trust in his mercy; to deliver their souls from death. Thus therefore did the Tyrant return with disgrace into his own Provinces; and first of all in a mad passion he destroyed many Priests and Prophets belonging to those Gods he had formerly admired, (by whose Oracles he had been excited to engage himself in this War) as Cheats, Impostors, and also, Betrayers of his own Safety. Then when he had given thanks and praise to the God of the Christians, and had enacted a full, perfect, and most complete Law for their Liberty, he was forthwith struck with a mortal Distemper, and (without the least delay allow'd him) finish'd his Life. Now this was the Law which he published.

EMPEROR CÆSAR CAIUS VALERIVS MAXIMINVS GERMANICVS, SARMATICVS, PIVS, FELIX, INVICTVS AVGVSTVS. We are confident no man can be ignorant, but that every one does know and is fully satisfied (if he does recollect himself, and reflect upon what is done,) that at all times and by all means we do consult the Utility of the Subjects of our Provinces, and do willingly grant them such things as may prove most advantageous to them in general, all that may be most conducive to their common good and profit, whatever is agreeable to the advantage of the Publick, and is most grateful to the minds of every one of them in particular. At such time therefore as it came to Our knowledge, that (upon occasion of a Law made by Our Parents, their most Sacred [Majesties] Diocletian and Maximian, whereby it was decreed that the Assemblies of the Christians should be utterly abolished, many Extortions and Rapines were committed by the Beneficiarii, and that these Abuses of Our Subjects (whose Peace and Quiet is Our chiefest care) increased exceedingly, their Estates being [upon this pretence] wasted: By Our Letters written the last Year to Our Presidents of every Province, We decreed; That if any one had a desire to follow that Sect, or adhere to the Precepts of that Religion, he might without impediment persist in his Resolution, and not be hindered or prohibited by any man: And that every one should freely do what pleased him best without the least fear or suspicion. But it could not now escape our knowledge that some of Our Judges did (f) misap-

* See the foregoing Chapter. Note 61.

(c) It means his Requisite to Submit to the Practice of the Persecution; which has interested the foregoing Chap. II. S.

Maximin says 'twas written in the year past, or the last year, i. e. in the year of Christ 312. Constantine and Licinius being both then in their second Consulate. Whence it follows, that this last Edit of Maximian was written in the year of Christ 313. Constantine and Licinius being the third time Consuls. Further, there are the principal differences between the Emperor's Rescripts and Edicts. (1.) Their Rescripts had their names annex'd to whom they were sent; the Edicts spoke to all Men in general. (2.) The Edicts were publicly proposed; the Rescripts were given to those to whom they were sent; as may be seen from Gess. Duguet. Cæcilian. p. 28. nor was it usual to publish them, unless this word was expressly added in the end of the Rescripts, proponatur, Let it be published. Lastly, in their Rescripts the name of the Emperor was prefix'd only with some few of his Titles: But in their Edicts, none of their Titles were omitted, but all were carefully and proudly mentioned. Valef.

(f) This word [misinterpretatus] is by Langus rendered male accipisse, misinterpretatus, misinterpreted: Which Version I approve of. For misinterpretatus, in its genuine sense signifies male interpretari. But Mis- culus (and Christoph. in imitation of him) translates it, negligere, to neglect, pro nihilo habere, not to value: Which is not so well. The Fab. and Sauv. MSS. read [misinterpretatus, disregarded] which words seem to have been written in the Margin as a Scholion at first; but afterwards crept into the Text. Valef.

prebend Our Commands, and caused Our Subjects to Consume, and distrust and doubt of Our Decrees, and made them more slow and fearful in their access to those Religious Performances which they approved of as best: Now therefore that all Jealousies, Ambiguities, and Fears may for the future be removed, we have decreed that this Our Edit be published; whereby all men may know, that they who desire to follow this Sect and Religion, are allowed by this Our Gracious Indulgence to apply themselves to that Religion which they have usually followed, in such a manner as is acceptable and pleasing to every one of them. We do also permit them to rebuild their Oratories. Moreover, that this Our Indulgence may appear the larger and more comprehensive, it has pleased us to make this Sanction; That if any Houses or Estates (which formerly belonged to and were in possession of the Christians) are by the Decree of Our Parents devolved to the Right of the Exchequer, or are seized upon by any City, or sold, or (g) bestowed upon any one as a Gratuity: We have decreed that they shall all be restored to the ancient Tenure and Possession of the Christians; that so all men may hereby be sensible of Our Pity and Providence in this concern.

which fell to the Exchequer, to those that hegg'd them. See the Edit, in the Title De petitionibus. Valef.

These are the expressions of the Tyrant, which came from him not a full year after those Edicts he had publish'd against the Christians [engraven on Plates of Brass, and] fix'd up on the Pillars. And now he, who but a little before look'd upon us as Impious, Atheistical Persons, and the very Pest of Mankind, (in so much that we were not permitted to dwell in any City, Country, or even in the Deserts,) this very person [I say] made and published Laws and Decrees in favour of the Christians. And they, who but lately were destroy'd by Fire and Sword, and were devoured and torn by Beasts and Birds in the very presence of this Tyrant; they, who underwent all sorts of Punishments, Tortures and Death, in a most miserable manner, like Atheists and irreligious persons, even these Men are now acknowledged by this very Tyrant to profess Religion, and are permitted to rebuild their Oratories; nay further, the Tyrant himself does acknowledge and attest that they ought to be partakers of some Rights and Privileges. Moreover, when he made this publick acknowledgment, (as if he had hereby obtain'd some favour) for this very reason, his Sufferings were less calamitous than he deserved they should be, [for] being smitten by God with a sudden stroke, he died in the second Engagement [that happened in] that War. But he ended his Life not like those Martial Generals, who (after they had often demeaned themselves gallantly in the Field in defence of their Honour and their Friends) happened courageously to undergo a glorious Death. But he (like an impious person, and a Rebel against his Creator,) whilst his Army flood in the Field drawn up in Battalies, staying at home and hiding himself, suffered a condign Punishment, being smitten by God with a sudden Blow over his Body. For, being tortured with grievous and most acute Pains, he fell upon his Face on the Ground, and was destroyed by want want of Food, all his Flesh being melted away by an invisible Fire sent upon him from Heaven. In so much that, when his Flesh was wholly wasted away, the entire shape and figure of his former Beauty quite disappeared; his parched Bones (which look'd like a Skeleton that had been long dried) being all that was left of him. So that those about him judg'd his Body to be nothing but the Grave of his Soul buried in a Body already dead and wholly purified. And when the violent Heat of his Distemper scorched him with a greater vehemency even to the very Marrow of his Bones, (b) his Eyes leaped out of his Head, and, having deserted their proper station, left him blind. After all this he yet drew his Breath, and having given thanks, and made his Confession to the Lord, he called for Death. At last, acknowledging these his Sufferings due for his Contempt and Presumption against Christ, he gave up the Ghost.

Maximin: The other ran mad. Diocletian was the Emperor that was described; which is attested by Eusebius, and by Constantine. We have also an account of Maximin's blindness, in Epiphanius's piece De Fide. Valef.

Concerning the first Diffraction of the Enemies Religion.

Maximin therefore being thus taken out of the World, (who was the only Enemy of Religion that hitherto I arrived, and declared himself the worst of them all;) the Churches by the Grace of God Almighty were rebuilt and raised from the very Foundation, and the Gospel of Christ, darting forth its Beams of Light to the great glory of the All-ruling Deity, enjoyed greater liberty than it formerly had. But the Wicked, and the Enemies of Religion were clouded with the highest Disgrace and greatest shame imaginable. For first of all Maximin himself was

(a) Through in the common Ecumenical term here is [καταστρέφω] yet we read καταστρέφω. For Eusebius here means, that Maximin was proclaimed a Common Enemy. This was done not only, by the Decree of the Senate, as the Compilers of the Historia Augusta inform us in many places, and especially where they treat of Maximin.
Valef.

proclaimed by the Em-perors a (a) publick Enemy, and was termed in the publick Edicts which were fixed upon Pillars, a most impious, detestable Tyrant, superlatively odious to God. Also the Pictures which were placed in every City in honour of him and his Children, were some of them broke in pieces and thrown down from on high to the very Ground; and others were defaced, having their Visages blackened with dark colours. In like manner all the Statues which had been created in honour of him, were also thrown down, broken in pieces, and exposed as subjects of derision and scorn to all those that would abuse and insult over them. After this the other Enemies of Religion were divested of all their Dignities. Moreover, all Maximin's Parry, more especially those whom he had preferred to places of the greatest power in the Provinces within his Empire (who to flatter him had been insolently abusive towards our Religion) were put to death. One of this number was

(b) Picentius, a person that was a great Favourite of his, highly esteemed by him, and his dearest and Intimate: Whom he created Consul a second and a third time, and also made him (c) Praefect and Rationalis. Another was one (d) Calpurnius (b) him who had born all Offices of Dignity in the Magistracy and in the Government of Provinces; name of d.
he also was famous for his innumerable Malit-terres of the Christians in Egypt. There were a great many more beside these, by whose conde-vours most especially, the barbarous Tyranny of Maximin was maintained and extended. Further, Divine Vengeance required justice to be executed upon (e) Theoctenus, being in no wise forgetful of his Practices against the Christians. For he was look'd upon as a deserving and successful person upon account of his Consecration of the image at Antioch, and besides, the Emperor Maximin conferr'd on him the Presidency of a Province.
But when Licinius came to Antioch, and was resolved to make Inquisition for the Impostors, Certain [amongst others] he tortured the Priests and Prophets of the new-contrived Inigo, enquiring of them how they palliated and put a Mask upon their Imposture; when they could no longer conceal the truth, being by their tortures compelled [to disclose it] they declared, that the imposture of the whole Mystery was composed by the cunning of Theoctenus.
Valef.

(c) He seems to mean the Praefect of the Praetorium. For the term [Πραι-τοριος] is never used but to denote either the Praefect of the Praetorium, or the Praefect of the City. Besides, when Eusebius affirms that Picentius was advanced to great honour, and made Consul twice by Maxi-min, it would be absurd for him to say, that he was made Rationalis by him, that being a place of small honour in respect of the Praefecture of the Praetorium. But, there are these arguments to confute this opinion: (1.) By these words [καὶ τριτὴν ἀλφειαν] Eusebius does always mean the Rationalis, as we have frequently observed before. (2.) Sabi-nus was Praefect of the Praetorium to Maximin (as we noted before) in the last year of Christ, 311, and 312. Neither (3.) is the dignity of the Rationalis Office to be looked upon as mean and low. For even Marius the (that bore) on the Empire in the times of Gallienus bore that Office: And Eusebius himself [Look 8, Chap. 9.] calls it αὐτοῦ καὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ, speaking of Philoromus the Martyr. But that which Eusebius says, to wit, that Picentius was made Consul thrice by Maximin, is very intricate and difficult to be made out. We have observed before, that after Galerius's death, Maximin took upon himself the title of Augustus, in the year of Christ 311. Therefore, before this time, when he was Caesar only, he could not make Picentius Consul.
For the Augusti only had a right of creating the Consuls. Therefore, after Galerius's death, Maximin declared himself and Picentius Consuls in that very year. On the year following Maximin and Picentius bore their second Consul: to the East, when Constantine and Licinius were the second time Consuls in the West. But in Italy and Africa Maxenti-us was the fourth time Consul alone. Then, on the year after, which was the 313 year of Christ, the same Maximin and Picentius were Consuls the third time in the East, as is evidently collected from this famous passage in Eusebius. For 'tis impossible that Maximin should give a third Consulship to another, and not declare himself Consul once.
Indeed, in the Alexandrian Chronicle, Galerius Maximinus is put Consul with Maximianus, being in his eighth Consulship, which is the year of Christ 311. Although in that Chronicle he is called Galerius Maximus. We therefore are the first that have taken notice, that Maximin bore three Consulships. Whence it may be gathered, that Maximin was Augustus about two years, having before been Caesar seven years, and that he had lived till the 313 year of Christ, which we have also demonstrated from his Rescripts. Wherefore I wonder how so notorious a mistake should creep into Eusebius's Chronicle, as to place Maximin's death before Maxentius's: It seems to have been committed by St. Jerome; for he added many things of his own to Eusebius's Chro-nicon. Valef.

(d) He was President of Thebats, as Epiphanius attests in his 68 Heres. which is the Heretic of the Meletians, where he is called [καλαπυρνός, Calpurnius] but it should be Calpurnius, as 'tis evident from this place in Eusebius. Yet Rufinus translates it Quintinus: In Nicephorus 'tis Lucianus; both names are false. For this President was called Calcumus, as (besides Eusebius) the Acts of Phileas the Martyr's Passion do affirm. Valef.

(e) Eusebius speaks of this Theoctenus before, in this ninth Book. Ce-drenus asserts that this Theoctenus perverted Galerius Maximinus to raise a Persecution against the Christians. But he is mistaken, in that he takes Galerius Maximinus for Galerius Maximianus, which is a common error amongst the modern Greek Authors. Valef.

when therefore Licinius had inflicted condign punishment on them all; he gave order that Theoctecus himself should first be executed, and afterwards the rest of his Associates that were conscious to, and Accomplices in the Cheat, having first suffered innumerable Tortures. To all these were added Maximin's Sons, whom he had now made Collegues with himself in the Empire, and Partakers of the Pictures, and Inscriptions dedicated to his Honour. In fine, all the Tyrant's Relations, (who but just before had made their proud boasts, and insolently exercised authority over all Men,) most ignominiously underwent the same Sufferings with those persons forementioned, for they received not instruction, nor did they know, or understand this seasonable Admonition uttered in the Holy Scriptures; O put not your trust in Princes, nor in the Children of men, for there is no health in them. The breath of man shall go forth, and he shall return again to his earth: in that day shall all their thoughts perish. Thus therefore the Impious being like Filth wiped away [from off the Earth,] the Empire, which by right belonged only to Constantine and Licinius, continued firm, and unobnoxious to envy. These persons (after they had first of all cleansed the World from all Impiety) being sensible of those great Benefits they had received from God, did sufficiently demonstrate their Love of Vertue and of the Deity, their Piety and Gratitude towards God, by the Laws they made in favour of the Christians.

CHAP. I.

Constant. and Licinius. Concerning the Peace, which was procured by God for us.

Therefore, Glory be to God, the Almighty and Supream King, for all things: And manifold thanks to the Saviour and Redeemer of our Souls, Jesus Christ, through whom we pray that we may have always preserved to us a firm and inviolable Peace, both from outward Troubles, and also from all internal Molestations of mind. Having (by the assistance of your Prayers) added this Tenth Book of our Ecclesiastick History to those foregoing Books at this place finished, we have dedicated it to He you (most sacred (a) Paulinus!) hereby pub-

(a) He means Paulinus Bishop of Tyre, to whom our Eusebius dedicated his Ecclesiastick History. For by his perswasion he undertook this work, as he does here plainly intimate. Eusebius designedly omitted the dedication of his Books to Paulinus at the beginning of this Work, (which is usually done,) upon account of Paulinus's modesty (if I mistake not;) but was contented to make an honourable mention of him at the end of his History. For he supposed it signified not much, whether he dedicated his Books to him at the beginning, or at the end of them. Eusebius dedicated to the same Paulinus two Books adversus eos quos vocant, concerning the names of places: The former of these which contained the division of the twelve Tribes, the description of the City Jerusalem, and the Hebrew Appellations of extraneous Nations; the latter was above twenty years since put forth in Greek by the Reverend Father Basilius; to which there is prefixed an Epistle to Paulinus. Wherein Eusebius attests, that by Paulinus's perswasion he attempted that Work; and he gives him this title, [ἐπὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ τοῦ Παυλίνου, ὁ Παυλίνου, ὁ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἄξιον ἄνθρωπον.] Paulinus therefore was our Eusebius's regis dominus, Insulator to compile his Books, as Ambrosius heretofore was Origen's. Further, this Paulinus was at first a Presbyter of Antioch. Afterwards, being preferred to the Bishoprick of Tyre, he was much commended for his Presidency over that Church. And at length when Eusebius was deposed of the See at Antioch, he was by the Antiochians preferred to the Government of their Church: So Eusebius informs us, in his Book against Marcellus, Chap. 4. in these Words, ἐπὶ τῇ αὐτῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, &c. Afterwards he inveighs against the Man of God Paulinus, a most blessed Person; who was adorned with the dignity of a Presbyter at Antioch; and was so famous for his Government of the Tyrian Church, that the Antiochians challenged him as their own proper Good. Philostorgius (Book 3. Chap. 15.) says expressly, that Paulinus succeeded Eusebius in the See of Antioch, and that six Months after his Translation he died. Paulinus therefore died in the year of Christ 328, after he had born the Episcopate of Antioch six Months. Wherefore Gostfredus is much mistaken, who (in his Notes on Philostorgius) supposes Paulinus to have died in the year of Christ

324; and blames Philostorgius for being inconsistent to himself. But Philostorgius agrees very well with himself, which Gostfredus does not, in asserting that Paulinus Bishop of Tyre died in the year of Christ 324. undoubtedly Paulinus Bishop of Tyre was present at the Nicene Council, and survived that Synod sometime; as Theodoret informs us, Book 1. Chap. 6. and Sozomen, Book 2. Chap. 18. Baronius indeed says that Paulinus died in the year 324, and that Eusebius succeeded him. But Baronius affirms not, that that Paulinus whom he makes Eusebius's Predecessor, was Bishop of Tyre. Valef.

* an entire and compleat Panegyrick concerning the Re-edification of the Churches: Obeying herein the Holy Spirit, which exhorteth us in these words: O

sing unto the Lord a new song; for, he hath done marvellous things. With his Psal. 98. own right hand, and with his holy arm hath he gotten himself the victory. The Lord hath declared his salvation: his righteousness hath he openly shew'd in the sight of the Heavens. Therefore, since the Scripture enjoyneth us [to begin] a new Song, let us agreeable thereto sing together; because, after such terrible, black, and horrid Spectacles and Relations, we are now vouchsafed to see such happy Days, and to celebrate such Festivals, as many of our Ancestors, who were truly Just and God's Martyr, desired to see upon Earth, but have not seen them; and to hear, but have not heard them. But these persons hastning away with all possible speed, obtain'd far more excellent things, being taken up into Heaven, and into the Paradise of Divine Joy and Delight: And we, confessing these present Enjoyments to be greater than our Deserts, stand amazed at the bounty of the Donor of such Munificence: We also justly admire and adore him with the utmost vigour of our Souls, attesting the truth of his Predications by his Prophets contain'd in the Scriptures, in which 'tis said: O come hither, and behold the works of the Lord, what miracles he hath done upon the earth: He maketh the wars to cease in all the world. He shall break the bow, and knap in sunder the spear, and burn the shields with fire. Let us therefore rejoice at the perfect and effectual completion of these things in our days, and with gladness prosecute the Series of our Narration. After the same manner therefore that we have related, did the whole Race of those Enemies of God vanish, and was suddenly taken away out of Men's sight; so that that Divine Oracle was again completed, which says; * I have seen the wicked exalted, and lifted up like the Cedars of Libanus, I went by, and lo, he was not: I sought his place but it could not be found. Now therefore a bright and glorious day, no cloud overshadowing it, doth enlighten, with Rays of heavenly Light, the Churches of Christ over all the Earth. Neither were there any of those that were strangers to the Community of us Christians, and to our Religion, (b) but (although they did not enjoy them in the same degree that we did, yet at least in some measure) might together with us partake of the Streams and Effluxes of those good things, which had been procured us from God.

(b) This place (which neither Musculus nor Christi- stoporson understood) must be thus mended; συνεπολαύον ἑαυτοὺς ἐν τοῖς ῥήματι τοῦ θεοῦ, &c. But (although they did not enjoy them in the same degree that we did, yet at least in some measure) might together with us partake of the Streams, &c. Vale! In Stephen's Edition the Reading is, συνεπολαύον ἑαυτοὺς τοῖς ῥήματι, &c.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Re-edification of the Churches.

ALL mankind was now free from the Slavery and Oppression of Tyrants; and being released from their former miseries, (although several ways, yet) all acknowledged as well as they could, that it was the only true God, who was the Defender of the Pious. But more especially amongst us (all whose hopes were fixed solely upon God's Christ) there was an inexpressible joy, and a kind of celestial gladness; when we saw all places, which thro' the Irreligion of the Tyrants were a little while ago totally destroy'd, restor'd to life as it were, and recover'd from a tedious and fatal Ruin; and [when we beheld] the Temples erected again from the ground to a vast height, and in splendour far exceeding those which had formerly been destroy'd. Moreover, the Emperors themselves, in whose hands the supreme Power was, by their continual enacting of Laws in favour of the Christians, did enlarge, augment, and confirm the magnificence of the Divine Bounty towards us. There were Rescripts also frequently sent from the Emperor particularly to the Bishops, their Honours were increased, and Sums of Money were bestowed on them. The Contents of which Rescripts (being translated out of Latin into Greek,) it may not be impertinent to record in this Book (as in a sacred Table) at a proper and fit place, that they may be had in continual remembrance by all succeeding Generations.

CHAP. III.

Concerning the Consecrations of Churches every where [solemniz'd.]

AFTER those things, a Spectacle earnestly pray'd for, and much desir'd by us all, appear'd; [to wit,] the Solemnization of the Festivals of Dedication [of Churches] throughout every City, and the Consecrations of the new builded Oratories; the frequent Assemblies of Bishops, the Concourse of Strangers from Countries far remote, the mutual Love and Benevolence of the People; the Union of the Members of Christ's Body joyn'd together in an entire harmony and consent: Therefore, (agreeable to that * Prophetick Prediction, which has mystically fore-signified what is to come,) bone was joyned to bone, and joyned to joyn; and what ever else that Divine Prophecy has enigmatically but truly declar'd. There was one and the same Power of the Holy Ghost which passed through all the Members; one Soul in all: The same alacrity of Faith: One common consent in chanting forth the (a) praises of God. Indeed, the Ceremonies of the Prelates were most entire, the Presbyters Performances of Service exact, the Rites of the Church decent and majestic; (b) on the one hand was a place for the Singers this of Psalms, and for the rest of the Auditors of the Expressions sent from God: On the other was a place for those who performed the divine and mystical Services: There were also [deliver'd] the (c) mystical Symbols of our Saviour's Passion. And now People of all ages, and sexes, Men and Women, with the utmost vigour of their Minds, with joyful Hearts and Souls, by Prayers and Thanksgiving, worshipp'd God the Author of all Good. All the Prelates then present made publick Orations, every one (as well as he was able) endeavouring to set forth the Praises of those assembled.

Constant,

* Ezech. 37.

(a) This place is here (as) taste- nific the praising of God: so also is Saviour's laudare Deum, to praise God.

(b) Re- finus's Version of this place may serve in stead of a Comment; he translates it thus; Jam verò ingens in Sacerdotibus ministeriū, atq; in omnibus quæ ad religionis observantiam pertinet, gratia refulgebat. Assabant hic psallentium chori, juvenes & virgines, senes cum junioribus laudabant nomen domini. Ecce mysticani- nisteria ordinatis & dispositis vicibus agebantur; & ad novæ ac exceeding great Glory and Beauty appear'd in the Performances of the Presbyters, and in the Ecclesiastick Services, and in all things belonging to the Observances of Religion. In one place, the company of those that sang Psalms, Youths and Virgins, old Men and young, praised the name of the Lord. In another, the Mystical Services were performed by set counts orderly appointed. The terms [δὲ ἡ πόλις] therefore denote the People of the Congregation, who sang Psalms in the Church, and hearkned to the sacred Lessons: Which is confirmed by these Words [ἐκείνῃ, δὲ αὐτῇ, ἀκούσαντες, Auditors of the Expressions] which can be understood of the Laicks only. The Words [ἐκείνῃ, δὲ αὐτῇ] point out to us the Presbyters, who performed the Mystical Ceremonies. Vale!

(c) By these [ἐν τῇ βαπτισμῇ τοῦ σώματος, &c.] the mystical Symbols of our Saviour's Passion is meant Baptism; which is a sign of our Saviour's suffering. For, by Baptism we die, and are buried with Christ, and we rise again through the same Christ by Faith. See Coloss. 2. 12. Vale!

CHAP. IV.

A Panegyrick concerning the splendid Posture of our Affairs.

AND a certain person, that had been differently well educated and was deserv- ing, having made this Oration, came forth into the presence of a great many Bishops, (that were then present as at an Ecclesiastick Assembly) who gave him audience quietly and decently; then turning himself towards one who was the eminentest of them all, (a Bishop acceptable to God, by whose care the Church of Tyre, the stately Fabrick amongst all the Churches within the Country of Phœnicia, was gloriously erected,) he spake thus,

A Pane-

You, the Friends and Priests of God, who are wraps in the sacred long Vesture, crowned with the Celestial Diadem of Glory, anointed with the Holy Unction, and clothed in the Sacerdotal Robe of the Holy Spirit: And You, the Grace and Ornament of this new-erected and sacred Temple of God: You, who are adorned by God with a Prudence befitting an hoary Head, but have exhibited many glorious Evidences of a vigorous and juvenile Virtue; You, to whom God, (who comprehendeth the vobis)

days, in the times of old. But now, having not barely by Hearing and Reports only, perceived the exalted Arm, and celestial Right Hand of our All-Good and Supreme God and King; but in reality and (as we may say) with these very Eyes [seen the Truth and Verity of those things which were heretofore recorded; we may sing a second Triumphant Hymn, and break forth into these express words, saying,

Like as we have heard, so have we seen, in the city of the Lord of hosts ; in the city of our God. But in what City, in this new built and framed by God? * Which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth.

Concerning which another Divine Oracle speaketh thus: † Very excellent things are spoken of thee, thou city of God. In which Church, since

God the Giver of all Good, by the Grace of His only begotten Son hath convened us, let every one here assembled cry out with a loud voice as it were, and

Jewels cry out with a loud voice as it were, and say, *I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the house of the Lord. And again,

† Lord, I have loved the beauty of thine house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth. And not only every particular person. but let us altogether

not only every particular person, but we altogether rejoyce and shout forth Praises with one Spirit, and one Mind, saying, * Great is the Lord, and highly to be praised, in the city of our God, even upon his holy hill. For he is truly great, and his doth marvellous things. Great is He who doth magnificent things, and such as are past finding out, glorious and stupendous, of which there is no number. Great is He who altereth Times and Seasons; who dotheth and constituteth Kings: Who raiseth up the Poor from the Earth, and exalteth the Beggar from the Dung-hil: He hath thrust down the Mighty from their Seats, and hath exalted the Humble from the Earth. He hath filled the Hungry with good things, and hath broken in pieces the Arms of the Proud. Not only amongst the Faithful, but amongst the Infidels also He hath confirmed the Authority of those Relations heretofore recorded of him of old.

¶ Tis He who worketh Miracles: 'Tis He that doth great things: 'Tis He who is Lord of all: He, who is the Framers of the wbole World: He, who is Almighty: All-Good: He, that is the One and Only God. In obedience to whom let us sing a new Song; to Him, who only doth wonderful things; for his Mercy endureth for ever. Who smote great Kings and slew mighty Kings; for his Mercy endureth for ever. For the Lord remembered us when we were in a low Condition, and hath re- deemed us from our Enemies. And let us never cease thus to praise God the Father of all. Also Him, who is the (c) second Author of all Good to us ; who is our Master in instructing us in the Knowledge of God, the Teacher of true Piety, the Destroyer of the Wicked, the Slayer of Tyrants, the Reformer of our Lives ; Jesus our Saviour, whom we were in despair, Him let us extol, having his Name always in our Mouth. For He alone, who is the Only and Best Son of the Best and Greatest Father, in compliance with His Father's Love to Mankind, most willingly clothed himself with our Nature who were buried in Corruption ; and like a careful Physician (d) who for the Health's sake of his Patients looks into the Wounds, lightly strooketh the Sores, and from other Men's Calamities attracts Grievances upon himself ; ) be himself hurt by himself saved us ( who were not only diseased and oppressed with foul Ulcers and Wounds already putrified ; but also lay amongst the Dead ) from every Faw of Death. For there was no other in Heaven that had so much power, as inoffensively to administer Health to so many ; it was He only therefore who, after he had touched our burdensome Corruptions ; He alone, who after he had endured our Labours ; He alone, who after he had taken upon himself the Punishment of our Impieties ; raised us Eulēbios!) concerning the Son of God, who is co-equal in dominion co-eternal, and con-Creator of all things [with the Father.] Thou fellest him the second Author of all good, when as he is the same Author and Framer of all things with the Father, and of the same Substance with him. Also in the Mar. MS. we met with this Scholion here, in a latter hand, wherein Eulēbios is also reproved, in regard he subjects the Son to the Father, and attributes to him the second place, Τῷ αὐτῷ ἀποδοῦναι καὶ κατὰ τὴν αὐτὴν τάξιν τὰς κεφαλὰς· Τὸν δὲν καὶ ἀντιμετρεῖν καὶ ἰσχυρῶς ἔχειν τοὺς ποταμοὺς τῆς ἐκκλησίας καὶ τῆς πόλεως· καὶ διὰ τὴν ἀλλοτρίαν τὴν μετὰ τὸν ἀντιμετρεῖν· ἀναίτια ὀνειδίσαν καὶ ἑρπετοὺς καὶ ὀφιδίους καὶ μετὰ τὴν ἰσχυρὰν ἀποδοῦναι ἀπολαύειν· οὐ τὸν αὐτὸν ὁρᾷς, ἐκ μὴ ἀποδοῦναι λαοδοξίας τὴν τοῦ αὐτοῦ οὐκ ἐστὶν λατρεῖν αὐτῷ, that is, Why dost thou utter this Divinity (O Man!) to thine own destruction? detracting from and [subjecting him, who in Glory, Power, and Effluence is every way like the Father,] and attributing to him the second place from the Father? Thy Sentiments and Writings do herein contradict those Holy Fathers, who determined the Son to be co-equal with the Father? To whose Opinion thou didst [subscribe, unless they who wrote their All? do declare a palpable untruth. Vale!]

(d) In the Greek, the following Lines (the Translation whereof is contained within this Parenthesis) seem to be Iambicks taken out of some Tragedian. The Words are these;

Τῆς οὖν χαρισμένης εἶπεν συντελείας·
Ὁρᾷ τὰ θειοτάτην Σιγάρην δ' ἀνέβλεψεν·
Ἀλλοερίας τί συμφορῆσιν ἰδίαις which Verſes are undoubtedly very elegant, and ſmell ſomething of Æſchylus, or Sophocles. But I think they ought rather to be blotted out of this place, for they diſturb the ſence. Valeſ.

Constant. and Licinius. (when we were not only half dead, but lay altogether impure and sinking in the Graves and Sepulchres) and both in times past, and now through his earnest compassion towards us (even beyond our hopes and expectations) preferweth us, and imparteth to us an Exuberancy of his Father's good things. 'Tis he who is the Author of Life, and the Introducer of Light; our Great Physician, King, Lord, and the Anointed of God. (c) But even then, when all Mankind (by the Wiles of detestable Devils, and the Operations of Spirits hated by God) lay buried in an obscure Night, and thick Darkness, he (f) only by his appearance, with the Rays of his Light dissolved the manifold Chains of our Sins, like melting Wax. And now, when by reason of his so great Love and Beneficence [towards us] the envious Devil, Enemy to all that is good, and the Favourer of evil, was in a manner hurst [with grief], and marsh'd all his fatal Forces against us; and when at first bawling (like a mad Dog, who with his teeth gnaws the stones that were thrown at him, spending the fury he was put into against those that provoked him, upon the lifeless things thrown at him,) turning his beastly Rage upon the Stones of the Oratories, and upon the senseless Piles of the Building, he thought with himself, that he had procur'd the utter Desolation of the Churches; also, when afterwards he sent forth terrible Hissings, and his Serpentine Expressions, one while by the Menaces of impious Tyrants, at another time by the blasphemous Decrees of prophane Presidents, and moreover belched forth the Virulency of his Deaths, and with his venomous and deadly Poisons, poison'd those Souls that were captivated by him, and had in a manner destroy'd them by the pernicious Sacrifices of dead Idols; when lastly he had incited against us all those that under the shape of Men mask'd their savage Cruelty, Persons of a Disposition every way barbarous and fierce: Then again, the Angel of the Great Council, that (g) Chief Commander of God's Hosts (after a sufficient Exercise in the Combat, which the most valiant Champions of his Kingdom exhibited, by undergoing the severest Hardships with patience and fortitude,) appearing on a sudden, so utterly destroy'd and reduc'd to nothing, all his Enemies and Adversaries, that they seem as if they had never been named. But his Friends and Dependents be exalted to the highest pitch of Glory, not only amongst all Men, but amongst the Celestial Powers also, the Sun, the Moon, the Stars, the whole Heaven, and the World. So that now (which thing never happen'd before) the supremest Emperors, sensible of that Honour they have received from God, spit in the Faces of the dead Idols, trample under-foot the prophane Rites and Services of Devils, and deride that ancient Error handed down to them by Tradition from their Ancestors: They acknowledge one only God, the common Benefactor to all Men, and to them in particular; and they profess Christ the Son of God to be the supremest Ruler of all things, they proclaim him Saviour in their Inscriptions upon Pillars, engraving in

Royal Characters, his valiant Exploits and Victories Constant. and Licinius. (in order to their indelible remembrance) over the Impious, in the very midst of that City which is Queen of the whole Earth. So that our Saviour Jesus Christ is the only person amongst all those who have been since the World began, that is confessed to be (even by the Emperors themselves, who are Supream here upon Earth,) not an ordinary King, made such by Men, but is worshipped as being the genuine Son of the Supream God, and is [adored] as being (h) truly and in himself God; and that deservedly. For what King had ever such power, as that he could fill the Tongues and Ears of all Men upon Earth (i) with his Name? What King ever constituted such pious and prudent Laws, and was able to confirm them in such a manner, that they should be perpetually read in the audience of all Men from the one end of the whole Earth to the opposite Extremities thereof? What King hath ever by his mild and indulgent Laws, melted and softned the savage and barbarous Dispositions of the inhumane Heathens? What King, oppos'd by all Men during the space of so many whole Ages, ever demonstrated such a more than human Valour and Strength, that he flourish'd daily, and seem'd to grow young in every succeeding Age? Who hath planted a Nation (which heretofore was not so much as heard of) up in some secret unknown Corner of the Earth only, but even throughout the whole World [which lies] under the Sun? Who ever armed his Soldiers with the Arms of Godliness in such a manner, that in their Conflicts with their Adversaries they made it apparent that their Minds were firmer than an Adamant? What King was ever so potent as to lead an Army after his Death, and to erect Trophies against his Enemies, and to fill every Place, Country, and City, Grecian and Barbarian, with his Royal Palaces, and with the (k) consecrated Fabricks of holy Temples, such as are those splendid Ornaments and consecrated Gifts belonging to this very Church: Which are in themselves truly August and Magnificent, and admiration, in regard they are (l) evident Representations of our Saviour's Kingdom. * For he now spake and they were made; he commanded, and they stood fast: For what could withstand the Beck and Will of the Word, who is the supremest King and Governour of all things, and is himself God? But an accurate Contemplation and Explication of these things

(h) We ought to take special notice of this place; for it is the first wherein Eusebius calls Christ αυτοθεός. This one place I think sufficient to confute all their malicious Calumnies, who believe that our Author Eusebius was infected with Arianism. This word [αυτοθεός] is made in imitation of Plato's Word αυτοφασκός, which signifies that which in itself is truly good: So αυτοθεός is he who is truly originally and is himself God. Valef.

(i) By these Words [τις αὐτὸς αὐτοφασκός] may be meant the Christians, who are called τις αὐτὸς αὐτοφασκός after his own name: Which name of Christians was spread over all Nations, and known not amongst the Romans only, but also amongst the Barbarians. But if any would have these Words [τις αὐτὸς αὐτοφασκός] signifye Christ's own name; I will not much condescend to stir a little after our Author speaks of the Christians: Which certainly he would not have done, had he spoken of them before. Valef.

(k) Ἀγίασμα, the term here, does not signifie the Consecration of Churches, as Μυστήριον translates it, but rather the Ben- rance, things offered and consecrated to God, and thus the following Words [κατασκευαί, ὀνόματα, ὀνόματα] declare. Certainly if Eusebius had here meant Consecration, he would have us'd ἀγίασμα and not ἀγίασμα in this place; as he does in the third Chapter of this tenth Book. Valef.

(l) In the King's MS. at the side of this line I found this mark [ε] [et] which is an abbreviation of the Word [εlegant]. i. e. polite, elegant. In ancient MSS. 'tis usually found plac'd at the more elegant places. Valef.

MS. and MSS. αὐτός αὐτός signifies solusmodus, only, or alone; which Phrase is frequent in Eusebius, and thus he is here to be understood: That Christ only, by his appearance and incarnation in times past, delivered Men, who were enslaved by the Devil, from that grievous yoke of servitude. Valef.

(g) Τὸ μετὰ τὸν πόλεμον is post bellum, after the war, whereof, if we read word for word, it is this; Easy the hater of that which is good, and the Devil the lover of mischief. But by the following words in the period, he seems to speak of the Devil only: Upon which account we render it The envious Devil, &c. agreeable to Valefius's Version.

For Water hath broke out in the desert, and a valley in a thirsty land. The parched ground shall be changed into moorish places, and the fountain of water into a thirfty land. All this was formerly predicted in words, and laid up in the sacred Books; but the things themselves are now no longer delivered to us by bear-say, but [are exhibited] by actual per-

and excellent Zorobabel (by the acuteness of his Understanding) perceived that, according as the Divine Word had foretold, She which had been brought to desolation for God's sake, should enjoy these good things, after that bitter Captivity, and Abomination of Desolation: He depicted not this dead Corps, but having in the first place with Supplications and prayers (together with the joint consent of you all) propitiated the Father, and taking for his Assistant, and Fellow-labourer the only Reviver of the Dead, he raised up this fallen Church, having first purified her, and healed her of her Maladies. And now he hath put a Robe about her, not that old one, but such a one as he had again received instructions about, from the Divine Oracles, which expressly testify thus: * And the latter glory * See of this house shall far excel the former. which account, having taken in a far larger compass of Ground, be fortified the outward Circuit with a Wall on every side, which might serve for a strong fence to the whole Structure. Then he raised a spacious, lofty, and stately Portico against the Rays of the rising Sun, which, to those who stand at a sufficient distance without the sacred Inclosure, does yield a full prospect of this Structure within; and as it were, attracts the Eyes of Infidels to look upon the first Entrances, that so no Person might pass by, who should not feel some Pricks in his Mind, both at the remembrance of the former Desolation, and also at [the sight of] the stupendious Miracle of the present Fabrick. Hence he hoped, that he (†) who upon that account felt such a Compunction, might peradventure be drawn [towards it,] and at the time that the very sight thereof would be persuaded to enter in.

But after you are come within the Gates, he has not permitted you to enter immediately into the Holy place with impure and unwashen Feet. But, having leaving left a large vacancy betwixt the Temple concerning the Portico, he beautified this vacant space the Time: (†) having inclosed it in the figure of a Quadrangle with four opposite Cloysters [supported on whereas every side with Pillars. Rails made like Net-work, which were so continuously and artificially framed and carved, that they entertained those that viewed them with a wonderful and surprising sight. Neither was the very Parment neglected by him; but after he had beautified it most gloriously with Marble-stone, he proceeded to the Out-buildings of the Temple; and with great Art and Skill erected most spacious * Exedrae and Oeci on each side, which in an * See note uniform manner were joyned together at the sides (y.)

of the Cathedral, and united to the (γ) Doors which lead into the middle of the Church. These Buildings our most peaceful King Solomon (who erected the Temple of God) made for them, who want the Purification, and the Sprinkling by Water and the Holy Ghost. So that that Prophecy before quoted is no longer a wordy Prediction, but is really accomplished: For now it is come to pass, that the glory of this latter house is truly greater than the former. For it was requisite and agreeable that (since her Pastor and Lord, for her sake once suffered death, and after his Passion changed that vile Body, which for her sake he had put on, into Brightness and Glory; and translated that very corruptible Flesh from Corruption to Immortality,) she also should likewise enjoy the (α) Dispensations of her Saviour. For, although she (having received from him a promise of far more excellent things than she doth at present enjoy,) ineffectually

(3) We observed before (see Book I. Chap. 1. Note B.) that ἀναστροφή (the term that occurs here) signifies not only Christ's Incarnation; but that, whatever our Saviour did in the Flesh, in order to the procuring Man's Salvation, is in general termed ἀναστροφή. See the authorities there quoted. This place also evidently demonstrates the sense, where Εὐθείας terms not only the Death, but the Resurrection also of Christ, ἀναστροφάς, dispensations, in the plural number. Vale!

wherein his said ¶ The trees of the Lord shall rejoice, even the Cedars of Libanus which he hath planted. To what end should I make an exact Narration here, of the most ingenious and artificial Composure of the whole Structure, and of the incomparable Beauty of every particular part of it, when as the testimony of the Eyes excludes all knowledge which entreth at the Ears? Moreover, after he had thus finished the Temple, and decently adorned it with the biggest Thrower in honour of the Prelates of Churches, and also with (x) Benches orderly placed all over the Church, at last he placed beside the Holy of Holies, the Altar, in the midst, and before that the Multitude might not come within these [sacred places,] he enclosed them with wooden fence difficulty to resolve, (that is,) for what degree or order of Men they were intended. Leo Allatius in his second Epist. De Templi Græcor. supposes these Benches were made for the common use of the Laity. The same says Clement, in his Constit. Apost. lib. 2.
cap. 47. But Eusebius means another thing. For afterwards, when he explains the whole Fabrick of this Church Allegorically, he says that by the Thrones, the Bishops and Presbyters were meant: But by the Benches, the Deacons, and others that served in the Church. Wherefore these Benches were rather designed for those who served in the Church, than for the Laicks. Indeed the Laity were not permitted to sit in the Church. So says Optatus in his fourth Book, which Words of his we must so understand, that in a Congregation in the Church, during the time of Divine Service, the Laicks were not permitted to sit down; but when the Service was ended, they had liberty to sit. So also says Albanus, in his Epist. Ad Solitari. Valde.

( b ) Eusebius here calls the soul of Man, psia et aeterna, ( i. e. a self-intelligent Substance, because it is eternal and of itself it under-standeth. So the philosophers call Spiritual Substance, res divinae, such as we call intelligences, Intelligences. But Christophorus being grossly mistaken takes psia et aeterna in this place to be the flame with vessels it, and accordingly renders it, San-ctissime Solis aeterna intelligentia, cognita, a Substance which is known, he is comprehended, by the angels.

(5) Euphrasia here calls the soul of Man, anima eutropeus, (i.e.) a self-intelligent Substance, because naturally and of itself it understands. So the Philosophers call Spiritual Substances, res intellectuales, as we call Intelligent Beings, entia intellectiva. Chytrion (i.e.) phorion being good milk-suck, takes rosa (i.e.) in this case, to be the flame with passiflora, and accordingly renders it, Staphania Sola membris intelligentia cognita, a Substance which can only be comprehended, by the understanding of the mind. But there is a Chytrion (i.e.) phorion, (i.e.) intelligibile, that may be comprehended, or understood, and rosae (i.e.) intellektus, which does understand, or comprehend. For example's sake, Chimera, and all such Fictions of the understanding are res intelligibiles, but not res intellectuales, as Chytrion is in its 71. Epistle. Both entia and res doth very well distinguish between these words. Vale!

(c) By missiles ignis, fulgebis means missile, darts smeared with wild-fire, and iron fire-balls as are flung from the Walls upon Enemies; here it imitates that place of Saint Paul, where he makes the Devil to be armed with fiery darts, with which he fights against Men. See Eph. 6. 16. Vale!

(4) Νυμφεὶς is here very well rendered by Christoph. Exor-nator sponsæ, the Dresser of the Bride. Musculus renders it not omis Paranympheus, (i. e.) one who is to take care of all things that ap-pertain to the Bride. Valef.

Having long since perceived, that a Liberty of Religion ought not to be denied, but that License should be permitted to every one's Will and Arbitrement, of being careful about their Religious Performances according to their own Mind and Judgment, We have Decreed, That as well all other Persons, as those that are Christians should retain the Faith [ and Observances ] of their own Sect and Religion. But because in that Rescript wherein this Liberty was granted them,

(a) many and different sorts of Sets seemed to be expressly set down, for which reason peradventure some of them not long after desisted from such an Obedience. Wherefore when We Constantine, and Licinius, Augusti, came fortunately to Mediolanum, and had in debate all matters which might conduce to the Good and Utility of the Publick; amongst other things, which to us seemed several ways profitable to all in general, (or rather which we judg'd ought to be decreed before any thing else) we supposed such Constitutions were to be made, as therein should be contained the Worship and Veneration of the Deity: That is, that we should allow a free Choice both to Christians and all others, of following what way of Worship they please: That so by this means that Godhead and Heavenly Being, whatever it is, might be propitious to us, and to all that live under our Government. We have there-

Bayanus* understands Christoph, his Words at the year of Child 213. Langus and Musculus translate [αίρεσις] Opinions & heresies, Heretics & Opinions; farther than Christoph. For αίρεσις cannot signify the sense, or [συνεσις] meaning of a place: But it signifies an Opinion or Self. When the Emperor Constantine therefore had in that former Edith permitted this Liberty of Conscience to all, he added, that that privilege was not granted to the Christians only, but to all Men of every Self, that is to Jews, Samaritans, Martiniticks, &c. and to all Sects of Religions. This the Christians take to be no small injury to their Religion, that it should be reckon'd amongst Schimticks, and unbelieving Jews. Grassine being adverse to Christians by the Catholics, corrected in this latter Edith, that Chmck, which mentioned all Sects, being taken out: And this is that which is meant by these Words a little further, [οι αμαρτανος ανθρωπων οτις αμαρτανος ανθρωπων οτις ανθρωπων ανθρωπων ανθρωπων] (i.e. that all those Sects which were in our former Refugee should be quite left out. Vilep.

cond Edit to explain his Mind, for fear, lest the Heathens should murmur at the prohibiting of abolishing the Worship of their Gods. Wherefore Constantine says, that he granted free liberty to every one to worship what Gods and follow what Sect and Religion he pleased. This second Decree therefore forbade no selfe but an explication of the first. For in the first Edit there were some Words with which the Gentiles and also the Schismaticall Christians were not a little offended; in that they saw themselves called Hereticks. The Catholick Christians also repented it, because they were tyed in the same Decree with the Gentiles and Hereticks. Wherefore Constantine, that he might shew himselfe kind to all, decreed that those words might be razed out. And this is the sense of those former words, ἡ ἀποστολικὴ καὶ ἀποκαταστατικὴ ἐκκλησία. That the names of these Sects in our former Rescript might be wholly taken out, &c. Vale.

But if those, who have purchased, or had the Grants of these Places, have a desire to demand any thing of our Goodness, let them make their Address to the Governour that presides as Judge in that Province, that by his Bounty provision may be made for them : All which places it shall becom you to see forthwith restored to the Society of Christians by your Care and Diligence without the least delay. And in as much as the said Christians are known to have had possession not only of those Places wherein they usually assembled themselves, but of others also, which did not particularly and our Mandate may with all speed be fulfilled; and also that in this Matter provision may be made by our Goodness for the common Quiet and Tranqui-the Divine Care and Goodness towards us; which we have already experienced in many Affairs, will continue firm and lasting for ever. Moreof this our Law, and of our gracious Indulgence may come to all Men's knowledge, 'tis expedient that this Rescript of ours be propoed to publick view, and made known to all persons, that so no body may be ignorant of the Establishment of this our Gracious Indulgence.

A Copy of another Imperial Edict which the Emperors published again, to declare, that this their Beneficence was granted only to the Catholick Church.

God save You, dearest Anulinus! This is the manner of our Goodness; We desire, that those things which appertain to another's Right should not only not be infected with Inquietude, but should also be restored, Dearest Anulinus! Wherefore our Pleasure is, that, as soon as you receive this our Rescript, if any of those [Ecclesiastes] (which did belong to the Catholic Church of the Christians, in all our Cities, or in other places,) are now detained by the (e) Decurions, or by any other Persons, you cause them (e) Instead of ~, ~

A Copy of the Emperor [Constantine's] Rescript, by which he summoneth a Synod of Bishops at Rome, for the Uniting and Reconciling of the Churches.

Constantinus Augustus, to Militades Bishop of Rome,

Constant. and Licinius. Rome, and to (f) Mark. In regard several such (g) Libels as these have been sent me from the most Eminent Anulinus, Proconsul of Africa, wherein 'tis declared that Cecilianus Bishop of the City of (f) Carthage is accused of many things by some of his Collegues ordain'd [Bishops] throughout Africa: And this matter seeming not a little grievous to us, the Lear-th in those very Provinces (which the Providence need, who of God delivered to our Sacredness by a (i) voluntary Synvender, and where there is a great multitude of People) the Populace being in a manner divided, time here should be found to degenerate and become worse, and Differences should be nourished even amongst Bishops: It seem'd good to us, that Cecilianus himself (together with ten Bishops his supposed Rome, Ba-Accusers, and ten other Bishops, whom he shall romus, at judge necessary in behalf of his Cause,) fail to the year of Christ 313, Ch. 213, thinks the Text commanded to hasten to Rome) he may be heard of Eusebius in such manner as, you know, is most agreeable with the most Sacred Law. Moreover, that you may have a most compleat and perfect Knowledge of all these things, we have subjoin'd to this our Rescript, Copies of the Libels which were sent to us by Anulinus, and have transmitted them to your aforeaid Collegues. Which Libels when your Gravity shall have read, you shall deliberate how the aforeaid Controversie may with the greatest accuracy be examined, and determined according to Equity. For it is not unknown to your Assiduity that we bear so great a Reverence to the most Legitimate Catholick Church, that we would have you leave no Schism or Diffentiation at all in any part of it. The Divinity of the Supream God preserve you (k) (Dearest) many years.

Moreover, Titles of honour are common Words, but this here is an affected and unusual term. Wherefore, rejecting this conjecture of Baronius's, I think this Mark was a Presbyter of the Church of Rome, whom Constantine had a desire should be present at this Synod with Militiades. This also I think was that Mark who was Bishp of Rome after Situffer. This Epistle of Constantine to Militiades was extant in the third Conference at Carthage; Chap. 319. But the latter part of this third Conference, which in my Opinion is the most useful, is lost. Valer.

(g) By αὐτῶν are meant two Libels, which contained the faults of Cecilianus Bishop of Carthage, which being subscribed by the Factionist Majorinus, they gave them to Anulinus the Proconsul at Carthage on the 17th of the Calends of May. Constantine the Emperor being the third time, and Licinius the third time Consul. These Libels Constantine calls αἰμαίνες, because they contained in them many Papers, and many publick Ads, to prove the faults of Cecilianus. Chrysostom calls these αἰμαίνες, Epistles, but that is an ill term: For there was but one Epistle sent by Anulinus to Constantine the Emperor, but there were several αἰμαίνες, or Papers. Constantine also a little further calls them Libelli: So does Augustine also, in his 48 Epistle to Vincentius, call it Libellus: And Augustin thus supercribeth; The Libel of the Catholick Church, containing the faults of Cecilianus, put in by the faction of Majorinus. Valer.

(h) In our Text it is, αὐτῶν; in Nicephorus, αὐτῶν; in the May, and Med. MSS. 'tis written αὐτῶν by a transposition of the αἰμαίνες, which the Greeks usually do in turning Latin proper names into Greek. Valer.

(i) Instead of αὐτῶν we should undoubtedly read αὐτῶν in this place, ἡ τῶν ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις αὐτῶν in ἡ τῶν ἐκκλησίαις, ἐκκλησίαις (i. e.) those Countries which Divine Providence gave into our Hands by a voluntary surrender. For when the head of Maxentius was sent into Africa, all Africa at the fight of the Tyrant's head, yielded to Constantine. And also before the overthrow of Maxentius, some African Cities yielded themselves voluntarily to Constantine, when he sent some Sea-forces thither. Valer.

(k) Instead of αὐτῶν the reading in Nicephorus is αὐτῶν, αὐτῶν in the plural number. For since the Rescript was written to Militiades Bishop of Rome, and to Mark, and since he always speaks to them in the plural number; 'tis reasonable that in the close of the Rescript it should be αὐτῶν. Further, the Acts of this Synod at Rome are extant in Optatus, B. I. The Author of the Synodicon (whom we have often quoted) says this Synod was convened by Militiades and Mark at Rome; he joins Mark to Militiades, as soon as he perceived from this Rescript that Constantine mentioned them jointly. Valer.

Constant. and Licinius. A Copy of an Imperial Rescript, by which [Constantine] summons a second Synod, to put an end to all Diffentiation amongst the Bishops.

Constantinus Augustus, &c. Chrestus Bishop of Syracuse. When as heretofore some began wickedly and perversely to separate from the Holy Religion, the Celestial Power, and the Catholick Opinion; We, desirous that such pertinacious Contentions as these should be pared off, took such Order that (some Bishops being sent out of France, and also those summoned out of Africa, who being of contrary Factions, pertinaciously and continually quarrelled amongst themselves, the Bishop of Rome being also present,) this [Diffentiation] which seemed to offend after a most careful examination, might in their presence be compos'd. But in regard (at it commonly happens) some persons, forgetful both of their own Salvation, and of the Veneration due to the most holy Religion, cease not as yet to impute their private Grudges and Animosities, being unwilling to acquiesce in the Sentence already pass'd, but positively asserting, that they were but a few [Bishops] who gave their Sentiments and Opinions; and that (before they had carefully enquired into all things which ought to have been first inspect'd) they proceeded with too much haste and precipitancy to pass a definitive Sentence. From all this it happens that even they, whose duty it is to preserve a brotherly and unanimous unity of Mind, unworthily, or rather impiously, create Schisms, in the amongst one another; and also give an occasion of Scorn and Derision to those Men, whose Souls are alienated from the most holy Religion. Wherefore it was our chiefest care, that these [Divisions] (which ought, after Sentence already given to have been terminated by a voluntary assent) might now at last be concluded in the presence of many Bishops. Since therefore we have summoned many Bishops out of divers and immemorable places, to assemble themselves on the Calends of August, at the City Orleans: We thought good to write to you also, that having received a publick Chariot from the most Eminent Latronianus (I) Corretor of Sicily, and taking into your company two (m) of the second Order, whom you shall think fit to choose, and also bringing along with you three Servants which may minister to you in your Journey, you meet on the very day appointed at the place aforeaid, that both your Gravity, and also by the unanimous and concordant Prudence and Peripatetic of the rest there assembled, this our doubt Diffentiation (which has shamefully been continued hitherto by certain detestable Quarrellings, after all things have been heard which shall be said by the now disagreeing Parties, whom we have summon'd to appear also,) may now at last be refer'd to a tranquil and congruous [Obediency of] Religion and Faith, and to a Brotherly Union. God Almighty preserve you in health many years.

Latronianus in an old Inscription at Panormus, which is attested by Prothierus in Tabulis Siculis, number 164 D. N. F. L. VALERIO LICINIO AUG. DOMITIVS LATRONIANVS V.C. CORR. P.S. DEVOTVS N.M. QUE EJUS. Gualtherus also in his Annotations upon this Inscription, quoteth and correcteth this place of Eusebius. Valer.

(m) By these words [ἑν ἐν ἑκάστῳ ἑκαστῷ] Eusebius meaneth the Presbyters, who were commonly called Sacerdotes secundarii ordinis, (Priests of the second Order) which may be collected out of several good Authors, as Optatus Milevitanus, and Jacobus Sermonius in his Notes upon Sidorius, pag. 78. Hieronymus, in his Epitaph on the blessed Paula, says, There were present the Bishops of Hierusalem and other Cities, and an innumerable company of Priests [inferioris gradus] of the lower Order, &c. So also says Gregor. Nazianzen, in Carm. Jamis et vita Jud, pag. 6. Hence comes this distinction; the Bishops in both Church, sat in more lofty Thrones, the Presbyters sitting on both hands.

hands on lower seats; and the Deacons standing by in white garments, [with the same Greg. Naz. in his Dream of Eusebia Anastasia, pag. 78. Eusebius also, in his Description of the Church of Tyre, alloteth the Thrones which were in the Church next the Altar, to the Bishop and Presbyters, but the Benches to the Deacons, where also he calls the Presbyters, τὰς ἐξ ἡ ἐκκλησίας ὑποδιαιρούσας, i. e. those which have the second places next the Bishop. (a) Concerning the Estates belonging to the Christians.

Constant. and Licinius. (a) This Title [ἐπεὶ τὸν αὐτοῦ ἀποστολῆς] Concerning the Estates of the Christians is here put in a wrong place: for the Epistle which follows, says not a word concerning the Estates of the Christians. This Title might better have been prefixed before Chap. 5. where we have two several Decrees of Constantine's concerning the Estates of the Christians. Therefore very well do the old Mag. and Fuk. MSS. make no distinction of a Chapter in this place. Valef.]

A Copy of the Emperor's Rescript, by which he granteth Money to the Churches.

Constantinus Augustus, to Cecilianus Bishop of Carthage. For as much as it was our pleasure that through all the Provinces of Africa, Numidia, and both Mauritania's, some thing should be allow'd for necessary expences to some Ministers of the most Holy and Legitimate Catholic Religion, who [See B. 9. were expressly named, We wrote to the * most Perfect Chap. 9. Ursus Rationallist of Africa, and have intimated Note (1.) to him that he take care to pay to your Gravity three thousand (b) Solles. Therefore when you shall have received the sum aforesaid, command that it be distributed to all the forementioned Ministers, according to a Breve directed to you from Hosius. But if you shall perceive there will be any thing wanting towards the fulfilling of our desire to all in this point, without making any scruples or delays you shall demand of Heracles the Steward of our Estates whatsoever you shall judge requisite. For we ordered him when he was with us, that if your Gravity demanded any money of him, he should without the least hesitancy take care it should be told out to you. And because we have been informed that some men who are of an unsettled mind, make it their business to pervert the Members of the most Holy Catholic Church by a certain impious and clancular Fallshood and Corruption; We would have you understand, that We gave such orders to Anulinus our Proconsul, and also Patricius (c) Deputy of the Praefects, when present, that amongst all other things they take an effectual and sufficient care about this business, more especially, and that if any such thing be done, they should by no means suffer it to be neglected. If therefore you shall see any such men persisting in this madness, without any further doubtings you shall let us make your Address to the foresaid Judges; and when on disclose the matter to them, that they may correct them according to our Orders to them when present. The Deity of the supreme God preserve you many years.

(b) ἐξόδοι. Epiphanius mentions these Solles, at the close of his Book De Mensur. & Ponderib. He speaks of two sorts of them: the first he calls the small Talent, consisting of 208 Denarii. The value of the other, he says, is δύο μνῆται, δύο μινύτα, two minuter or mites. See the Learned Petrus's Diavris concerning the Solles, at the end of his Notes on Epiph. pag. 431. Gr. Edit. Paris, 1622.

(c) Concerning the Praefects. Proconsul. (c) Deputy of the Praefects, when present, that amongst all other things they take an effectual and sufficient care about this business, more especially, and that if any such thing be done, they should by no means suffer it to be neglected. If therefore you shall see any such men persisting in this madness, without any further doubtings you shall let us make your Address to the foresaid Judges; and when on disclose the matter to them, that they may correct them according to our Orders to them when present. The Deity of the supreme God preserve you many years.

where we shewed that there was a difference between sitting for a Praefect, and sitting for the Praefects. He may be said to sit for a Praefect, when the Praefect of a City, or the Praefect of Pratorian orders to supply his place in any special business. But he may be said to sit for the Praefects, who exercises a Deputy's power or ordine Coadiutorum. See the place now cited in those Notes. The title given to these Praefects at this time was: Perfessimus, (see Book 9. Chap. 9. Note (f)) not Clarissimus, or Spe. dabile. This we are informed of from Constantine the Emperor's Rescript to Probianus Proconsul of Africa, which Augustine relates in his 68th Epistle; and in his 34 Book against Cresconius, cap. 70. Valef.]

(a) Concerning the Immunity of the Clergy.

Constant. and Licinius. (a) In the most ancient Mag. and Fuk. MSS. this is called the Sixth Chapter; which is true, if I mistake not. See the foregoing Chap. Note (a.) Valef.]

A Copy of the Emperor's Rescript by which he commandeth, that the Prelates of Churches be freed from bearing all Civil Offices.

We greet you most Honoured Anulinus. Since it is apparent from several Circumstances, that the contempt of that true Religion, by which is preserved the highest Veneration of the Celestial Majesty, has brought imminent Dangers upon the Affairs of the Publick; but when it was lawfully and rightly admitted and preserved, it conserved the greatest Prosperity upon the * Roman Empire, and * to an eminent Felicity on all Human Affairs; (the Divine Beneficence being the Donor thereof:) it mini seemed good to Us, ((b) Dearest Anulinus,) that those Men, who with a due sanctity and an assiduous observance of this Law give themselves wholly to the the Ministrations and Services of this sacred Religion, should receive the Rewards of their Labours. Fuk. and Wherefore Our Pleasure is that those Men within the Province committed to your care, who in the Catholic Church, over which Cecilianus presides, do service to this sacred Religion, commonly called by the name of Clergymen, be always preserved exempt from all manner of Civil Offices; left by any error or sacrilegious Misfortune, they should be drawn away from the Service due to the Deity: but [our and our Will is] that they should rather serve their own dearest Law without any least inquietude. For when they perform the highest [acts of] worship to God, the greatest advantage seems to accrue to the publick Affairs. Farewel, most Honoured and Dearest Anulinus.
[In answer to this Rescript of Constantine's in Augustine's 68 Epistle. But Eusebius inserts this Rescript in a reproachful kind of order. For Constantine's Letter to Cecilianus the Bishop, and his Rescript to Anulinus, ought in order to precede Constantine's Letter to Maximianus Bishop of Rome. For all those Letters have a relation to the Roman Synod which was summoned upon the account of Cecilianus, when Constantine and Licinius were both the third time Consul, in the year of Christ 413. Valef.]

C H A P. VIII.

Concerning Licinius's Exorbitancies which afterwards ensued, and concerning his Death.

Such [gifts] therefore did the Divine and Celestial Grace of our Saviour's presence bestow upon us: and such an exuberance of prosperous successes was procur'd by all men, by reason of the peace [restored] to us. This was the posture of our affairs, we spent the time in joy and publick festivities. But this spectacle was intollerable to the malice of the Devil, that hater of all goodnes, and industrious Patron of mischief. Nor were the calamitous misfortunes which beset the forementioned Tyrants sufficient to inflame a sober consideration into Licinius, who being honour'd with a prosperous and successful Government, and with the second place of dignity, that next to Constantine the Great, and innobled with an affinity contracted by marriage, and with a near relation to a most august family, relinquish'd the imitation of good men; and became a zealous emulator of the improbity and wickedness of impious Tyrants. And he made choice of following their Counsels whose calamitous end himself had beheld with his own eyes, rather than to continue in the friendship and affection of the best of Princes. For being stimulated with envy against his great Benefactor, he raised a most impious and nefarious war against him, in no wise revering the Laws of nature, forgetful of all oaths, affinity and leagues. For Constantine, like a most courteous Emperor, that he might shew him the most convincing tokens of his sincere kindness, envied him not his own affinity, nor did he deny him the illustrious marriage of his Sister: but vouch-

(a) Here we follow that emendation of this place which is set at the Margin of Turnebus's MS. who instead of [eulogias, affinity] in this place read, [subversis, nobilitas]. For Constantine was extracted from a Royal descent; he derived his Pedigree from Claudius the Emperor. Valef.

Kinsman and Colleague in the Empire; nor had he given him a less portion of the Roman Provinces to rule over and govern, [than he reserved to himself.] But on the other hand, [Licinius] acted quite contrary hereto, daily inventing all kinds of stratagems against him that was his Better, devising all ways how to inflame him, that with mischiefs he might reward his Benefactor. At first therefore attempting to conceal his treacheries, he counterfeited a friendship, and having several times assailed [Constantine] by guile and deceit, he hoped to have easily obtained what he expected. But God was [Constantine's] Friend, Guardian, and Protector: he brought to light and detected the intrigues which were clancularly and secretly contrived against him. So powerful a strength is that great Armour of Godliness [endow'd with], that it is both prevalent to repulse the enemy, and has also a power sufficient for its own preservation. With this Armour our most pious Emperor being fortified, escaped the many intricate snares of that accursed man. Licinius therefore, perceiving that his secret plots did not succeed according to his expectation, (because God discovered all his deceit and treachery to his beloved Emperor,) and knowing that he could lie no longer conceal'd, raiseth open war. But in that he determined to war against Constantine, he likewise resolv'd to marchal an army against Almighty God, whom he knew Constantine worshipped. Afterwards he begun secretly and by little and little to attack those pious men who lived under his Government, who never intended the least molestation to his Dominions. And this he did [in regard] he was miserably induced thereto, being blinded by his innate malice. Therefore he did not set before his eyes the examples of those who had been Persecutors of the Christians before him; nor yet of those whose destroyer and punisher he himself had been appointed, because of the height of those impieties, to which they were arrived: but, declining from the way of sober and right reason, or rather running perfectly mad, he resolv'd upon engaging with God himself (because he was Constantine's assistant,) instead of [Constantine] who was afflicted by him. And first of all he banish'd all Christians out of his family, leaving himself destitute (miserable wretch!) of their prayers to God for him; it being their commonly received Doctrine, that prayer should be made for all men. He afterwards gave command that all the Officers in the

(b) Civil Milice should be disbanded, and turn'd out of their military preferments, except they were willing to sacrifice to Devils. But these are but small things, if compared with his great Villanies, which ensued. To what end should we recount all and every particular fact, which this man, hated of God, committed? How he, who was the greatest law-breaker, invented impious laws? for he made an order, that no one should charitably relieve the poor distressed Prisoners with meat, nor show the least compassion to those, who through hunger pined away in their fetters: that is, that there should no good man live, and that they who were led by the dictates of ] nature itself to have compassion on their neighbours, should be incapable of doing them any good. And this was clearly the most impudent and cruel of all laws, by far surpassing all that mildness and clemency implanted by nature: to which Law also there was a penalty annex'd, that they who shew'd compassion upon the

(c) criminals should suffer the like afflictions with those towards whom they shew'd mercy: and that such as charitably misnifit to those in bonds and confined to prison, should suffer the same punishment with them. Such were Licinius's Ordinances. What need we reckon up his innovations concerning marriages, or his new laws about (c) dying persons; whereby (c) This he presumptuously abrogated the ancient, good, and wisely established Roman Laws, and instead of them introduced certain barbarous and inhumane Ordinances, truly unjust and illegal? He also invented several sorts of Taxes, to the great oppression of the Subjects of his Provinces; and all sorts of exactions of Gold and Silver; (e) surveying of lands; and that cursed way of getting lucre from Coun-

admit of this Version. What Law this of Licinius's was, 'tis difficult to resolve. It seems to have belonged to the Testaments of dying people: it was abrogated by Constantine after Licinius was overcome by him. Valef. (d) Eusebius uses this term [ἐξουσίαι] which occurs here, at book 8, chap. 14. (see note (c.) there) where he treats concerning Maximinus the Eastern Tyrant. But in his first book De vita Constantini he terms it ἐκείνη, (i. e.) ways of getting money. The ancient Greeks us'd ἀγογὴ and ἀποστροφή, in this sense. There is extant a Book of Xenophon's, entitled ἀποστροφή. The modern Latin Authors call these Taxes, Tituli. Valef.

(e) The phrase here us'd (viz.) ἀναμετρήσεις τὰ γῆς, is very well rendered by Lausius, iterata agrorum mensiones, the re-measuring of Lands. This Version Reusius confirms, who renders it ensius innovent, to re-new the Census, or the pricing of every man's estate. This Census could not be renewed without the re-measuring of Land: For the Census amongst the Romans consisted of two things, (i. e.) the measuring of Lands, and the numbering of the People, as I have elsewhere said. We have the testimony of Aurel. Vittor, and of Vitor's Epitome in confirmation of what Eusebius says concerning Licinius's Avarice. But what Eusebius says concerning Licinius's Exactions, and Oppression of his Subjects, is confirmed by the testimony of two ancient Authors, (viz.) Aurel. Vittor and Libanius. Vittor says of Licinius that he was, Agri-ribus plane ac radiceis natus, quia ab eo genere ortus altissimus erat, facti milis, i. e. To the common sort of People and Rusticks, because he was ex-tracted from and maintained by that sort of men. He was useful enough. Libanius in his Oration pro Tempis Gentilium, says, ἐπὶ αὐτοῦ οὐδὲν ἔσθ' ἵνα μὴ αὐτὸς αὐτοῖς, that the Cities flourish'd under him, (viz.) Licinius. Valef.

crey-men which were not alive, but long since dead. Besides these things, why should we reckon upon the (f) Proscriptions of innocent men upon which he, the Enemy of mankind, was the inventor of? and the imprisonments of men (g) nobly defended, and of an honourable repute? Whole youthful wives he forced from them by violence, and delivered them to some of his impure slaves, that they might be most injuriously vitiated? What need we number the married Women, Virgins, and Maids, whom in his (h) decrepitude he abused, to the fulfilling of his own soul's insatiable lust? What need is there [I say] of enlarging upon these things, whenas the exorbitant grossness of his last actions evinceth his first to be trivial and almost nothing? In fine, he arrived to such an height of madness, that [he made an attempt] upon the Bishops: and looking upon them (in regard they were the servants of Almighty God) to be enemies to his practices; but [daring not] as yet to use open violence, fearing his superior, he privily and craftily plotted against them: and by the treacheries of his Presidents destroy'd the eminentest of them. The manner how he murder'd them is strange, and such as was never before heard of. But his actions at Amasia and the rest of the Cities of Pontus do far exceed the most superlative cruelty. Where some of Gods Churches were again thrown down from their vast height to the very ground, and others were shut up, lest any of those that did usually frequent them should meet there, and render a due worship to God. For he did not suppose that prayers were offer'd up for him, being perswaded to entertain such thoughts as these by a consciousness of his own impieties. But he was of opinion that all we did was in behalf of the pious Emperor, and to render God favourable to him. Upon which account he resolv'd to assail us with his utmost rage. Therefore, those Presidents that were his flatterers, being fully perswaded that this would be grateful to the Tyrant, [inflicted] the same punishment upon some Bishops that they usually impos'd upon Malefactors. So that harmless and innocent men were hal'd away, and without the least pretext punish'd like murderers. But others of them underwent a new kind of death, having their bodies cut with a sword (as Butchers do meat) into a great many pieces; and after this barbarous and most horrid spectacle, they were thrown into the depths of the Sea to be made food for the fishes. After this therefore, the worshippers of God took themselves to flight, and the fields, the deserts, the woods and mountains were the receptacles of Christ's servants. When the impious Tyrant had succeeded thus prosperously in these his attempts, he afterwards entertained some thoughts of raising a general persecution against all the Christians. And he had undoubtedly been master of his desire, nor could there have been any obstacle to hinder him from effecting of it, had not God, the Protector of his own servants, (that he might prevent what would immediately have ensued,) caused Constantine his servant suddenly to appear as a Saviour and a great Light to all that were in a thick darkness and an obscure night, conducting him with a mighty arm into these parts.

Concerning Constantine's Victory, and concerning the prosperity procured by him to all those that live under the power of the Romans.

(a) ON this man therefore did [God] from (a) At above bestow Trophies of Victory o- words we ver the ungodly, as being the worthy fruits of began the his piety. But the impious Tyrant, together with Chap. his all his Counsellors and friends, he laid prostrate on their faces before the feet of Constantine. For when * he was arriv'd at the highest degree of madness, the pious † Emperor supposing he was not to be longer born with, (b) entering into a prudent and sober consideration with himself, and having tempered the severity of Justice with [his own natural] clemency, resolves upon succouring of those that were oppress'd by the Tyrant; and prepares to save a great part of mankind, by cutting off and removing out of the way a few pestilent and destructive persons. For having before this made use of clemency only, and shewing pity on him who deserved no compassion; he did not profit him at all; for he desist'd not from [the practice of his pristine] impieties, but rather increased his fury against the Subjects of his own Provinces. There was no hope of deliverance now remaining to those that were oppress'd and afflicted by this cruel Beast. Wherefore [Constantine] the Protector of all good men (having temper'd his hatred of impiety with his love of virtue) together with his son Crispus, a most mild and courteous * Cæsar, * Or Prince † the term in the Greek is Βασιλεύς marches forward upon this expedition, reaching out a helping hand to all that were in distress. Both the Father therefore and the Son, having for their Captain and Assistant the suprem King, and the Son of God the Saviour of all men, divided the Army fo, as on every side to encompass God's Enemies, and got an easie victory; all things in that action having been rendred facil, and successfully expedited for them by God, according to their wish. Immediately therefore, even in the twinkling of an eye, they who yesterday and the day before breathed forth death and menaces, became wholly extinct, the remembrance even of their very names not in the least surviving them. Their pictures also and other monuments [dedicated to their honour] received the deserved [spots of] ignominy; and the same [disgrace] which Licinius had with his own eyes beheld the impious Tyrants heretofore involv'd in, even he himself in like manner suffer'd. For he himself receiv'd not instruction, nor was he amended by his neighbour's stripes: but walking on in the same path of wickedness with them, deserv'dly wandered into the same precipice they did. Thus this word χορεία. For the Christians used to dance on their Festivals of the Martyrs, which they kept in honour of them; and thus they celebrated their Conflicts and Victories as Greg. Naz. relates (in Carminibus ad mulieres sepe curiosius exornantes, pag. 152.) Basilius Orig. (in his 14th Homily against drunkennes) has a sharp invective against these Choreas, or Dances. Men therefore were now ſecure from all fear of them who formerly had oppreſſed them, and celebrated ſplendid and ſolemn days of Feſtivity. All things ſeemed to abound with fulneſs of light, and they who heretofore beheld each other with dejectedneſs and ſorrow then look'd upon each fied God the the King of Kings, (for thus they were instructed to do) and in the next place the pious Emperor, together with his Children which were beloved of God. There was an oblivion of past afflictions, no remembrance of any impiety, but only an enjoyment of the present good things and expectations of more in future. In all places the Edicts of the Victorious Emperor, full of kindness and clemency, and his Laws containing manifest tokens of his great bounty and true piety, were proclaimed. All Tyranny therefore being thus extirpated, the Empire which did by right belong to Constantine and his Sons, was preserved firm and secure from envy. Who (after they had clean-

VALESIUS's PREFACE,

To the Studios READERS.

AFTER Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea, (whom we may deservedly stile The Father of Ecclesiastick History;) many inflamed with a pious Emulation, undertook to treat of the same Subject. But Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret are in the Judgment of all Antiquity far more famous than all the other Writers: Who beginning from those Times wherein Eusebius concluded his Ecclesiastick History, brought their Work down to the Times of Theodosius Junior. And at first I was resolv'd to have publish'd these three Writers together, that as they had prosecuted one and the same Subject in their Writings, so they might have also been comprehended and read in one and the same Volume. But in regard this would hereby have been too large a Volume, therefore I was forced to defer the Edition of Theodoret to another time. To which I will add Eusebius Epiphaniensis's Ecclesiastick History, as also the Excerptions of Philostorgius and Theodorus Lector; that the Studios may in future read over the whole Body of Ecclesiastick History, publish'd and explain'd by our Labour. In the interim you have here (Reader) join'd together in this Volume Socrates and Sozomen. Concerning what I have done about the Edition of these Authors, take this Account in short.

Above eight years since, when by the Command and Advice of the most Illustrious Prelates belonging to the Gallican Clergy, I publish'd the History of Eusebius Cæsariensis, I made it my business to perform three things most especially in that Edition. For first, having from all places procur'd those Manuscript-Copies that were most remarkable and eminent, I amended and differenc'd those passages which in the former Editions had been corrupted and disguised. Secondly, in regard the former Translators had, either by reason of their want of Manuscript-Copies, or on some other account, err'd in many places, that their Versions might not induce the Readers into Mistakes, I my self have elaborated a new Translation, with which the Studios will, I hope, be in future content. Lastly, I have added Annotations, that I might therein both give an account of mine Amendments, and also explain and illustrate all the more obscure and difficult places. And this Edition, being candidly received by all, is now in the hands of the Learned. Therefore, what I then (by the Divine Assistance) perform'd in the History of Eusebius Cæsariensis, the same I have attempted now to do in the History of Socrates and Sozomen, by the Command and Advice of the same Prelates I mention'd. For (that I may in the first place speak concerning Socrates, who first betook himself to write) I have amended his History by the help and assistance of three Manuscript-Copies, to wit, the Sfortian, the Florentine, and the Allatian. The Sfortian-Manuscript (which is the best and ancientest,) is at this time kept in the Vatican Library. This Copy the Learned Lucas Holstenius had some time since (in favour to the most Illustrious Carolus Monchallus, Arch-Bishop of Toulouse) compared with the Geneva Edition; and had transmitted the various Readings (together with the Emendations of Philostorgius transcribed from the Scoriacensian MS.) to the same Prelate, at such time as the Gallican Clergy had committed to him the Care of setting forth a new Edition of the Ancient Ecclesiastick History; so the said Holstenius informs us, in his Epistle to Peter Possinus, a Divine of the Order of the Jesuites. But afterwards, when by the Entreaty of the same Arch-Bishop of Toulouse (who understood, that by reason of his too much other business, he could not be at leisure to take care of this Edition) the Gallican Clergy had injoynd me that Province; the same Holstenius sent me the various Readings of the fore-mention'd Sfortian-Manuscript, written out with his own hand at the Margin of the Geneva Edition, together with those Amendments of Philostorgius; and had sent me more, had a longer Life been granted him. For a little before his Death he sent me some Dissertations concerning certain Passages in the Nicene and Chalcedon Councils, and concerning Synefius's Episcopate. Which Dissertations shall (God willing) be publish'd by us in the Third Tome of our Ecclesiastick History, that the learned part of the World may be no longer defrauded of that most Accomplish'd Person's Labours. The Florentine-Manuscript follows, transcribed above five hundred years since, which is now kept at Florence, in St. Lawrence's Library. The Discovery and Use of this Manuscript I owe to Emericus Bigotius, a most skilful searcher into old Libraries: By whose diligence it is contriv'd, that we sitting still and idle here, enjoy the Riches and Treasures of many and most remote Libraries. For at his entreaty, Michael Erminius, a Senator of Florence, compared that Copy with the Geneva Edition, and transmitted the various Readings thereof to me; upon which account I do profess my self much obliged to both of them. The third Manuscript belongs to Leo Allatius, a Person every way learned, and one that has deserved well of Ecclesiastick Antiquity. This Copy contains the Ecclesiastick History of Theodorus Lector, compris'd in Two Books; which Theodorus Lector had gather'd out of three Writers of Ecclesiastick Affairs, to wit, Socrates, So- zomen, and Theodoret, after the same manner that Cassiodorus Senator has compos'd his Tripartite History. But this Tripartite History of Theodorus Lector comprehends only the Affairs transacted in the Church during the Reign of Constantine and Constantius: Whether the reason be, that Theodorus Lector continued his Collection no further, or, that the other Books of that Work are lost by the negligence of Antiquity. Out of this Copy therefore Leo Allatius had some time since collected the various Readings in the two former Books of Socrates, and transmitted them, being written out with his own hand, to the most Illustrious Prelate Carolus Monballus: Which I afterwards procured by the assistance of the most Eminent Dionysius Talemus, Advocate General to the Most Christian King in the Supreme Court at Paris. Besides these three Manuscript Copies, I made use of the King's Manuscript, (which is no very ancient one,) which Robert Stephens made use of only in his Edition. Upon which account it is left to be wondered at, that the common Editions of Socrates have hitherto been so faulty, seeing they were all derived from one only Copy, which also is a very modern one. Moreover, this Copy was taken out of the King's Library, and courteously lent me by the most Illustrious and Reverend Prelate Nicholas Colbertus, Bishop of Lusson, a Person endow'd with eminent Learning, Virtue, and Dignity. Concerning whose Praise I would speak more in this place, did not his singular Modesty hinder me, who am a very desirous thereof. And these are the Assistances of the Manuscript Copies, by the supports whereof I attempted this Edition of Socrates.

But in the Correcting of Sozomen's History I had the benefit of fewer Manuscript Copies. For besides that Copy in the King's Library, which Robert Stephens followed in his Edition, and besides that Copy belonging to Leo Allatius (whereof we made mention before,) which was an assistance to us only in the four first books of Sozomen, and in the beginning of the Fifth; I had only the Fuketian Manuscript. This Copy did at first belong to Carolus Monballus Arch-Bishop of Tolouse, a person very studious of Ecclesiastick History. But afterwards it was put into the Fuketian Library, and lent to me by the most worthy Nicolaus Fuketius. Upon which account in my Annotations I have called this the Fuketian Manuscript. But at length, when our Edition was completed, this Copy (together with the other Manuscripts belonging to the Fuketian Library) was transferr'd into the Right and Possession of the most Illustrious and Eminent Person, on account both of his own and his Father's deserts. Carolus Mauricius Tellerius, Abbot of Saint Benignus, who at this time is Coadjutor to the Arch-Bishoprick of Rheimes. Indeed this is no very ancient Manuscript, but 'tis of the best note, and is transcribed from a most correct Copy. The Titles of the Chapters, which in the King's Manuscript, and in Robert Stephens's Edition, are prefix'd before the History of Sozomen, are wanting in this Copy. Nor is there any distinction of the Chapters throughout all the Books. From whence may be discerned the Excellency and Antiquity of that Manuscript. For the Titles or Contents of the Chapters were made by Nicephorus Callistus, or rather by some other more modern Author, and are wholly impertinent, and barbarously express'd. In so much that after I had look'd thereon with a greater accuracy, they seem'd to have been compos'd by some other hand, rather than by Nicephorus. Moreover, that I may not defraud any person of his due praise, I acknowledge my self indebted to Samuel Tenuilius (a very learned person, and one that is a great lover of me, at present an eminent Professor of Literature at Nimwegen) for the various Readings in the History of Sozomen and Theodoret, collected out of the fore-mentioned Allatian Manuscript; that is, out of the Tripartite History of Theodorus Lector. For whilst he was at Rome, he transcribed them with his own hand from Leo Allatius's Copy, a person never praised enough; who by my entreaty, and for my sake, had delivered those various Readings to the said Tenuilius, that he might write them out. By the help of these Copies therefore I have amended innumerable places both in Socrates and also in Sozomen, which were very corrupt before; I have supplied many Defects, restored many Punctuations and Distinctions, and, lastly, I have added a new Version. Concerning which I will now speak briefly.

What I have heretofore said concerning Musculus's and Christophorson's Translation in my Preface to the Illustrious Prelates of the Gallican Church, which is prefix'd before the Edition of our Eusebius, I need not now repeat. I will only add this: If after those Translators now named, the History of Eusebius Casariensis wanted a new Interpreter, a new Version of Socrates and Sozomen was much more necessary. For their Histories have come to our hands far more faulty than Eusebius's. And that the Judicious Reader will easily discern from Robert Stephens's Edition. For Robert Stephens, in his Edition of Eusebius, had the use of many Manuscript Copies, which were taken out of the King's Library: But in his Impression of Socrates's and Sozomen's History, he had but one Copy of each of them. Therefore at the end of his Edition, he remark'd the various Readings in the books of Eusebius, taken out (as he says) of most ancient Copies. But at the close of Socrates's and Sozomen's History he put no various Readings, because he had gotten but one Copy of each of those Writers. Also, the Copies of Eusebius, which Stephens made use of, were the best and antientest, as he himself attests. But each Copy, as well that of Socrates's as the other of Sozomen's History, which Robert Stephens followed in his Edition, was, as we perceive, very new; and did also abound with many faults. 'Tis therefore no wonder, that Learned Men have been so often mistaken in their Versions of Socrates's and Sozomen's Books, since they had such faulty and maimed Copies before them, and were deprived of the assistance of Manuscripts. For

VALESIUS'S PREFACE.

Musculus had seen Robert Stephens's Edition only. Christopherson had indeed inspected some MS. Copies of Eusebius and Theodoret. But he had no MSS. of Socrates and Sozomen, as I have frequently observed in my Annotations. He had only seen the various Readings and Conjectures of Learned Men set at the Margin of Robert Stephens's Edition: Of which fort many Copies came to our hands. But those Readings were almost of no weight or authority at all, in as much they had no Remark annex'd of the ancient Copy out of which they were transcribed. But I, having got the best and ancientest Manuscripts, as well of Socrates, as Sozomen, and with great labour and industry compared them with the common Editions; afterwards took an easier and plainer way to their Translation. This Edition of ours therefore will (we hope) equally satisfy all persons, as well those that are skilled in the Greek Tongue, as them that are not. For, both those that are knowing in the Greek Language will read Socrates and Sozomen amended and thoroughly purged by our Labour; and such as are less skilled in the Greek will easier understand those Authors done into Latin by us.

Our Annotations follow; wherein, in the same manner as in our Notes on Eusebius, we have attempted to perform two things. The first is, to give an account of our Emendations, and to propose to the Reader's Judgment the various Readings taken out of the Manuscript Copies. Then, secondly, to illustrate (according to our ability) the more obscure and difficult places, which seem'd to be able to involve the Reader's Judgment in Doubts. Nor am I ignorant, that there are many delicate and fastidious Persons, who may think that they have exhibited to them some exquisite Observations only, and Common Places (as they are called,) compos'd for shew and ostentation; and who may suppose that that part of our Annotations, which contains Emendations and various Readings, is altogether trivial and despicable. To which persons I would make this return: Altho those Emendations and various Readings (which the Greeks term διωλεσπίας) may frequently be insipid, and seem troublesome to the Readers, yet they are highly useful, and altogether necessary, especially in these Writers, whose Books have come to our hands less correct. Now that Socrates's and Sozomen's Books are such, we have before mention'd. And indeed our Observations do bear a greater shew of Learning: But an Emendation in my opinion requires more of Wisdom and Judiciousness. Neither is it for every Man to give his opinion concerning the true and genuine Reading of antique Writers: But he only is able to do this, who is furnished with a manifold stock of Learning, and has been long and much exercis'd in this Art of Judging.

And these are the Particulars I thought necessary to advertize the Readers of in the beginning of this Work, that they might know at first sight what they were chiefly to expect in this Edition of ours, which could not be met with in the former Editions of this History. It remains now, that we speak something concerning Socrates and Sozomen: who and what manner of Persons they were, what course of Life they followed, what Religion they profess'd, and which of them first wrote his History.

SOCRATES and SOZOMEN.

OUR Socrates therefore, for we will begin with him, had Constantinople for his Country. In the Fifth Book of his History, Chap. 24. he attests that he was born and educated in that City, and that he therefore recorded those Matters chiefly which hapned in that City. When very young he was instructed in the Rules of Grammar, by Helladius and Ammonius, Grammarians, who at that time had left Alexandria, and betook themselves to Constantinople. He that is desirous to know the reason why these Grammarians departed from Alexandria, will find it related by Socrates, in the Fifth Book and Sixteenth Chapter of his History. For when the Heathen Temples were demolish'd at Alexandria, by the Care and Industry of Theophilus Bishop of that City, Helladius and Ammonius, Grammarians (the one of whom was Jupiter's Priest, and the other Simius's at Alexandria,) displeased at the Ignominy their Gods were expos'd to, having left the City Alexandria, went to Constantinople, and there took up their habitation. Moreover, the Heathen-Temples at Alexandria were destroy'd when Timasius and Promotus were Consuls, (according to Marcellinus's Relation in his Chronicon,) which was the Emperor Theodosius's Eleventh year. Whence it is apparent, that our Socrates was born about the beginning of Theodosius's Reign. For Boys were usually sent to be instructed by Grammarians when they were about Ten years old. After this Socrates studied Rhetorick under the Tuition of Troilus the Sophista, who about that time was an eminent Professor of Eloquence at Constantinople. Our Socrates does not indeed say thus much in exprefs words. But the attentive and diligent Reader will easily collect from his words that which I have affirmed. For he does make such frequent, and so honourable a mention of him, that he may seem to pay reward to his Master. For he names his Country, Sida, a City of Pamphylia. He also mentions not a few of his Scholars, to wit, Eusebius Scholasticus, and Sikmann, and Ablabius who were Bishops. Lastly, in his Seventh Book he relates, that Anthemius the Præfect of the Prætorium (who, whilst Theodosius Junior was yet a Minor, was the Chief Minister of State in the Empire) did chiefly make use of the Counsels of Troilus the Sophista. Where he also gives him this Elogue: "Ὁς μὲν τῶν ἑσῶν αὐτοῦ Φιλοσοφίας (for that must be the Reading, as we have intimated in our *Notes) οὐκ ἔστιν ἴσους ἀντιβένιῳ, ὅστις ἦν ὁ ἀντιβένιος τῷ Ἀνδρείῳ ἐπαμύχανῳ;" that is, who besides the Philosophy that was in him, was Antbenius's Equal in Political Knowledge. By these Reasons I have been induc'd to think that our Socrates had Troilus for his Rhetorick-Master. But concerning this matter we permit every one to determine according to his own Arbitrement. Further, you must know that the Ancients were not so speedy and hasty in [their learning the Rules of] Eloquence, as is now a-days usual, but they applied their minds to those Studies for a long time together. Gregory Nazianzen attests (in his Poem concerning his own Life) that he left Athens in the thirtieth year of his Age, as soon as he had learned the Precepts of the Art of Oratory in that City. After this, Socrates having left Troilus's School, betook himself to the Forum, and pleaded Causes at Constantinople. Whence he got the Surname of Scholasticus. For so the Advocates were at that time called, as it has long since been remarked by others: * Not because they were reduced into Schools; but in regard, being Young Men that had left the Schools of the Rhetoricians, they profess'd this Art. But at length, having left off his Practice in the Law, he applied his mind to Writing of his Ecclesiastick History. In which Work he has made use of a singular Judiciousness and Diligence. His Judiciousness is manifested by his Remarks and Sentiments interwoven every where throughout his Books: than which there is (in my opinion) nothing more excellent. But his diligence is declared by many other Instances, chiefly by this, in regard he frequently annexes a Note of the times, that is, the Consulates and Olympiades, especially where he mentions such Matters as are more momentous. Nor has he carelessly or negligently written his History, as Rufinus Aquileiensis did, who seems to me to have composed his two Books of Ecclesiastick History (which he annex'd to Eusebius's) without looking into any Records. Our Socrates did far otherwise, for having from all places got together the best Monuments, that is, the Epistles of Prelates, the Acts of Synods, and the Books of Ecclesiastick Writers, agreeable to their authority he composed his History. And whereas in the first Edition of his Work, having therein followed Rufinus, he had placed the Synod of Tyre, and the Banishment of Atanasius into the Gallia's, in the Reign of Constantius Augustus, upon reading of Atanasius's Books afterwards, he perceived his error. Wherefore he was necessitated to set forth a new Edition of his History, wherein he both mended the Mistake I have mention'd, and also made an addition of some other things, which were wanting in the former Edition, as he himself attests at the beginning of his Second Book. Whence it appears how highly we ought to value Socrates's History, to which the Writer himself put his last * Hand. In the Composure of his History Socrates has made use of a plain and mean Stile; which was done by him on set purpose, that he might the easier be understood by all persons, as himself attests at the beginning of his First and Third Book. For he look'd upon that sublime and eloquent manner of expression to be more agreeable for Panegyrick Orations, than an History of Ecclesiastick Affairs. Moreover, he has dedicated his History to one Theodorus, whom in the beginning of his Second Book he styles a Sacred Man of God, which is the same Appellation our Eusebius gives to Paulinus Bishop of Tyre, at the beginning of his Tenth Book. But who this Theodorus was, it is to me unknown. For I cannot believe it was Theodorus Bishop of Mopsuestia, in regard Socrates wrote his History after the Death of Theodorus Mopsuestenus. But it is now time for us to inquire concerning his Sect and Religion, as we promised at the beginning.

Baronius in his Annals, and Philippus Labbens in his Book De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis, do affirm, that our Socrates was by Sect a † Novatian. The same was Nicephorus's Opinion before it was theirs, who in the Proeme to his Ecclesiastical History says thus: Ὁ τῶν ἀρεσκοντικῶν, ὁ ψῶδ' ὁ γὰρ τῶν ἀρεσκοντικῶν ἔγραψε τὴν ἱστορίαν. That is, *That Socrates, surnam'd * Catbarus, but as to his Mind he was not pure*. Which words are not to be understood, as if Socrates were surnam'd Catbarus, but that it might be shewn he was a Novatian. For the Novatians termed themselves Catbari, as we are informed from the Eighth Canon of the Nicene Council. The same Nicephorus (in his Eleventh Book, Chap. 14.) writes thus concerning Socrates: Socrates (who in this place plainly shews himself not to be a detester of the Novatian Principles) relates that these things were told him by a certain old Man, &c. Now, why our Socrates was by many accounted a Novatian, the reasons are not few, nor trivial. For first, he carefully records the Series of the Novatian Bishops, who presided over the Church at Constantinople from the Times of Constantine; and also remarks the Consulates wherein every one of them departed out of this Life. Secondly, he highly extols them all, especially Agerius, Sisinnius, Chrysanthus, and Paulus. By whose Prayers, as he relates, a certain Miracle was wrought at Constantinople. Lastly, he prosecutes all Matters belonging to the Novatian Sect with so great a care and diligence, that he may seem to have been addicted to this Sect. But should any one examine these Particulars with a greater accuracy, he will find nothing in them, that may evince our Socrates to have been a Novatian. For with the like diligence he enumerates the Arian Bishops, who govern'd their Church at Constantinople; and yet it is not said he was an Arian. With no less carefulness also has he related all things that happened to the Arians, Eunomians, and Macedonians at Constantinople, than he has recorded what befel the Novatians. The reason hereof he himself has given, in Chap. 24. of his Fifth Book. Where he says, it was his design to record those things most especially which hapned at Constantinople; both because he himself lived in that City, wherein he had been born and educated; and also in regard the Affairs transacted there were more eminent, and worthy to be recorded. But should any one object, that the Arian Bishops are not extolled by Socrates at the same rate that the Novatian Bishops are: the Answer hereto is easie. For the Arian Bishops, who then lived at Constantinople, were far inferior to the Novatian Bishops. For the Church of these Hereticks did in those Times abound with many, and Those eminent Prelates: Which Sozomen also confirms by his Testimony, who records their Elogues, exactly like those given them by our Socrates. Wherefore, it must either be said that Sozomen was also a Novatian, or else our Socrates must be discharged from that Calumny. But 'tis manifest Sozomen was not a Novatian. For (to omit Theodorus Leontius's Testimony, who, in his Epistle prefixt before his Triperite-History, styles him Μαγεωστῶν, a most blessed Person,) he himself in his Ninth Book relates, that he was present at a publick Procession, celebrated at Constantinople in honour of forty Martyrs, at such time as Prochus presided over the Church of that City. Whence 'tis manifestly concluded, that Sozomen was a Person of the Catholick Communion, in regard he was present at the publick Prayers together with the Catholicks. I confess indeed, that our Socrates does frequently favour the Novatians; for instance, when he recounts the Ring-leader of the Novatian Heretic amongst the number of the Martyrs; when he affirms, that the Novatians were joyn'd to the Catholicks in the ties of a most intimate Friendship and Love, and that they pray'd together with them in the Church of God; and lastly, when he commends Sisinnius's Oration, which he made against this Saying of S<sup>c</sup> Chrysostome,

Concerning the Life and Writings of Socrates and Sozomen.

Although thou hast repented a thousand times, approach. But 'tis one thing to favour the Novatians; another to be a Novatian. Our Socrates might indeed be a favourer of the Novatians, either because he was engaged in a friendship and familiarity with them, or in regard he approved of their discipline and abstinence. For, as far as we can collect from his Books, he was something severe. But I can hardly persuade myself, that he was a Novatian; especially when as I seem to have found the contrary from some places which occur in his History. For first, in Chap. 38. of his Second Book, he frequently calls the Catholics οἱ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, those of the Church; and opposes them to the Novatians. Therefore he acknowledges that the Novatians were without the Church. Which he would certainly never have done, had he embraced that Heresie. Besides, in the 20. and 23. Chapters of his Fifth Book he reckons the Novatians amongst the Hereticks, to wit, amongst the Arians, Macedonians, and Eunomians. Lastly, from Chap. 19. of the same Book it may be apparently concluded that Socrates was not a Novatian. For first, he always calls the Church simply and absolutely the Catholick-Church: opposing it to the Churches of other Sects, concerning which he treats in the following Chapters, to wit, of the Arians, Novatians, and Eunomians. Then, he does not obscurely reprehend that advice of Nestorius, who abrogated the † Penitentiary Presbyter. For he says, that hereby Licence was given to Sinners, when as there was no body that might reprove Offenders. Which Opinion could not proceed from a Novatian, in regard those Hereticks admitted neither of Repentance [after Baptism], nor of a Penitentiary-Presbyter, as Socrates does there attest. Add hereto the testimony of Theodorus Lector, who, in his Epistle prefixt before his Ecclesiastick History, calls Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret, ἀνδρες σεπταί, that is, Men that were pious and acceptable to God. Moreover, Theodorus Lector lived in the same City, and almost at the same time that Socrates did, to wit, in the Reign of the Emperor Anastasius. Lastly, Petrus Halloixius (in his Notes on the Life of St. Irenæus, pag. 664.) is of the same Opinion with us. For, disputing against Baronius, who at the year of Christ 159. had written thus: These things Socrates the Novatian, who with the Jews celebrated Easter on the fourteenth day of the Moon, &c. he utters these words. And whereas Socrates is termed a Novatian, that may be taken in a double sense: The one is, that he sometimes favoured the Novatians; which also Bellarmine affirms (in his Book de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis, at the year of our Lord 440.) both concerning him, and likewise concerning Sozomen. The other is, that he was [a follower] of the Novatian-Heresie. In the now-cited Chapter, he neither shews himself to be a Novatian, nor a favourer of them. For he blames them, and detests their dissensions and vices; in so much that he may seem not to have been a friend, but an enemy, or rather neither of the two, but a declarer of the truth, which is the business of an Historian. Thus far concerning Socrates, we must now speak of Sozomen.

Hermias Sozomen was also a practiser in the Law at Constantinople, at the same time with Socrates. His Ancestors were not mean, they were originally Palestinians, Inhabitants of a certain Village near Gaza, called Bethelia. This Village did in times past abound with a numerous Company of Inhabitants, and had most stately and ancient Churches. But the most glorious Structure of them all was the Pantheon, situated on an artificial Hill, which was the Tower as it were of Bethelia, as Sozomen relates in Chap. 15. of his fifth Book. The Grandfather of Hermias Sozomen was born in that Village, and first converted to the Christian Faith by Hilarion the Monk. For when Alaphion an inhabitant of the same Village was possessed with a Devil, and the Jews and Physicians attempting to cure him, could do him no good by their Enchantments; Hilarion, by a bare invocation of the Name of God, cast out the Devil. Sozomen's Grandfather, and Alaphion himself, amazed at this Miracle, did with their whole families embrace the Christian Religion. The Grandfather of Sozomen was eminent for his Expositions of the sacred Scriptures, being a Person endowed with a polite Wit, and an acuteness of Understanding. Besides, he was indifferently well skill'd in Literature. Therefore he was highly esteemed of by the Christians inhabiting Gaza, Ascalon, and the places adjacent, in regard he was useful and necessary for [the propagating of] Religion, and could easily unloose the Knots of the sacred Scriptures. But Alaphion's Descendants excelled others for their Sanctity of Life, Kindness to the indigent, and for their other Virtues: and they were the first that built Churches and Monasteries there, as Sozomen attests in the place before cited. Where he also adds, that some holy Persons of Alaphion's Family were surviving even in his days, with whom he himself, when very young, was conversant, and concerning whom he promises to speak more afterwards. Undoubtedly he means Salamaneis, Phisco, Malebis, and Crispio, Brothers, concerning whom he speaks in Chap. 32. of his sixth Book. For he says, that these Brethren, instructed in the Monastick Discipline by Hilarion, were, during the Empire of Valens, eminent in the Monasteries of Palestine: and that they lived near Bethelia, a Village in the Country of the Gazites. For they were Descendants of a Noble Family amongst them. He mentions the same Persons in his Eighth Book and Fifteenth Chapter, where he says Crispio was Epiphanius's Arch-Deacon. 'Tis apparent therefore, that those Brethren I have mentioned were extracted from Alaphion's Family. Now Alaphion was related to Sozomen's Grandfather. Which I conjecture from hence. First, because the Grandfather of Sozomen is said to have been converted (together with his whole Family) to the Christian Religion, upon account of Alaphion's wonderful Cure, whom Hilarion had healed, by calling on the name of the Omnipotent potent GOD. Further, this Conjecture is confirm'd by what Sozomen relates, to wit, that he, when very young, was familiarly conversant with the aged Monks that were of Alaphion's Family. And lastly, in regard Sozomen took his name from those Persons who were either the Sons or Grandchildren of Alaphion. For he was called Salamanes Hermias Sozomenus (as Photius attests in his Bibliotheca) from the name of that Salamanes, who, as we observed before, was Phuseo's, Malchio's, and Crispio's Brother. Wherefore that mistake of Nicephorus's, and others, must be amended, who suppose that Sozomen had the Surname of Salaninus, because he was born at Salamine a City of Cyprus. But we have before demonstrated from Sozomen's own testimony, that he was not born in Cyprus, but in Palestine. For his Grandfather was not only a Palestinian, as is above said, but Sozomen himself was also educated in Palestine, in the bosom (as I may say) of those Monks that were of Alaphio's Family. From which education Sozomen seems to me to have imbibed that most ardent love of a Monastick Life and Discipline, which he declares in many places of his History. Hence 'tis, that in his Books he is not content to relate, who were the Fathers and Founders of Monastick Philosophy; but he also carefully relates their Successors and Disciples, who both in Egypt, Syria, and Palestine, and also in Pontus, Armenia and Ostioena, followed this way of Life. Hence also it is, that in the Twelfth Chapter of the First Book of his History, he has propos'd to be read (in the beginning as it were) that gorgeous Elogue of Monastick Philosophy. For he supposed, that he should have been ungrateful, had he not after this manner at least made a return of thanks to those, in whose familiarity he had lived, and from whom, when he was a youth, he had received such eminent examples of a good converse. For that he himself intimates, in the Proeme to his first Book. But it is collected that Sozomen was educated at Gaza, not only from this place which I have mentioned, but also from Cidap. 28. of his Seventh Book, where Sozomen says, that he himself had seen Zeno Bishop of Majuma. This Majuma is a Sea-Port belonging to the Gazites. Which Bishop, although he was almost an hundred years old, yet was never absent from the Morning and Evening Hymns, unless it hapned that he was deranged by a disease. After this Sozomen applied himself to the profession of the Law. He was a Student in the Civil Law at Berytus, a City of Phoenicia, not far distant from his own Country, where there was a famous Civil-Law-School. But he practis'd the Law at Constantinople, as himself attests in his second Book and third Chapter: And yet he seems not to have been very much employed in pleading of Causes. For at the same time that he was an Advocate at Constantinople, he wrote his Ecclesiastick History; which may be concluded from his own Words. For thus he says (Book 2. Chap. 3.) οὐκ ἔστιν Ἀνδρῶν ἱσχυρῶν, ἀλλὰ καὶ εἰς τὴν αὐτῶν συντάξιν ἐκείνην, καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἀποστολαῖς διὰ τὴν ἀποστολὴν τοῦ πρῶτου αὐτῶν ἀνδρός· καὶ δὲ τὸ δευτέρου, ἀναγκασίως ἐπ' αὐτὸν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν ἀγῶνα, ἀποστολὴν τοῦ πρῶτου αὐτῶν ἀνδρός· καὶ δὲ τὸ δευτέρου, ἀναγκασίως ἐπ' αὐτὸν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐπὶ τὸν ἀγῶνα, ἀποστολὴν τοῦ πρῶτου αὐτῶν ἀνδρός· but what hapned to Aquilinus, a person at this time conversant with me, and one that pleads Causes in the same Court of Judicature, I will necessarily relate, partly as I hear it from him, and partly as I myself saw it. Further, before he wrote his Nine Books of Ecclesiastick History, Sozomen compos'd a Breviary of Ecclesiastick affairs, from our Saviour's Ascension to the Deposition of Valentinian. Which work was compriz'd in two Books, as himself attests in the Proeme to his First Book. But those two Books are lost by length of time. In the compofure of his History, Sozomen has made use of a Style neither too Low, nor too High, but between both: which Style is most agreeable to a Writer of Ecclesiastick Affairs. Photius (in his Bibliotheca) prefers Sozomen's Style before Socrates's. With whom we agree. But by how much Sozomen is superior for the Elegancy of his expression, by so much Socrates exceeds upon account of his judiciousness. For Socrates judges incomparably well, both of Men, and also of Ecclesiastick Business and Affairs. There is nothing in him but what is grave and serious. Nothing that you can expunge as superfluous. But on the contrary, some passages occur in Sozomen that are trivial and childish. Of this sort is his digression in his First Book concerning the building of the City Hemona, and concerning the Argonauts, who carried the Ship Argo on their Shoulders some furlongs. Also his description of Daphne without the Walls of the City Antioch, which occurs at Chap. 19. of his Sixth Book. And that observation of his concerning the beauty of the Body, where he treats of that Virgin, with whom the blessed Athanasius abscinded a long while. Lastly, his Ninth Book contains little else besides warlike Events, between which and an Ecclesiastick History there is no agreement. Besides, Sozomen's Style, which Photius prefers before that of Socrates, wants not its faults. For I have observed, that the Periods are by Sozomen no otherwise joyned together, than by these Particles καὶ and καὶ; than which there is nothing more troublesome. Should any one attentively read that Epistle wherein Sozomen Dedicates his Work to Theodosius Junior, he will find that which I have said to be certainly true, to wit, that Sozomen was no great Orator.

It remains, that we inquire which of these * two Authors wrote first, and which of them * Socrates borrow'd, or rather stole from the other. Certainly, in regard both of them Wrote almost the same things of the same Transactions, in as much as they both began at the same beginning, and concluded their History at the same boundary, (both beginning from the Reign of Constantine, and ending at the Seventeenth Consulate of Theodosius Junior;) it must needs be true, that one of them robbed the others Desk. Which sort of theft (as Porphyrinus attests in Eusebius's Tenth Book of Evangelic Preparation) was committed by many of the Grecian Writers. But which was the Plagiarist, Socrates or Sozomen, 'tis hard to say, in regard both of them lived in the same times, and both both wrote their History in the Empire of Theodosius Junior. Therefore, in the disquisition of this question, we must make use of conjecture. In such a case as this Porphyrius in the before-quoted Book (when it was uncertain whether Hyperides stole from Demosthenes, or Demosthenes from Hyperides, because both of them lived at the same time,) openly declared that conjecture was to be made use of. Let us therefore see upon which of them falls the suspicion of theft. Indeed this is my sentiment, I do suppose that the Inferior does frequently steal from the Superior, and the Junior from the Senior. But Sozomen is in my judgment far inferior to Socrates; and he betook himself to Writing his History when he was younger than Socrates. For he wrote it whilst he was yet an Advocate, as I observed before. Now, the profession of the Advocates amongst the Romans was not perpetual, but temporary. Lastly, He that adds something to the other, and sometimes amends the other, seems to have written last. But Sozomen now and then adds some passages to Socrates, and in some places dissents from him, as Photius has observed, and we have hinted in our Annotations. Sozomen therefore seems to have written last. And this is the Opinion of almost all modern Writers; who place Socrates before Sozomen; So Bellarmino in his Book De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis; who is followed by Miræus, Labbeus, and Vossius. Amongst the Ancients, Cassiodorus, Photius and Nicephorus name Socrates in the first place. Although Cassiodorus is found to have varied. For in his Preface to the Tripartite History, in a clean contrary order he names Theodoret in the first place, Sozomen in the second, and Socrates last. So also does Theodorus Lector recount them, in his Epistle which he prefixt before the Tripartite History. Thus far concerning Sozomen.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE Ecclesiastical History OF SOCRATES SCHOLASTICUS.

CHAP. I.

The Preface to the whole Book.

EUSEBIUS PAMPHILUS having compiled an Ecclesiastical History in Ten Intire Books, concluded it in the Reign of Constantine the Emperor: at which time also the (a) Persecution against the Christians ceased, [which had been begun] by Diocletian. The same Author, in the Books he wrote concerning the Life of Constantine, has made but a (b) slight relation of the matters relating to Arius: for he was more careful about the praises of the Emperor, and about a panegyric sublimity in his expressions, as it is usually done in [the composition of] an Encomium, than about an accurate and exact account of what was done. But we, purposing to commit to writing the Ecclesiastical affairs from those times to these our own days, will begin our History (c) from those things which he has left untouched: we shall not be over curious about the grandeur of our stile, but what things soever we have found upon record, or have heard from such who were present at the transactions thereof, we will particularly relate. And because it is conducive to our design, to declare after what manner

Constantine was converted to the Christian Religion, according to our ability we will speak something of that matter.

CHAP. II.

WE will begin from those times, where- in Diocletian and Maximian, surnamed Hercules, having by a mutual compact resign'd their Empire, embraced a private life: and Maximian, surnamed Galerius, who had been his Colleague in the Empire with them, came into Italy, and created two Cæsars, Maximin in the Eastern parts [of the Empire], and Severus in Italy. (b) But in Britain Constantine was proclaimed Emperor, in the room of Constantius his Father, (c) who died in the first year of the two hundredth seventy first Olympiad, on the five and twentieth day of the month July. [Lastly] at Rome, Maximian the Son of Maximianus Hercules was by the Pretorian Soldiers advanced to be a Tyrant rather than an Emperor. Hereupon Hercules, passionately desirous of reassuming his Imperial Authority, endeavour'd to destroy his Son Maximian. But he was hindred from doing that by the Soldiers. Afterwards (d) he died at Tarsus a City of Cilicia. that Constantine and Maximian began their Reign in the same year that Diocletian and Maximianus Hercules did reign the Empire. This also was the opinion of the Author of the Chronicle of Alexandria, and of others who attribute the years of Constantine's Reign to Constantine his Son. And hence it is that Constantine the Great is reported to have reigned 22 years, when as really he reigned but 30 years, and 10 months. Valef.

(e) Socrates does in the end of his Seventh Book (where he concludes his History) repeat this; in which place he says that he began his History in the first year of the 271 Olympiad, in which year Constantine the Great was proclaimed Emperor. This Olympiad does begin at the Solstice of the CCCV. year, being the year after the resignation of Diocletian. But Constantine died not this year, but in that following, when he was the sixth time Consul with Galerius Ursulus, as we may read in Festus Idatii. And therefore Constantine's death is to be reckon'd on the second year of the aforesaid CCLXXI. Olympiad. Valef.

(f) Socrates is here in an error, for Maximianus Hercules, who was otherwise called Maximian the Elder, was by Constantine's command slain in Gallia, in the year of Christ 310. But Maximianus Cæsar, being two years after conquer'd by Licinius, died at Tarsus, as Aurelius Victor relates, and Eusebius in his Chronicle and other Authors. This is the common mistake of the Greek Historians; they make a confusion betwixt Maximianus and Maximinus, using them promiscuously. Valef.

Constant. Severus Cæsar being sent to Rome by (e) Galerius Maximianus to take his own Soldiers and put to death. Last of all died Galerius Maximianus also, who was now (f) the supreme person in the Empire, having before his death constituted Licinius Emperor: he was a native of Dacia, and had for a long time been Galerius's Fellow Soldier and Confident. Maxentius in the mean while treated the Romans severely, behaving himself like a Tyrant rather than an Emperor towards them: impudently debauching the wives of persons gently extracted; killing many and perpetrating such like facts as these. Whereof when Constantine the Emperor had notice, he made it his business to deliver the Romans from that servitude he had pressed them with; and immediately became solicitously inquisitive how he might destroy the Tyrant. Whilst he was in this deep cogitation, he considered with himself what Deity he should invoke to be his Assistant and Tuetor God in this Expedition. It came into his mind that the strict worship of the Heathen Gods had not in the least availed Dioctletian; and he found that his father Constantinus having relinquished the superstition of the Grecians, had led a more fortunate and prosperous life. Whilst therefore he was [engaged] in this doubtful deliberation, and upon the March with his Army some whither, there hapned to appear to him a wonderful and unexpressible Vision. For about noon, when the day began now to decline somewhat towards afternoon, he saw in [the face of] the heavens a pillar of light, in figure like unto a Cross, with this inscription on it, By this be thou Conqueror. The Emperor stood amazed at this apparition. And, almost disbelieving his own eyes, he asked them that were present, whether they also saw the same sight; which when they all had unanimously agreed in, [the mind of] the Emperor was corroborated by that divine and wonderful apparition. The night following Christ appear'd to him in his sleep, and said unto him, Make a Standard in figure like that which appeared [to thee], and make use of it, as an infallible and ready Trophy, against thine enemies. In obedience to this [heavenly] Oracle, he orders a Trophy to be made, in figure like a Cross, which is kept in the Palace to this day. After this he proceeded in the dispatch of affairs with a greater vigour and alacrity of mind; and having engag'd the Enemy before the very Gates of Rome, near the Bridge called Milvius, he got the victory; Maxentius being drowned in the River. This was now the (g) seventh year of Constantine's Reign, when he got

(g) Constantine got this Victory over Maxentius in the year of Christ 312. when he and Licinius were in their second Consulate; this was the sixth year of Constantine's Reign; for he began his Reign, on the 25th day of July, in the year of Christ 306. But if we say that Maxentius was conquered on the eighth of the Kalends of October in the year 312. (as Orosius reckons in his Fasts, and Signinus in his second Book concerning the Western Empire) then that which Socrates here affirms may be true; that Constantine routed Maxentius in the seventh year of his Reign. But it seems something odd to me, that Maxentius should (in the Panegyric of Nectarius) be said to be slain in the end of his sixth year, just the day before he began his seventh. Maxentius began his Reign

some days after Constantine; therefore if Maxentius died on the eighth of the Kalends of October, he must necessarily begin his Reign on the seventh. And by this Computation Constantine came to the Empire two months before Maxentius. Which indeed does not seem probable to me. But Socrates does here accord with his own opinion: for whereas Constantine (according to him) began his Reign in the year of Christ, he very well reckons this Victory in the seventh year of his Reign. Valef.

the victory over Maxentius. After these [Achievements] whilst Licinius his Colleague (who was also his Brother-in-law, by the marriage of his Sister Constantia) resided in the East, he also having received so many and such great favours from God, offer'd thanksgivings to him his great Benefactor; which were of this sort, he put a stop to the persecution against the Christians; he recalled those that were in exile; he released such as were confined in prison, and restored their Estates to those that had been proscribed; he repaired the Churches, and all these things he did with great alacrity of mind. (h) Dioctletian died the third of the

(b) About this time Dioctletian, who had resign'd his Imperial power, died at Salona, a City of Dalmatia. The Nones of December, in the year of Christ 316, as Idatius does very well write in his Annals. The same also says the Author of the Chron. Alexand. but instead of Dioctletian there is crept into the Text, Galerius Maximianus; 'tis also confirmed by the authority of Zosimus in the second Book of his History, where he says that Dioctletian died 3 years after the third Consulship of Constantine and Licinius. For, having said, that from the Consulship of Chilon and Libo (in which the Olympic Games were celebrated) to the third Consulship of Constantine and Licinius, it was above 110 years, he adds Διοκλιανὸς ἔτι τρεῖς ἔτη βίον ἐκείνων ἔζησεν (i. e. 3 years years after died Dioctletian. But Joseph Scaliger in his Notes upon Eusebius, understood this passage of Zosimus, as if Zosimus should say that Dioctletian died three years after the resignation of his Empire, or after his ninth Consulship. Valef.

C H A P. III.

How whilst Constantine augmented [the prosperity of] the Christians, Licinius his Colleague persecuted them.

NOW Constantine the Emperor, professing himself a Christian, did all things becoming his profession; he erected the Churches and adorned them with most magnificent consecrated gifts. Moreover, he shut up and demolish'd the Temples of the Heathens, and exposed made common the Images placed therein. But Licinius his Colleague, adhering to the Opinions of Heathens, hated the Christians: he forbore raising an open persecution against them, because he fear'd in the Emperor Constantine: but in a clandestine manner he ensnared many of them: and at length proceeded to open violence against to depose them. This Persecution was local; for it rag'd chiefly in those parts only where Licinius made his residence. But in regard Constantine was in no wise unacquainted with these, and other such like his tyrannous outrages, Licinius being sensible that he highly resented these proceedings, betook himself to the making of his apology before him; and having appealed him by his obsequiousness, he hypocritically made an amicable league with him, binding himself by many oaths, that in future he would never attempt any thing that was tyrannical. But at the same time that he swore, he was also perjured. For he desired not from his tyrannick [conspiracies against Constantine] nor ceased he from persecuting the Christians. For by a Decree he prohibited the Bishops “ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν ἡ δικαιοσύνη, ἀλλὰ ἡ ὑπόκρισις” the import wherof tendred word for word, is this, it hapned there only, where Licinius was: Velleius rendres the words thus, in his enim duntaxat pariter gratulatus, que sublimitas erat Licinius; it rag'd in those parts only, which were under Licinius's jurisdiction.

Constant.

Bishops from frequenting the houses of Heathens, that there might be no pretence of propagating the Christian Religion. This Persecution was at the same time open and secret. It was concealed and disguised in words; but in reality and deeds it was apparent. For those that lay under its pressures, endured most deplorable afflictions [and losses] in their Bodies, and as to their Estates.

CHAP. IV.

That there was a War raised betwixt Constantine and Licinius upon account of the Christians.

These proceedings rais'd the highest indignation in the Emperor Constantine [against Licinius:] and, the feign'd league of friendship which was betwixt them being broken, they became enemies to each other. Not long after they entred into an actual War against one another: and having fought several Settle-battles both by Sea and Land, at length Licinius was vanquished at Chrysopolis in Bithynia, a Port-Town of the Chalcidians, and yielded himself. Constantine having taken him alive, treated him kindly; and would in no wise slay him, but commanded him to reside at Thessalonica peaceably and without making any disturbance. But having lived quietly a while, he afterwards gather'd into a body some of the Barbarians, and attempted to recover his overthrow, and renew the War. Constantine being inform'd hereof, commanded that he should be put to death, and accordingly he was slain. Constantine having now the sole power and command over the whole [Roman Empire,] and being proclaimed (a) Emperor and Augustus, endeavour'd again to augment the affairs of the Christians: which he effected divers ways: and by his means Christianity enjoy'd a profound and secure peace. But an intestine War amongst the Christians themselves succeeded this so firm a Peace. What manner of War this was, and how it began, in the sequel according to my ability I will relate.

(a) In the Kings and Florentine MSS. the Particle [and] is wanting; which Cyriloph. inserted.

To me it seems not very necessary. If we do retain it, then [βασιλεύς] must signify [Augustus,] not King, as Cyriloph. renders it. Socrates alludes to the Soldiers acclamations, who after a signal Victory were wont to stile their Prince Emperor and Augustus. The Citizens did the same, when the victorious Prince made his entry into the City. Valef.

CHAP. V.

Concerning Arius's Contest with Alexander the Bishop.

AFTER Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, who suffer'd Martyrdom in the Reign of Diocletian, Achillas succeeded in that See. After Achillas [succeeded] Alexander, in the time of the foremention'd peace. He living in times that were more calm and secure, adorn'd and set his Church in order. Discouring one day in the presence of his Presbyters, and the rest of his Clergy too curiously concerning the [mystery of] the Holy Trinity, he asserted this point of Divinity, that there was an Unity in the Trinity. But Arius one of the Presbyters placed under Alexander (a man of no mean skill in the faculty of reasoning) supposing that the Bishop design'd to introduce the Opinion of Sabellius the Libyan, desirous to be perverse and contentious, deflected to an Opinion that was diametrically opposite to that of Sabellius, and as he thought, sharply and nimble oppos'd the Bishop's assertions, arguing thus. If the Father begot the Son, he that was begetten hath a Constant. beginning of his Existence. And from hence it is apparent, that there was a time, when the Son was not. Whence this is a necessary consequence, that he derives his Existence from nothing.

CHAP. VI.

How from this Contention there arose a Division in the Church; and how Alexander Bishop of Alexandria depos'd Arius and his Complices.

ARIUS having drawn this conclusion from these new assertions, excited many to that question; and from this small spark was kindled a great fire. For the mischief having begun in the Church of Alexandria over-ran all Egypt, Libya and the Upper Thebais, and at length consumed the rest of the Cities and Provinces. Many there were that did patronize Arius's Opinion, but more especially Eusebius was a maintainer of it; (not that Eusebius who was Bishop of Caesarea, but another, who formerly had been Bishop of the Church of Berytus; but was then surreptitiously crept into the Bishoprick of Nicomedia in Bithynia.) Alexander hearing and seeing what was done, became highly enrag'd, and having convened a Council of many Bishops, he degraded Arius and those that embraced his Opinion; and wrote to the [Bishops] of every City, as followeth.

The Letter of Alexander [Bishop] of Alexandria.

To Our Well beloved and dearest Fellow-Ministers of the Catholic Church in all places, Alexander [wisteth] health in the Lord. (a) Whereas there is one Body of the Catholic Church; and 'tis commanded in the Holy Scriptures that we keep the Bond of Peace and Concord, it is requisite that we should learned persons heretofore wrote a Dissertation upon this Epistle of Alexander's, which (together with some other pieces of his) he sent me a little before his death. In that Treatise he remarks in the first place, that Intemperance had not well rendered these words of Alexander [ὁ ἑκαστος ἑνός τοῦ καθολικοῦ Ἐκκλησιασμοῦ,] which they had translated thus [Cum unus sit Catholicus corpus Ecclesiae,] whereas there is one Body of the Catholic Church. But he asserts, that the place should rather have been thus rendered, [whenever the Catholic Church is one Body, &c. or, consists of one Body.] For that learned person is of opinion, that Alexander alludes to St. Paul's Epistles, wherein the Church is frequently called Christ's Body. But (say the advocates of that great man, and hereofore my dearest friend) this Version cannot be born with. For, if Alexander had thought, as Eusebius means, he would doubtless have express'd himself thus, [ἑνός σώματος ἐνός τοῦ καθολικοῦ Ἐκκλησιασμοῦ,] which in regard he has not said, it is apparent, there can be no other sense of the words, than that express'd by Translators. Besides, if Alexander would have said that the Church is the Body of Christ, he would not have worded it thus [ἑνός σώματος, one body,] but rather thus, [σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, the Body of Christ.] Valef.

norant Persons into this worst and most displeasing Heresy to Christ: I thought it necessary, being sensible Constant. fible of what is written in the Law, to be no longer silent, but to give you all notice, that you might know those that are the Apostates, and likewise the detestable Expressions of their Heresie, and that if Eusebius write to you, you should give no heed to him: For he, at that time desirous to renew his pristine Malvolence, which seemed to have been silenced [and forgot] by length of time, pretends indeed to write Letters on their behalf, but in reality he declares, that he uses his utmost diligence to do this upon his own account. Now these are the names of those which are turn'd Apostates; Arius, Achilles, Aithales, Carpiones, another Arius, Sarmates, Euzoios, Lucius, Julianus, Menas, Helladius, and Gaius; Secundus also, and Theonas, who were sometimes

(b) In the Florence MS. after these words [ἐπὶ ταύταις, these are] follow these [αὐτῶν γενεαί, the Generations of the Arius,] which words should rather be placed in the Margin. In Gelasius there occur likewise at this place, these words, ὁμοῦ αὐτοῖς, Arius's Opinion. Valef.

filed Bishops. (b) And these are their Tenets which they have invented and do assert contrary to the authority of Scripture. God, they say, was not always a Father; but there was a time when God was not a Father. The Word of God was not from everlasting, but had its beginning from Nothing. For God, who is, made him, who was not, of Nothing. Therefore there was a time when he was not: For the Son is a Creature and a Work; neither is he like to the Father as to his Essence, nor is he by Nature the genuine Word of the Father, nor his true Wisdom

(c) After these words [nor his true Wisdom] there was a whole clause wanting, which from three MSS. the Florentine, Sforzian, and Alatiian, and from Gelasius Cyrenensis we have made good, thus, [καὶ ἐκ τούτου οὐ συνιστάται τῷ Ἀποστόλῳ ἐπὶ. But he is one of his Works, and one of his Creatures;] which words Epiph. Scholasticus had found in his Copy, well apparent from his Version. For he has translated this whole place thus: Creatura est enim, & factura filius, neque, similis est patri secundum substantiam neque verus est, neque vera sapientia, & c. neque verum naturaliter patri verbum est, sed unum quidem creaturam & facturam est: For the Son is a Creature and a Work, neither is he like the Father as to his Essence: Nor is he genuine, nor his true Wisdom: nor is he by nature the true Word of the Father, but one of his Creatures and one of his Works. Hence it appears, that that Greek Copy of Socrates, which Epiphanius Scholasticus used, differed something from our Manuscripts. And yet Leo Alatiian's Copy agrees exactly with that which Epiphanius followed. For thus it words this passage: ὅτι δὲ ἀληθινὸς ὢν, καὶ ἀπολύτως οὐσία αὐτῷ ὄντι. ὅτι ἀπολύτως καὶ οὐκ ἀπολύτως αὐτῷ ὄντι. καὶ οὐκ ἀπολύτως ὄντι ὁμοούσιον, καὶ οὐκ ἀπολύτως ὄντι καὶ ὁμοούσιον αὐτῷ ὄντι. &c. So exactly do the Authors of the Greek and Latin Tripartite History agree amongst themselves, that they seem to have borrowed from one another. Valef.

(d) In Leo Alatiian's MS. Copy, the reading of this place is thus, ὁμοούσιον καὶ ἀπολύτως οὐσία αὐτῷ ὄντι καὶ οὐκ ἀπολύτως οὐσία αὐτῷ ὄντι. Which reading Epiph. Scholasticus has followed; who translated it thus: Filius & ipse & existens in proprio Dei verbo, & in Dei sapientia, sic himself is made and exists in the proper Word of God, and in the Wisdom of God. But we have rather follow'd the reading of the King's, the Florentine, and the Sforzian MSS. which is also confirm'd by Gelasius. Valef.

(e) In Leo Alatiian's MS. (which contains the Tripartite History that Theodorus Lector composed in Greek out of Seraptes, Sozomen, and Theodoret) these words are added, καὶ ἀπολύτως, and is invisible. So Epiph. Scholasticus reads it, as appears from his Version. Valef.

the Devil was, they were not afraid to answer, Yes Constant. certainly he may: For he is of a Nature subject to change, (f) in that he is gotten and created. We (f) last- therefore with the Bishops of Egypt and (g) Libya, near a hundred in number, being met together, have * Anathematized A- * Anathematized A- rianus for these his Principles, and for his impudent Assertion of them, together with all his adherents. But Eusebius has given them entertainment, endeavouring to mix Falshood with Truth, and Impiety with Piety: but he shall not prevail. For Truth getteth the Victory: and Light has no communion with Darkness, nor hath Christ any agreement with Belial. For who ever heard the like? Or what Man, if he should now hear them, would not be amazed thereat, and stop his Ears, lest the Filth of this Doctrine should penetrate and infect them? What Man is he, that when he hears these words of St. John, In the beginning was the Word, will not condemn those that affirm, there was a time when the Word was not? Or, who is he that when he hears these words of the Gospel, The only begotten Son, and by him all things were made, will not abominate these Men that say, the Son is one of the Creatures.

(b) For how can he be one of those things that were made by him? Or how can he be term'd the Only begotten, who (according to their sentiments of him) is reckon'd amongst all the other Creatures? How can he be made of nothing, whereas the Father himself saith, * My heart hath sent forth a good word, and † Before the morning I have begotten thee in the womb? Or how can he be unlike the Father in Essence, whereas he is the * perfect Image, and † the brightness of the Father: And whereas he himself testifieth, || He that has seen me, hath seen the Father: Now if the Son be the Word and the Wisdom of the Father, how can there be a time when he was not? For 'tis the same [absurdity,] as if they should say, there was a time when God was both without his Word and his Wisdom. How can he be mutable and subject to change, who says concerning himself, * I am in the Father, and the Father in me, and † I and the Father are one? He [saith also] by the Prophet, || Behold me, for I am the Lord, and am not changed. And tho' some one may say, that this was spoken in reference to the Father, yet it will be more accommodate, to understand it now to be spoken in relation to the Word: Because although he became Man, yet was he not changed; but, as the Apostle says, † Jesus Christ the same yesterday and to day, and for ever. But what motive could they have to say, that he was made for us, whereas Paul saith, * Heb. 2. For him are all things, and by him are all things: † For concerning their Blasphemy in affirming, that the Son doth not perfectly know the Father, it ought not to be wondered at. For having once resolved to fight

(h) In Leo Alatiian's MS. and in Gelasius Cyrenensis, this place is truer written thus, καὶ δὲ ἀπολύτως οὐσία αὐτῷ ὄντι καὶ οὐκ ἀπολύτως οὐσία αὐτῷ ὄντι. Which Reading we have express'd in our Translation. The Reading in the Florentine and Sforzian MSS. is καὶ δὲ ἀπολύτως οὐσία αὐτῷ ὄντι καὶ οὐκ ἀπολύτως οὐσία αὐτῷ ὄντι. How can he be equal with those things made by him. Valef.

Constant. against Christ, they despise even the Words of the Lord himself, who says, * As the Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father. If therefore the Father knoweth the Son only in part, it is manifest, that the Son also knoweth the Father in part. But if it be impious to assert this, and if the Father knoweth the Son perfectly, it is pernicious, that as the Father knoweth his own Word, so doth the Word know his own Father, whose Word he is. By asserting of these things, and explaining the Sacred Scriptures, we have frequently confuted them; but they, like Chameleons, have again been changed, pertinaciously contending to appropriate to themselves they approach nearer to Antichrist. Wherefore they are expelled out of the Church, and Anathematized. We are really troubled at the Destruction of these Men, and the rather, because they were heretofore instructed in the Doctrine of the Church, but have now renounced it. Yet we do not look upon this as so strange a thing. For the same thing befel

(i) The reading in Leo Allatii's MS. and in Gelasius (which is this), Ἐπιγεγραμμένους τὰς ἐκ ἀποστολῆς, ἡμετέρας τὴν ὑποβίβου pleases me better than this [Ἐπιγεγραμμένους τὰς ἀποστολῆς]. Vales.

And Paul having learned these things from our Saviour, wrote thus; * That in the latter days, some shall depart from the sound faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, who desert the truth. Since therefore our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ hath himself commanded this, and also by his Apostle hath given us intimation concerning these men, we, being ear-witnesses of their impiety, have deservedly anathematized these men, as we said before; and openly declared them estranged from the Catholic Church and Faith. Moreover, we have signified thus much to your Piety, (beloved and dearest Fellow-Ministers) that if any of them should have the confidence to come to you, you might not entertain them, and that you should not be persuaded [to believe] Eusebius, or any one else that shall write to you concerning them. For it is our duty, as we are Christians, to detest all those that speak or devise any thing against Christ, as the Enemies of God, and the Corrupters of Souls, and * not to say to such men so much as God speed, lest we become partakers of their iniquities (as Saint John hath commanded us.) Salute the brethren that are with you, they that are with us salute you.

Alexander, having written such Letters as this to all the Bishops in every City, the mischief grew worse: those to whom the Contents thereof were communicated, being hereby inflamed with a pernicious contention. Some were of the same opinion with, and subscribed to the Contents of these Letters; but others did the contrary. But Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia was in the highest degree incited to dissent, because Alexander had in his Letters made a reproachful mention of him in particular. At that time Eusebius was a man of great interest, because the Emperor did then keep his Court at Nicomedia: for Diocletian had not long before built a Palace there. For this reason therefore many Bishops were very obsequious to Eusebius. And he himself wrote frequently, sometimes to Alexander, [advising him] to suppress (k) the controversy raised [amongst them] and to readmit Arius and his adherents into the Church: at other times [he wrote] to the Bishops of every particular City, [persuading them] that they should not consent to Alexander. Hence it came to pass, that all places were filled with tumult and disturbances. For now a man might have seen not only the Prelates of the Churches in words contending with one another, but the Populace also divided, some inclining to one party, some to another. And this matter grew to that height of indignity and infoleny, that the Christian Religion became a ridicule even in the publick Theaters. Those that were at Alexandria did * pertinaciously contend about the chiefest points of the Faith. They also sent Embassies to the Bishops of every particular Province. Likewise, those that were of the other party, were authors of the like stirrs and discords.

(l) There were mixed amongst the Arians the Melitians, who not long before had been separated from [the Communion] of the Church. Now who these Melitians are, we must relate: one Melitius a Bishop of one of the Cities in Egypt, had been deposed by Peter Bishop of Alexandria (who suffered Martyrdom under Diocletian,) for several other reasons, but most especially for this, that in the time of persecution he had denied the Faith and sacrific'd. This person being divested [of his Bishoprick,] and having got a great many followers, constituted himself the Ringleader of their Heresie, who in Egypt to this day from him called Melitians. Moreover, having no reasonable excuse at all for his separation from the Church, he barely said thus much, that he was injured; he did likewise revile and speak reproachfully of Peter. Peter having suffer'd martyrdom in the persecution, ended his life. But [Melitius] withdraws his reproaches [from Peter] and casts them first upon Achillas, Peter's successor, and afterwards upon Alexander who succeeded Achillas. During their being engaged in this dissention, Arius's controversy was started; and Melitius and his Complices became favourers of Arius, joining with him in a conspiracy against the Bishop. Now those who look upon Arius's Opinion as absurd, approv'd of Alexander's Condemnation of Arius, and thought the sentence pass'd against all that favour'd

Constant. us leave, who are his Servants, that we may successfully finish this our Endeavour, that by our Exhortation, Diligence and earnest Admonitions, we may reduce you to an Unity of Assembly. For in regard, as we have already said, you hold the same Faith, and have the same Sentiments of our Religion; and since the Commandment of the Law doth in all its Parts inclose all in general in one Consent and Purpose of Mind; let not this thing, which has raised a mutual Division between you, (in as much as it appertaineth not to the Power and Efficacy of Religion in general) by any means make a Separation and a Faction amongst you. These things we speak, not to necessitate you to be all of one Opinion concerning this foolish idle Controversie, of what sort severer it be. For the precious value of the Assembly may be preserved entire amongst you, and one and the same Communion may be retained, although there be interchangeably amongst you a great Diversity of Sentiments in things of the smallest import. For we do not all

n Babut. means the same in all things, neither is there one Je. Will, Disposition or Opinion in all of us. Therefore, concerning the Divine Providence, let there be amongst you one Faith, one Meaning, and one Covenant of the Deity. But as for these slender and light Questions, which with so much niceness you dispute of and make Researches into amongst yourselves, although therein you do not all agree in the same Opinion, yet it is your Duty to confine them to your own Thoughts, and keep them within the secret Repositories of your own Minds. Let therefore an unutterable and excellent common Friendship, a Belief of the Truth, the Honour of God, and a religious Observance of his Law, remain amongst you firm and immoveable; return ye to a mutual Friendship and Charity: restore to the whole Body of the People their usual Embraces. And be you your selves (having as it were purified your own Souls,) acquainted again (and renew your Familiarity) with one another. For Friendship is frequently more sweet and pleasing, after the (d) Occasion of the Enmity is laid aside; return to a Reconciliation again. Restore therefore to us peaceable and serene Days, and Nights void of Sollicitude, that during the Residue of our Life we may have the pleasure of the pure Light, and the joy of a quiet Life reserved for us. Which if [we shall not obtain] we must necessarily groan, and be wholly surrounded with Tears: Nor shall we finish the Residue of our Life without great disquietude.

(f) In my Annotations at the several Book of Eusebius's Life of Constantine, instead of [perpetua] in the MSS. of Eusebius, after the mention of the Enmity is laid aside, [I have noted that the reading should be [the highest] between, after the removing of the Enmity] as it is in some Copies. But in as much as our MSS. do wit, the Florent. Sorian, and Vatican change not the reading here, we may bear with the common reading, which is also confirmed by Euseb. Scholasticus's Version: for now he translates this Passage: Sacerdotes crebro sunt amicitie post inimicitiarum causas ad concordiam revocati. Valeat.

For whilst the People of God, (we mean our Fellow Servants,) are rent asunder by this pernicious and indiscreet Diffinition which they are now involved in, how is it possible for us in future to continue in a sedate temper of Mind? And that you may be sensible of our excessive Sorrow for this thing, be attentive [to what we shall tell you.] When we lately came to the City of Nicomedia, we had resolved forthwith to have made a journey into the East. But while we were hastning towards you, and by the greatest part were with you, the news of this Affair quite altered our Resolution; lest we should be necessitated to be a Spectator of these things, which we could not endure even to hear. Do you therefore by your Unity, for the time to come, open the way for us into the East, which by your mutual Discord you have stopped up. Give us leave with joy speedily to see you, and all the rest of the People, and that with an Constant. unanimous consent of Praises we may offer up to God due thanks for the publick Agreement and Liberty.

C H A P. VIII.

Concerning the Council held at Nicæa, a City of Bithynia; and concerning the Faith there published.

SUCH admirable and prudent advice did the Emperor's Letter give them. But the mischievous difference was grown so strong and potent, that neither the Emperor's industry, nor the authority of the person who brought the Letters was able to do any good. For neither Alexander nor Arins were in the least mollified by the Letter. Amongst the Populace also there was an irreconcilable discord, and a great disturbance. Moreover, before this broke out, there was another distemper in that place, which had caus'd disturbance in the Church, (to wit) a disagreement concerning the Feast of Easter; but this was only in the Eastern parts: where some made it their business to celebrate that Festival after the Jewish manner, others [in their solemnization thereof] limited the rest of the Christians throughout the whole World. But tho' they differ'd thus concerning the Feast, yet they did not refrain from a mutual Communion. However, they clouded the joy of the Feast by this their diffention. The Emperor therefore seeing the Church disturbed by these two evils, convened a General Council, by his Letters requesting the Bishops from all parts to meet together at Nicæa a City of Bithynia. Accordingly the Bishops, out of divers Provinces and Cities, assembled; concerning whom Eusebius Pamphilus, in his Third Book of Constantine's Life, writeth thus word for word. The most eminent: therefore amongst God's Ministers of all those Churches which filled all Europe, Libya and Asia, were convened. And one sacred Oratory, enlarged as it were by God himself, included at the same time within its Walls, both Syrians and Cilicians, Phœnicians and Arabians, Palæstinians, and Egyptians also; Thæbæans, Libyans, and those that came out of Mesopotamia. There was also at this Synod a Persian Bishop, neither was the Scythian absent from this Choir. * Pontus also, and Galatia, Pamphilia and Cappadocia, Asia and Phrygia afforded their most select Divines. Moreover, there appeared here Thracians and Macedonians, Achæians and Epirots, and such as dwell far beyond these were nevertheless present [Hosius also] that most famed Spaniard, (together with many of his Countrymen) was one that sat in this Council. The † Prelate of the Imperial City was † Gelasius Cyrenicus supposed that by these words the Bishop of Constantinople was meant, with whom agrees Nicetas, (in the thesauro Orthodoxæ fidei, Book 5. Chap. 6.) and Epiphanius Scholasticus, in Book 2. Advers. Tripart. Augustinus (as 'tis apparent from his rendition of these words) thought the Bishop of Rome was hereby meant: for he renders this place thus: Romane autem civitatis Episcopus propter senium deceret; i. e. The Bishop of Rome, by reason of his age, was absent. Valentinus is of the same opinion with Augustinus: for (in his Annotations on Chap. 7. of the Third Book of Eusebius's Life of Constantine) he says, that at such time as this Council was convened, Constantinople was not adorned with the name of The Imperial City. See Socrumen, Book 1. Chap. 16. and Theodoret, Book 1. Chap. 7.

* These words of Eusebius occur at the Third Book of his Life of Constantine, Chap. 7. Socrates has not quoted them word for word as they are there. We (following herein Valentinus, Ousebius, and Grynæus) have rendered them as they are in the fore-cited place of Eusebius.

Constant. absent by reason of his age. But his Presbyters were there, and supplied his place. The Emperor Constantine was the only person of all the Princes since the Foundation of the World, who (after he had platted such a Crown as this by the Bond of Peace) dedicated it to Christ his Saviour, as a divine Present and Acknowledgement for the Victories he had obtained over his Enemies and Adversaries, having constituted this Synod convened in our days to be a lively Representation of that Apostolic Choir. For

* See Allat. it is * written that in the Apostles Days there were gathered together devout men out of every nation under heaven, amongst whom were Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and the Inhabitants of Mesopotamia, Judea and Cappadocia, of Pontus and of Asia, of Phrygia and Pamphilia; of Ægypt, and of the Parts of Libya adjacent to Cyrene: Strangers also of Rome, Jews and Proselytes, Cretians and Arabians. This was the only thing wanting, that meeting [in the Apostles Times] did not consist of the Ministers of God only: But in this present Assembly the number of the Bishops exceeded (a) three hundred. And the Presbyters that accompanied them, the Deacons, * Aco-luthi, and the many other persons were almost innumerable. Of these Ministers of God, some were eminent for their Wisdom and Eloquence; others for their sober and discreet Lives, others for their patient sufferance [of hardships]; and others were adorned with Modesty and a courteous Behaviour. Some of them were highly respected by reason of their great age, and others were eminent for their youthful Vigour both of Body and Mind. Some were newly initiated into the Order of the Ministry. To all these the Emperor commanded a plentiful provision of Food to be daily allowed. † Thus much says, they says Eusebius concerning those there assembled.

(a) The Ancients are not agreed concerning the number of Bishops that were at the Nicene Council. Eusebius in his third Book, ch. four both of Body and Mind. Some were newly initiated into the Order of the Ministry. To all these the Emperor commanded a plentiful provision of Food to be daily allowed. † Thus much says, they says Eusebius concerning those there assembled.

were two hundred and fifty. Eustathius Bishop of Antioch (in his Homily on those words of Solomon, The Lord created me, &c.) affirms they were about 270; but says he had not call up their number exactly. The more constant account (which is confirm'd by the consent of all modern Authors) is, that there sat in the Synod 318 Bishops, which is confirm'd by these Ancients; viz. Athanasius, in his Epistle to the African Bishops, near the beginning; Eustathius, in his Book against Constantius; Jerome, in his Chronicle; and Rufinus. See Valefius's Notes on Chap. 6. of Book 3. of Eusebius de Vita Constant.

(b) Το μέτρον τέλει κατεσκεύασται. Many senses may be given of these words. For first [μέτρον & τέλει] may be taken for [Modesty and a courteous Behaviour]; [imposing μέτρον] to be put for [μετρίαν] this sense we have followed in our Version. Secondly, [μέτρον & τέλει] may be meant concerning them, who were not the eminentest persons amongst the Bishops for Learning or Picty of Life; but did not come much behind them. So the Ancients called those Medius principes as duces, middle Princes or Captains, who were neither the best, nor the worst, but between both. Lastly, this phrase may be used concerning them, who deserved to be praised on both accounts, to wit, for their Learning and Sanctity. And thus Socrates interprets this place of Eusebius, as may be seen from his word: in his First Book, Chap. 16. See Valefius's Notes on Chap. 9. of the Third Book of Eusebius, de Vita Constant.

† In the Allat. MS. there are some words added here; in which Copy the reading is ἐπεὶ οὖν ἐκείνη ὁρμήσαντες οἱ Πατριάρχαι διὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν ἐκείνην, concerning which there assembled, Eusebius Pamphilus has thus at large discoursed: to which reading has a greater Emphasis. Valef.

When the Emperor had ended his triumphal Solemnities for his Victory over Licinius, he himself came also to Nice. The most eminent amongst the Bishops were these two, Paphnurgus Bishop of the upper Thebais, and Spyridion Bishop of Cyprus: but for what reason we have made mention of these two particularly, shall in the sequel be declared. There were also present a great many Laicks, well skilled in Logick, ready to assist each their own party. Now the Patrons of Arius's Opinion were these. Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia, (whom we mention'd before), Theognis and Maris: the first was

Bishop of Nice, and Maris was Bishop of Chalcedon in Bithynia. Against these Athanasius (who was then but a Deacon of the Church of Alexandria) contended vigorously. But Alexander the Bishop had an high esteem for him: upon which account he became the subject of envy, as we shall declare in the sequel. A little before the Convention of the Bishops in one place, the Logicians exercised themselves by engaging in some skirmishing disputes with several persons: and when many had been enticed to take a delight in disputing, a Laick, one that was a Confessor, an honest well meaning man, opposed these Disputants, and told them thus: That neither Christ nor his Apostles taught us the art of disputing, nor vain subtilties, or fallacies, but a plain (c) Opinion, which is to be guarded by faith and good works. All that stood by, hearing him speak these words, admired him, and approved of what he said: and the Logicians themselves, having heard this plain and honest declaration of the truth, did in future more patiently acquiesce: and thus was that tumult, which had been raised by disputing, composed. The next day after this all the Bishops were convened in one place; after whom came the Emperor: Who when he came in, stood in the midst of them, and would not take his seat till such time as the Bishops had by bowing of their heads signified to him, that it was their desire he should sit down; so great a respect and reverence had the Emperor for those men. After such a silence was made, as was agreeable to the occasion, the Emperor from his Chair of State began to speak to them in kind perswasive words, exhorting them to unanimity and concord. He also advised them to pass by all private animosities. For many of 'em had brought in accusations against one another: and some of them the day before had presented petitionary Libels to the Emperor. But he, advising them to proceed to the business before them for which they were convened, gave command that the Libels should be burnt, adding only this [maxim.] Christ commands him, who desires to obtain forgiveness, to forgive his Brother. Therefore, after he had at large discoursed upon Concord and Peace, he referred it to their power and arbitrement with a greater accuracy to make a further inspection into the points of our Religion. It will be very opportune to hear Eusebius's relation of these affairs, in his third Book of Constantine's Life. His words there are these: * Many

(c) I prefer the reading in the Allat. MS. in which, instead of [ἡ γνώμη ἀπλοῦς, a plain Opinion], it is [ἡ γνώμη ὁρθή, an honest Opinion, &c.] Eusebius, following this latter reading, as appears from his Version of Rufinus's tenth Book, where he treats concerning the Nicene Council. But Socrates on purpose alter'd some things. Gelasius treating on this subject, enlarges upon it, relating the Questions of each of the Philosophers, and the Bishops Answers thereto. All which passages of his, look more like Fables, than an History of what was done. Valef.

* Many English Questions being proposed by both Parties, and a great controversy raised even at the first beginning [of the Controversie], the Emperor heard them all very patiently, and with an intent mind deliberately received their Propositions; by turns he assisted them, and the Assertion of both Parties, and by degrees reduced them, who pertinaciously opposed each other, to a more sedate temper of mind; by his gracious Speeches to every person, which he spoke in the Greek Tongue, (for he was not unskilled in that Language) he rendered himself most pleasant, acceptable, and delightful; inducing some to be of his Opinion.

Constant. Opinion by the force of his Arguments: wooing others by Entreaties; praising those who spoke well, and exciting all to an Accommodation; at length he reduc'd them all to an Unanimity and Conformity in Opinion concerning all Points that were in debate. So that there was not only an universal Agreement about [the Articles] of Faith, but also a set time generally acknowledged for the Celebration of the Salutary Feast [of Easter]. Moreover, the Decrees ratified by a common consent were engross'd and confirm'd by the Subscription of every Person. These are Eusebius's own words concerning these things, which he has left us in his Writings: We thought it not unreasonable to make use of them; and have inserted them into our History, relying upon the Testimony of what has been said by him: That in case any should condemn this Council of Nice as erroneous in the [matters of] Faith, we might take no notice of them, nor credit

(d) This Sabinius was Bishop of the Macedonians in Heraclea, a City of Thrace; he made a Collection of the Synodical Acts; a very useful Work: The Testimony whereof Socrates does frequently make use of in this Eccl. History. But Socrates reproves him in many places; both because he was unfaithful in his Collection of these Acts, (Rudely relating what conducd to the Strengthening of his own Heresie, and omitting the contrary,) and also in regard he always throws himself incens'd against the Orthodox Bishops. An instance whereof is this Relation of Socrates's here; where he says, that Sabinius term'd the Fathers of the Nicene Council ignorant and simple Fellows. But 'tis usual for Heretics to calumniate the Holy Fathers and Doctors of the Church. Valf.

omitted: Othersome he has depraved and changed; but he has interpreted all Passages according to his own sense and design. He does indeed commend Eusebius Pamphilus as a Witness worthy to be credited. He does also praise the Emperor for his Judgment and Skill in the Principles of Christianity; but he complains of the Creed published at the Council of Nice, as being set forth by Idiots and Men that understand nothing. And that same Man's words, whom he calls a wise and faithful Witness, he voluntarily condemns. For Eusebius testifieth, that of those Ministers of God that were present at the Council of Nice, some were eminent for their prudent eloquence; others for their gravity and solidness of life; and that the Emperor being present reduced them all to an agreement, and made them to be of the same mind and opinion. But of Sabinius (wheresoever necessity requires) we shall hereafter make mention. Now the agreement in [the Articles of] our Faith (e) published with loud acclamations, by the great Council of Nice, was this.

(f) In the of] our Faith (e) published with loud acclamations, by the great Council of Nice, was this. *Alar. But all the MSS. did omit it in this place because 'tis repeated a little after in Eusebius Pamphilus's Epistle. Valf.

Maker of all things visible and invisible: and in one Constant. Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, begotten of the Father, the Only begotten, that is, of the substance of the Father: God of God, and Light of Light; very God of very God; begotten not made; of the same substance with the Father; by whom all things were made, that are in Heaven and in Earth; who for the sake of us men, and for our salvation, descended, and was incarnate, and was made Man, and he suffer'd and arose again the third day, ascended into the Heavens, he shall come to judge the Quick and the Dead. [We also believe] in the Holy Ghost. But the Holy Catholick and Apostolick Church doth Anathematize those that aver, that there was a time when the Son of God was not, and that he was not before he was begotten; and that he was made of Nothing; or that say he was made of another Substance or Essence; or that he is either created, or convertible, or mutable.

This Creed three hundred and eighteen Bishops approved of and embraced: and (as Eusebius testifies) being unanimous in their Suffrages and Sentiments, they subscribed it. There were only (g) five that refused to allow of it, who mislik'd the word

*Homoioussus: these were Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia, Theognis Bishop of Nice, Maris of Chalcedon, Theonas of Marmarica, and Secundus of Ptolemais. For, in regard they asserted, that that is *Consubstantial which is from another, either by Partition, or by Derivation, or by Eruption: by Eruption, as the Branch from the Root: by Derivation, as Children from their Parents: by Partition, as two or three pieces of Gold from the whole mass: but that the Son of God is [from the Father] by none of these three ways. Therefore they said, they could not give their assent to this [Draft of] of the Creed. Therefore after a tedious cavil about the term *Homoioussus, they deny'd to subscribe the degradation of Arius. Upon which account the Synod anathematized Arius and all those that were of his opinion, adding this besides, that he should be prohibited from entering into Alexandria. The Emperor also did by his Edict banish Arius, Eusebius, and Theognis. Eusebius and Theognis soon after their banishment exhibited their penitentiary Libels, and assented to the Belief of Homoioussus, as we shall declare in the procedure of our History. At the same time Eusebius surnamed Pamphilus, Bishop of Caesarea in Palestine (having made some small hesitancy in the Synod, and considered with himself whether he might securely admit of this form of Faith,) at length together with all the rest gave his assent, and subscrib'd: He also sent a Copy of the Form of Faith to the People within his Diocess, and explained to them the term Homoioussus, lest any one should have an ill opinion of him, because of his hesitancy: Thus therefore he wrote word for word. It is very probable (belov'd) that you may have heard what hath been done concerning the Ecclesiastick Faith in the Great Council convened at Nice, in regard report doth usually out-run an accurate Narrative of the Matters transacted. But [fearing] lest by such a bare report the Master might be represented to you otherwise than really it is, we thought it requisite to send to you, first, that Form of Faith which we our selves propos'd [to the Council,] and likewise

(g) There was only two Bishops, Secundus and Theonas which refus'd to subscribe to the Nicene Creed, as Theodoret does very well testify in the first Book of his Ecclesiastick History, and (before him) Hieronymus in his Dialogue against the Luciferians. The Synodical Epistle also of the Council of Nice, which is here related by Socrates, does plainly confirm this Valf.

Constantine. that other published [ by the Bishops ] who made some additions to ours. That Form of Faith drawn up by us; ( which was read in the presence of our most pious Emperor, and appeared to all to be found and orthodox, ) runs thus. As we have received by Tradition from our Predecessors the Bishops, then when we were instructed in the first Principles of the Faith, and received Baptism; as we have learnt from the Divine Scriptures, and as ( during our continuance in the Presbytership, and also since we have been intrusted with a Bishoprick ) we have believed and taught, so we also now believe, and do make a publick Declaration to you of our Faith; which is this.

We believe in One God, the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible; and in One Lord Jesus Christ, the Word of God, God of God, Light of Light, Life of Life, the Only-begotten Son, the First-born of every Creature, begotten of God the Father before all Worlds; by whom also all things were made: Who for our Salvation was incarnate, and conversed amongst Men: Who suffered, and rose again the third day; he ascended into the Father, and shall come again in Glory to judge the Quick and the Dead. We also believe in one Holy Ghost: We believe that each of these [ Persons ] is, and doth subsist: That the Father is truly the Father, the Son really the Son, and the Holy Ghost really the Holy Ghost: As our Lord also, when he sent his Disciples out to Preach, said, * Go ye, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Concerning which [ Articles ] we do aver, that we thus maintain and hold them, that these are our Sentiments of them, that this was our Opinion formerly, that this Opinion we will still death retain, that we will persevere in this Belief, and Anathematize every impious Heresy. We call God Almighty, and Jesus Christ our Lord to witness, that these were sincerely and heartily our Sentiments, ever since we were capable of knowing our selves; and that we do now think and speak what is most true: And we are ready to demonstrate to you, by most infallible Proofs, and to persuade you, that both in times past we thus believed, and likewise thus preached.

to affirm that the Emperor Constantine was the occasion of adding the word Homoiousios to the Creed.
But this is very improbable. For Constantine was not so learned, being as yet but a Catechumen. Eusebius's relation therefore must be thus understood, that the Bishop (after the Creed proposed by Eusebius Cæsariensis,) judged that the word Homoiousios ought to be added to it; and that Constantine confirmed their Opinion. But Eusebius, who made it his business to clear and excuse himself to those of his Diocese, because he hath subscribed that form of the Creed published by the Council, ( as Abbasensis, in his Book De Decret. Synod. Nicenæ and in his Book De Synod. Arimini and Seleucie attests, ) does delightfully make the business intricate, and ascribes that to the Emperor Constantine, which should rather be ascribed to the Bishops. false.

But the Bishops, who upon the Occasion of adding this word Homoiousios drew up this Form [ of the Creed (i): ] (i) These words, before the Nicene Creed, in the Florentine and Spanish MSS. are added these words [ ὁμοούσιον ]. So the Greeks call the Creed, because the Catechumens got it by heart. Irenæus (in his third Book, Chap. 25.) has these words, ὁμοούσιον ἐστὶν ἡμῶν πατέρα πάντων, καὶ τὸν αὐτὸν καὶ τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ. We believe in one God the Father Almighty, and the rest of the Articles of the Creed. See Leontius Bizantius, in his Book De sectis, pag. 466. Valef.

The Creed.

We Believe in One God, the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible: and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Only-begotten of the Father, ( that is ) of the Substance of the Father; God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten not made: Of the same Substance with the Father; by whom all things were made, that are in Heaven, and that are in Earth. Who for us Men, and for our Salvation descended, and was incarnate, was made Man, suffered, and rose again the third day: He ascended into Heaven. He shall come to Judge the Quick and the Dead. [ We also believe ] in the Holy Ghost. But those who hold, that there was a time when he was not, or that he was not before he was begotten, or that he was made of nothing, and those that affirm he is of any other Substance or Essence; or that the Son of God is created, or convertible, or obnoxious to change, [ all such ] God's Holy Catholick and Apostolick Church doth Anathematize.

When this Form of Faith was appointed by the Bishops, who did not inconsiderately omit making an enquiry, what their meaning was of those Terms, Of the substance of the Father, and of the same substance with the Father. Hence therefore arose several Questions and Answers; and the true import of those words was with great accuracy examined. And it was acknowledged by them, that these words, 'To be of the substance, did only signify thus much, That the Son is of the Father, but not as a Part of the Father. It seem'd to us altogether reasonable and safe to give our assent to this meaning of the Sacred Doctrine, which asserteth, that the Son is of the Father, but is not a Part of his Substance. Wherefore we our selves also gave our assent to this import [ of these words; ] nor do we reject the term Homoiousios, having peace before our Eyes as the Mark at which we aim; and [ being cautious ] lest we should fall from a right apprehension [ of the Faith. ] For the same Reasons also we have admitted of these words, Begotten, not made. For made, said they, is a common term attributed to all other Creatures which were made by the Son; of whom the Son hath no resemblance. Wherefore he is no Creature, like to those which were created by him: But he is of a far more excellent substance than any Creature: Which substance, as the Sacred Oracles do instruct us, is begotten of the Father, but by such a manner of Generation as is ineffable and inexpressible by any created Being. Thus also this Proposition, That the Son is of the same substance with the Father, was discuss'd, to wit, that this is not [ to be understood ] according to the manner of Bodies, nor [ in a sense ] agreeable to mortal Creatures. For this [ Consubstantiality ] cannot [ be ] either by Division of the Substance, or by Abscission, or Mutation of the Paternal Essence and Power. For all these things are inconsistent with the uncreated Nature of the Father. But this [ Proposition ] To be of the same substance with the Father, doth expressly

Confutant. expressly represent to us no more than this, viz. that the Son of God hath no community with, or resemblance to, created Beings; but that in every respect he is like to the Father only, who hath begotten him; and that he does exist of no other Substance or Essence, but of the Father. To this [Opinion] therefore thus explained, we thought good to give our assent: More especially, because we also knew that some of the Ancient Learned and Eminent Bishops and Writers, have made use of this term Homoiouſious, in their Explications of the Divinity of the Father and of the Son. Thus much therefore we have said concerning the Creed published [at Nice,] to which we all agreed, not inconsiderately and without examination, but according to the senses given, (k) which were discuss'd in the presence of our most pious Emperor, and for the forementioned reasons, receiv'd with an unanimous consent. More-

Thus wrote Eusebius Pamphilus to Cæsarea in Palestine. Also, by the common consent and approbation of the Council, this following Synodical Epistle was written to the Church of Alexandria, and to the Inhabitants of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis.

CHAPTER IX.

The Epistle of the Synod concerning those Matters determined by it, and how Arius was degraded, together with them that embraced his Sentiments.

TO the Holy (by the Grace of God) and Great Church of the Alexandrians, and to our beloved Brethren the Inhabitants of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; The Bishops assembled at Nice, who fill up that great and holy Synod, send Greeting in the Lord.

For as much as by the Grace of God, and [the Constant Summons] of the most pious Emperor Constantine (who hath called us together out of divers Cities and Provinces,) a great and holy Synod has been convened at Nice, it seemed altogether necessary, that a Letter should be written to you in the name of the sacred Synod; whence you might understand what things were there proposed, and what taken into examination, as also what were decreed and established. First of all therefore, the Impiety and Iniquity of Arius and his Complices was enquired into in the presence of the most pious Emperor Constantine: And the Council's Determination (which was confirmed by the Suffrages of all) was, that his impious Opinions, and execrable Terms and Names should be anathematized; which [Terms and Names]

(a) This Epistle is extant in Theodoret, in Chap. 6, of the first Book of his Eccelesiastical History; but is in some places different from Somner's Edition of it here, nor Theodoret omits the Word [ἁγίου], affirming, together with the following Clause, and joins all this with the preceding period. In Leo Allatius's MS. the word [ἁγίου] is also wanting, and that which follows, to wit, [θεοῦ πατρὸς, calls:] And instead of [ἀμην] the reading there is [τοῦ πατρὸς.] Valey.

(b) strictly [severe] and rigour of the Law he did not (b) 'Axedeferre the least favour' that he should continue in the Law of his City, but have no Jurisdiction, neither to Ordain, (the phrase here) imports the rigour or extremity of the Law: To which temperance, equity, is opposed. The Fathers therefore of the Nizene Confession say, that the Synod dealt with Melitius, not according to the rigour and extremity of the Law, nor according to the exact rule and discipline, but (συνελαβεν αὐτον) by way of dispensation. For in the strict sense of the Law Melitius deserved no kindness or pardon, in regard he challenged Ordinations which in no wise belong to him, and had made a Schism in Egypt. For that is evidently declared by these words of this Epistle, viz. ὅτι ὁ ἀρχιεπίσκοπος ἐκείνους ἐκείνην ἐκκλησίαν, ὅσους ἐὰν ἐκείνην ἔσται [engaged] ἐκείνην ἐκκλησίαν. By reason therefore of his rashness and insolence, Melitius deserved to be deposed and excommunicated. But yet the Holy Fathers had a mind to treat him kindly, depriving him of all power, and leaving him only the name of a Bishop. Now, why Melitius was thus kindly used, many reasons may be alleged. The first (which the Holy Fathers intimate in this Epistle) is, because they had before unfeignedly and made use of their sharpest severity and censure against Arius and his Followers. Now it was but equal, that after so sad and heavy a sentence pronounced against them, there should be a place afterwards left for clemency; especially, since Melitius had been convicted of no Hereby, but was only accused to have made a Schism. Secondly, there were many persons amongst the Melitians, that were good Men, and eminent for their pious Lives. Of which sort was Papubius the V Anchorite.

Anchoret, and John the Bishop; whom Epiphanius mentions, in Hæres. Melitian. Lastly, they did thus to promote Peace, whereby the members of the Church, which before had benrent in Sunder, might cement and unite: Therefore the Nicene Fathers receiv'd the Melitians into communion. And this is a most illustrious Example of Ecclesiastick Dispensation. Valef.

Constant.

or to * propose the Names of those that were to be Ordained, or to appear in any Village, or City upon this pretence: But that he should barely enjoy his appellation and Title only. And as for (c) those that had been Ordained by him to any Function, being confirmed by a (d) more sacred Ordination, they should afterwards be admitted into Communion, and upon this condition they may continue possessors of their Performer and Function, but yet they are to acknowledge themselves always inferior to all those that had been approved of in every Diocess and Church, who had been (e) Ordained before by our dearest Colleague in the sacred Function, Alexander. So that besides, they shall have no Power (f) to propose, or nominate whom they please; or to act in any thing at all without the Knowledge and Consent of some Catholic (g) Bishop, who is one of Alexander's Suffragans. But those that by the Grace of God and your Prayers have not been found [engaged] in any Schism, but have continued in the Catholic Church blameless; let such have Power to nominate and elect those that are worthy of the sacred Function, and act in all things according to the established Law and Sanctions of the Church. Epiphanius attests. Yes, he had ordain'd far more Bishops, than Presbyters; as may be collected, from that Catalogue, which Alexander (tis said) requir'd of him, after the Nicene Synod. Wherein are reckon'd twenty eight Bishops of Melitian's Party; but five Presbyters, and three Deacons. This Catalogue is extant in Athanasius's Second Apology against the Arians. Since therefore Melitian had Ordained so many Bishops, if the Nicene Fathers had made no Determination concerning the Bishops by him Ordain'd, their sentence had been impeded; in regard they would have Decreed, what should be done with the Presbyters made by Melitian, but would have made no mention of the Bishops. Wherefore I think these Words must be taken in such a Sense, as to include both Bishops, and also Presbyters. Valef.

(d) In the first place the Synod Decreed, that the Bishops and Clergy, which had been Ordain'd by Melitian, should be confirm'd by a more Holy Consecration, that is, should receive imposition of hands from the Bishop of Alexandria. For, in regard they had been Ordain'd without his consent, it was the pleasure of the Synod, that they should be Ordained by the Alexandrian Bishop, according to the ancient usage, by which it was customary, that all the Bishops of the Diocess of Egypt should be Subject to the Prelate of Alexandria. But the Synod requir'd not the Re-ordination of Melitian, because he had been rightly Ordained before. Valef.

(e) Instead of προσέχουσιν it should rather be προσέχουσιν, ordain'd before, as it is in Theodoret, book i. chap. 6. Εκδ' Βισβ'. For προσέχουσιν signifies another thing, as what I have here attested. (See the following Note.) Σεγμεν (in his first book chap. 24. where he epitomizes this Epistle) supposed these Words were meant of the Clergy, not of the Bishop. Valef.

(f) In our Annotations on the third Book of Eusebius concerning the Life of Constantine, we remark'd, that προσέχουσιν, signifies to propose the Names of such Persons as are to be ordained. So the Synod Decreed above concerning Melitian, οὗτοι προσέχουσιν πρὸς μετάνοιαν, that he should neither ordain, nor propose the Names of those that were to be ordained. In the same sense Nicetas us'd this term, in his Life of Ignatius Patriarch of Constantinople, where he mentions his Election: his Words are these, τοιαύτῃ τολαίᾳ ἐν πνεύματι The manner was προσέχουσιν, &c. where therefore the names of many Persons must be propos'd in presence of the Church, &c. Therefore the following Words [in ἐκδομένην ὁμολογίαν, or to nominate] are only an explication of the foregoing term. In the same Sense Σεγμεν took this word, in his forecited 24th chap. Moreover, we must note, that Melitian was more severely dealt with, (as being the Author of a Schism,) than the Melitians. For the Nicene Fathers depriv'd Melitian of all Episcopal Jurisdiction, and left him only the name of a Bishop. But they permitted the Melitians to exercise their Functions in the Church. That is, that the Deacons should Minister in the Order of Deacons, and that the Presbyters should Consecrate and Baptize, as should also the Bishops. They only took from them their Power of Voting in Elections: Which was prudently done of the Nicene Fathers, lest the Melitians should clandestinely promote some Men of their own Party to the Ecclesiastick preferments. Valef.

(g) It should rather be ἐπὶ Θεοκρίτω, Bishop, as it is in Theodoret, and in the Acta. M. S. Valef.

And if it shall happen, that some of those who now hold Ecclesiastick preferments, die, then let those that are newly admitted and receiv'd [into the Church] be preferred to the Dignities of the deceased, (b) provided that they shall appear worthy, and that the People shall freely elect them, provided also that the Bishop of Alexandria doth by his Suffrage ratify and confirm [the Peoples Election.] This same Privilege is also granted to all. But concerning Melitian in particular, We otherwise Decreed, that (because of his former irregularity, rashness, and giddiness of disposition,) no Jurisdiction or Authority shall be allowed him, he being a Man able to revive the same disturbances that were before. These things are such as most especially and particularly relate to Egypt, and [concern] the most holy Church of Alexandria. But if there shall be any other Canon or Decree made, being our Lord, and our most Reverend Fellow Minister and Brother Alexander is present, he at his arrival will give you a more particular Account, in regard he is the Author of, and conscious to, what ever is done. We also send you the good News concerning the unanimous consent of all, in reference to the celebration of the most solemn Feast of Easter; for this difference also hath been made up by the assistance of your Prayers; so that all the Brethren in the East, who formerly celebrated this Festival at the same time the Jews did, will in future conform to the Romans and to us, and to all who have of old observed our manner of celebrating Easter. Do you therefore (rejoicing at the good success of Affairs, and at the unanimous Peace and Concord [amongst all Men], and also because all Heresie is wholly extirpated,) with a greater honour, and more ardent love receive our Fellow-Minister (but your Bishop) Alexander, whose presence here hath greatly rejoic'd us, and who in this his infirm Age hath endured so great labours, that Peace might be restor'd amongst you. Pray for us all, that those good Determinations which are made, may remain firm and inviolable, through Almighty GOD, and our Lord Jesus Christ, together with the Holy Ghost; to whom be Glory for ever, Amen.

Pray for us all, that those good Determinations which are made, may remain firm and inviolable, through Almighty GOD, and our Lord Jesus Christ, together with the Holy Ghost; to whom be Glory for ever, Amen.

In this Synodical Epistle 'tis apparent, that the Nicene Fathers did not only anathematize Arius and his followers, but the very Terms of his Opinion also: And that (in regard they had amongst themselves agreed concerning the celebration of Easter,) they receiv'd into Communion (i) the Arch-Heretic Melitian, allowing him indeed the liberty of retaining the Dignity of a Bishop; but they deprived him of the Power of doing any thing as a Bishop. And upon this Account I suppose it is, that the Melitians in Egypt are to this Day separated from the Church, because the Synod took away all [Episcopal] Power from Melitian. Moreover, nor Athanasius (in his 2<sup>d</sup> Apology) nor Epiphanius, accuse Melitian of any Heresie; they only affirm, he was the Author of a Schism. But when the Melitians had afterwards joyed themselves to the Arians (which, as I remark'd before, happen'd after the Nicene Synod, and Melitian's death,) they turned their Schism into an Heresie, as Augustine writes concerning the Donatists. In this sense therefore Melitian may be termed an Arch-Heretic. Valef.

Constant. You must know, that Arius wrote a Book concerning his own Opinion, which he entitled Thalia. The Style of the Book [and the Doctrine contain'd in it] was loose and dissolute, much resembling the Songs (k) or Verses of Sotades. This Piece of his also the Synod did at the same time condemn. Nor was the Synod only solicitous about writing Letters concerning the Peace restored [to the Church:] but the Emperor Constantine also [signified the same] by his own Letters, who wrote to the Church of Alexandria as followeth.

The Emperor's Letter.

Constantinus Augustus, to the Catholick Church of Alexandria. God Save You, beloved Brethren. We have received the greatest Blessing from the Divine Providence, that being released from all Error, We can now embrace and profess one and the same Faith. The Devil hath no longer a Dominion over us: For all the Machinations he design'd against Us are now totally destroy'd. The bright lustre of Truth has (according to the Commandment of God) defeated those Dissentions, those Schisms, those Tumults, and (if I may so term them) those fatal Poisons of Discord. We therefore do all adore one God in name, and We believe that He is. Moreover, that this might be effected, by the Admonition of God, We convened a great many Bishops at the City of Nice: Together with whom We Our selves, one of Your number, who rejoice exceedingly in that We are Your Fellow-servant, undertook the Disquisition of the Truth. We did therefore enquire into and accurately discuss all things, which seem'd to yield the least occasion of Ambiguity or Dissention. And (may the Divine Majesty pardon us!) how great and horrid Blasphe- mies were some indecently utter'd concerning Our Great Saviour, concerning Our Hope and Life, speaking and openly professing that they believe things contrary to the divinely inspired Scriptures, and to the sacred Faith? Whenas therefore three hundred Bishops and upwards, admirable both for their Moderation and Acuteness of Understanding, had unanimously confirm'd one and the same Faith, (which, according to the Verity and accurate Disquisition of the Divine Law, can only be the Faith) Arius, vanquish'd by a Diabolical force, was found to be the only person, who with an impious Mind disseminated this Mischief, first amongst You, and afterwards amongst others. Let Us therefore embrace that Opinion, which Almighty God hath deliver'd. Let Us return to Our beloved Brethren, from whom this impudent Servant of the Devil hath separated Us. Let Us with all diligence imaginable listen to the common Body, and to Our own natural Members. For this doth well become Your Prudence, Faith, and Sanctity, that since his Error (who has been evidently proved to be an Enemy of the Truth) is confuted, You should return to the Divine Grace. For that which was approved of by three hundred Bishops, can be [judg'd] nothing else but the Determination of God; especially, since the Holy Ghost, residing in the Minds of such Great and Worthy Personages, hath disclosed to them the Will of God. Wherefore let none of You continue dubious, let none of

You make delays: But do You all with great Alacrity return to the right way: That when We come to You, which shall be as soon as possible, We may together with You return due thanks to God, who inspects all things, because, having revealed the pure Faith, He hath restored You that mutual Love which was the Subject of all Men's Prayers. God preserve You, beloved Brethren.

Thus wrote the Emperor to the People of Alexandria, demonstrating to them that the determination of the Faith was not imprudently, or unadvisedly made; but that it was dictated with a great deal of disquisition and diligent examination: Nor [does he say] that some things were spoken [in that Council,] and others pass'd over in silence: But that all that was fitting to be said in confirmation of the Opinion, was produc'd and urg'd; and that the Controversie was not inconsiderately determin'd, but was with great Accuracy first discuss'd. Inasmuch that, all things whatever, which seem'd to produce Matter of Ambiguity or Dissention, were wholly remov'd and destroy'd. In short, he terms the Determination of all those there assembled, the Will of God, and does confidently aver that the unanimity of so many and such eminent Prelates was procur'd by the Holy Ghost. But Sabinius, the Ring-leader of the Macedonian Heresie, does wittingly and on set purpose oppose their [Authorities] and files the Fathers there assembled, Idiots and Men of no knowledge; and he does in all appearance asperse even Eusebius Cæsariensis with [the imputation of] ignorance: But he does not in the least consider with himself, that, although those conven'd in that Synod were Idiots, yet in regard they were illuminated by God, and the Grace of the Holy Ghost, they could in no wise err from the Truth. But let us hear, what the Emperor, by another Letter which he sent to all the Bishops every where, and to the People, decreed against Arius and those that embraced his Opinion.

Another Letter of Constantine's.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS
to the Bishops and People.

(1) In as much as Arius has followed the Practices (1) This of wicked and profane Persons, 'tis but just that Epistle of be should undergo the same ignominy with them. Therefore, as Porphyrius, that Enemy of true Emperor, Piety, found a just recompence for composing impious Volumes against Religion, and such a recompence as has rendered him ignominious to Posterity; our Autocrat bled him with infamy and many reproaches, should rather be plac'd there. So it also now seems reasonable to term Arius and those that embrace his Opinion Porphyrians, that they may derive their denomination from him, whose Morals they have so exactly imitated. Moreover, if any Book written by Arius's Letter shall be found extant, We do hereby order, that it be immediately burnt: That by this means not only his wicked Doctrine may be wholly destroy'd, but the next also that there might not be left to Posterity the Chapter. For certainly those Letters which concern the Council of Nice should regularly be plac'd first. But this Letter does not concern that Council, nor does it in the least mention the Council. Athanasius in his Epistle ad Solitarii, alludes to this Letter of Constantine's, where he speaks thus concerning the Emperor, ὁ δὲ τὰς Ἀριανῶν ἐκείνων ἀποκαταστάς ὁμολογῶν, τὴν ἐκείνῃ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐπὶ τῇ ἐκείνῃ συνόδῳ (i. e.) Why does he (to wit, Constantine) endeavour to reduce the Arian into the Church, whom he himself calls Porphyrians? Valef.

Constant. least monument of him. This also we declare, that if any Person shall be found to have concealed a Book compiled by Arius, and shall not immediately produce the said Book and burn it, his punishment shall be death. For immediately upon his being found guilty of this Fact, he shall undergo a capital Punishment. God preserve you.

Another Letter.

Constantinus Augustus, to the Churches.

Having sufficiently experienced, by the flourishing posture of the Publick Affairs, how great the benignity of the Divine Power has been towards us; We judged it our chiefest concern and aim [to labour] for the Preservation of one Faith, a sincere Charity, and one universally acknowledged Religion towards Almighty God amongst the most blessed Congregations of the Catholick Church. But since this could not be otherwise firmly constituted and established, unless all, or at least the greatest part of the Bishops were convened in one place, and every particular that concerns the most sacred Religion were by them first discussed: Upon this Account, when as many of the Clergy, as could possibly be got together, were assembled, and we also, as one of you, were present with them (for we will not deny, what we account our greatest Glory, that we are your Fellow-servant) all things were sufficiently discussed so long, until a determination acceptable to God the Inspector of all things, was publish'd in order to an universal agreement and union: So that there is now no place left for Dissention, or controversy about [matters] of Faith. Where also, after a Disquisition made concerning the most Holy Day of Easter, it was by a general consent concluded to be the best course, for all Men in all places to celebrate that Festival upon one and the same Day. For what can be more comely and commendable, or what more grave and decent, than that this Festival, from which we have received the hopes of Immortality, should be unerringly kept by all Men in one and the same order, and in a manner apparently and expressly agreeable? And in the first place, all Men look upon it as an unworthy thing, and misbecoming the dignity of that most sacred Festival, to follow the Jewish usage in the Celebration thereof. For the Jews, Persons who have defiled themselves with a most abominable Sin, are deservedly impure and blind as to their understandings. Having therefore rejected their usage, we may by a more certain and infallible order propagate that Day to future Ages for the completion of this Solemnity, which we have kept from the first Day of the Passion even to this present time. Let us then have nothing in common with that most hostile multitude of the Jews. We have received another way from Our Saviour. For there is proposed to us a lawful and decent leading to our most Sacred Religion. Let us therefore (dearest Brethren) with one accord constantly persist in this course, and * withdraw our selves from that

* In book 3, chap. 18, of Eusebius's Life of Constantine where (we have this Epistle of the Emperor,) the reading is [τὴν αἰρετικὴν συνάχην] which Valefius at that place, and here, renders thus [ab illa turpissima societate & conscientia,] from that most abominable society and their consciences. Upon this his Version, he gives this reason: They who celebrate Easter with the Jews, seem to be conscious of that wickedness which they committed against our Lord. See his Annals, at the book and chapter now cited.

But of what are they able to pass a right judgment, who after that parricide of theirs, the murderer of our Lord, were struck with madness, and are led, not by the conduct of reason, but by an ungovernable * impetus, whithersoever their insatiable rage shall drive them? Hence therefore it is that even in this particular they discern not the Truth,

(m) but always wandring at the greatest distance from a decent and agreeable amendment, they celebrate Easter twice within the space of one and the same Year. What reason have we therefore to follow these Men, who, it is acknowledged, are disempowered with an abominable Error? We must never endure the keeping of two Easters in one Year. But although what we have said were not sufficient, yet nevertheless, it behoves your Prudence to make it your greatest care, and the matter of your constant Prayers, that the purity of your Souls, and in the likeness of any thing seem to be joined or mix'd with the usages of most wicked men. Besides, this is to be considered, that it is a most impious thing, that there should be any disagreement in a matter of so great concern, and in such a solemnity of Religion. For Our Saviour left us but one Day [to be celebrated in commemoration] of our Redemption, That is the Day of his most sacred Passion: And he also desired that his Catholick Church should be one. The members of which Church (although they are much dispersed in divers places, yet nevertheless) are cherished by one Spirit, that is, by the Will of God. Let the Prudence of your Sanctity consider, how grievous and undecent a thing it is, that on the self same day some should keep strict Fasts, and others celebrate Feasts: And that on the Days after Easter, some should be conversant in Feasting and a vacanciness from labours, and others devote themselves to set Fasts. Wherefore it pleased Divine Providence that these things should be seasonably redressed, and reduced to one and the same Form, as we suppose you are all sensible. Since therefore it was expedient to make such an emendation in this point, as that we might not seem to hold the least Communion with those Parricides, and Murderers of Our Lord, the Jews: And since this is the most decent and becoming Order, which all the Churches of the Western, Southern and Northern parts of the World, and also some in the Eastern Parts do observe: For these Reasons all Persons have at present judged it good and expedient; (and we our selves also promised that it would not be ungrateful to your Wisdom,) that that which with such an universal unanimity is observed in the City of Rome, and all over Italy and Africa, throughout

(m) Instead of [αἰρετικὴν] in the Florent. and Sforzian MSS. the reading is [αἰρετικὴν] which reading Theodoret confirms. In book 3, chap. 18, of Eusebius's Life of Constantine, it is [αἰρετικὴν] whereas the Jewish Paschal Newmoon (or new Moon) began from the fifth Day of March, and was concluded at the third of April, hence it sometimes happened, that their Passover began before the Æquinox. So that they celebrated two Passovers in one Year, (supposing you mean the Solar and Julian Year) that is, accounting from the Vernal Æquinox of this year, to the Vernal Æquinox of the year following. Ambrosius asserts the same in his Epistle to the Bishops of Emilia, where he remarks, that the Jews sometimes celebrated their Passover in the twelfth month, that is according to the Latin, and Eastern men. For the Jews never kept their Passover on their own twelfth month, but on the fourteenth day of their first month. Moreover, this celebrating of their Passover twice in one year, which Constantine objects against the Jews, seems to me not at all momentous. For the Jews might have returned the objection upon the Christians, to wit, that they celebrated Easter twice in the same year. For, suppose Easter is this year kept on the tenth of the Calendar of May; (that is, on the 22d of April) next year it will necessarily be kept sooner. And so there will occur two Passovers amongst the Christians within the space of one year current. But this will not happen, if you reckon the year from the Æquinoctial Cardo to the Vernal Æquinox of the Year following. See Epiphanius, pag. 824. Edit. Peten. and Feaui. Antiquitates, pag. 294, 295. See also Ægilius Baderius de Paschali Judentorum Cujus, chap. 3.

Constant. all Egypt, Spain, France, Britain, Libya; or ver all Greece, and the Provinces of Asia and Pontus, and throughout Cilicia, would also be most willingly received and embraced by You. Let this also be seriously considered, that not only the number of the Churches in the forementioned places is far the greater; but also that it is most just and equal that all Men's Wills should universally concur in that which strict Reason seems to require, and which has no Communion with the Perjury of the Jews. But, that We may speak more summarily and briefly, it was by a general consent agreed that the most sacred Festival of Easter should be solemnized upon one and the same day. For it is undecent that there should be any discrepancy in so great and holy a Solemnity: And it is far better to adhere to that Opinion, in which there is no mixture of strange and absurd Error and Impiety.
 Since therefore these things are thus ordered, do You with joy receive this celestial and truly divine Commandment. For whatsoever is transacted [and determined] in the sacred Assemblies of the Bishops, must be attributed to the Divine Will. Wherefore, when You have imparted to all Our beloved Brethren what has been prescribed, it is Your duty to embrace, and establish the forementioned Rule and Observation of the most Holy Day: That when We shall come into the presence of Your Love (which We were long since desirous of,) We may celebrate the sacred Festival with You, on one and the same day: And that We may rejoice together with You for all things, beholding the cruelty of the Devil totally removed by the Divine Power and Our Endeavours; whilst Your Faith, Peace, and Concord does every where flourish.
 God preserve You, beloved Brethren.

(n) Another Letter to Eusebius.

(n) This Letter of the Emperor to Eusebius, and also the two next, are misplaced. For they have no Relation to the Council of Nice; neither do they make the least mention of Arius or the Arians. Yea, the first of Constantine's Letters to Eusebius was written before the Council of Nice, as Eusebius himself testifies, in his 2d Book of Constantine's Life, Chap. 45. Valf.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS,
 MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to
 Eusebius.

We really believe and are absolutely persuaded (Dear Brother) that, in regard an impious Desire and tyrannick Violence hath persecuted the Servants of God our Saviour even to this present time, the Edifices of all Churches, have either by neglect gone to ruin, or through fear of the imminent dangerousness [of the Times] have been adorn'd with less of stateliness. But now, since Liberty is restored, and that Serpent, (o) that Persecutor Li-cinius, is by Almighty God's Providence and Our instrumental Endeavours forced out of the Administration of publick Affairs, We suppose that the Divine Power hath been sufficiently manifested to all Men: And that all who either through fear or unbelief have fallen into any Sin, (p) having now acknowledged the only true God, will in future return to the true and right course of life. Do You therefore remind as well all [persons belonging to]

(o) We meet with this Letter of the Emperor's to Eusebius at Book 2. Chap. 46. of Eusebius's Life of Constantine; where these three words [that Persecutor Licinius] are wanting; being added here, in stead of a Scholion by Socrates, or some other Scholiast. He terms Licinius a Serpent, by reason of his craftiness, and age. Hence we may conjecture, that this Letter was written soon after Licinius's deposition. See Valesius's Notes on Book 2. Chap. 46. of Eusebius's Life of Constantine.

(p) Here we made choice of this reading [ἐμμενέας ἡμῶν, &c.] being now acknowledged, &c. By the term [fear] in the foregoing clause he means the Christians, who through fear of persecution had neglected the Churches, or renounced the Faith. The term [Unbelief] belongs to the Heathens, who had demolished the Churches, and divers ways vexed the Christians. See Valesius's notes, at the Book and Chapter before-cited.

the Churches over which You preside, as also all Constant. other Bishops presiding in other places, together with the Presbyters and Deacons, whom You know, that they use their utmost diligence about the Structures of the Churches; either about repairing those that are still standing, or about enlarging others, or in building new ones, wheresoever it shall be found requisite. And You your self, and the rest by Your mediation may ask Necessaries [for that Work] both from Our Presidents of the Provinces, and also from the (p) Office of the Prætorian Prefecture. For they are already empowered by Our Rescripts to the term be diligently observant about all Your Holiness's Or- ders. God preserve You, Beloved Brother.

Thus wrote the Emperor to the Bishops throughout every particular Province, concerning the Building of the Churches: But what he wrote to Eusebius of Palestine about provid- ing [some Copies of] the sacred Scriptures, we may easily collect from these his Works.

Soldiers waiting on the Judges. The æges are the Prefects of the Prætori- um; so termed, because they were ægis ἀσπίδος, over the Prefects and Rectors of Provinces. There were πρωτοὶ ἀρχιε (the Phræse here used) imports the Office of the Prætorian Prefecture, concerning which consult the Notitia Imperii Romani. Further, the Office (or the Offices) of the Prefect of the Prætorium was more honourable than the Offices of all the other Magistrates. To, as the Præfatus of the Prætorium excelled all the other Judges, as well Military, as Civ. In Dignity; so his Officials or Attendants, were look'd upon to be more honourable than the other Officials. Hence, in the Chalcedon Council, Actum 3, the Office of the Prefects of the Prætorium is called ἀρχιε πρωτοὶ. See Valesius's Notes, at the before-cited Book and Chapter.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS
 Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea.

By the assistance of God our Saviour's Providence, so great a multitude of Men have joined themselves * He to the most holy Church in that City which bears, mentions the our * Name; that [Christianity seems] to have Constanti- made its greatest progress and increase there, nope.

(r) It seems therefore very requisite that there should be more Churches erected in that City. Wherefore do You with the greatest alacrity admit of what We have decreed. We thought fit to signify this to Your Prudence, that You should order fifty (s) Con- Copies of the sacred Scriptures (the Provision and Use whereof You know to be most necessary for the instru- tion of the Church,) to be written on well prepared Parchment by artificial Transcribers of Books, most skilful in the Art of accurate and fair Writing; which [Copies] must be very legible, and easily portable, in order to their being used. Moreover Letters are on Euse- dispatched away from Our Clemency to the (s) Rabi- bialist of the Diocesis to take care for provision of [Diocesi] all things necessary towards the preparing of the said Copies. Let it therefore be the employment of Diocesi of Your Care to see that the foresaid Copies be provided the East, as soon as may be. You are also empower'd by this The old Our Letter to make use of two publick Carriages Romans for their conveyance. For by this means those which are fairest transcribed may be easiest convey'd even number to Our sight, to wit, if one of the Deacons of your Churches be employ'd in the Performances hereof: Who, when he comes to Us, shall experience Our Libera- lity. God preserve You, Dear Brother.

(r) In Eusebius's Life of Constantine, Book 4. Chap. 36. (where this Letter occurs) this place is far otherwise read and varied, than it is here; so also it is in Theodoret, Book 1. Chap. 16. Valf.

(s) Concerning the Rationalist and his Office, we have spoken before, in our Notes on Eusebius's Life of Constantine. By the (s) Rabi- bialist of the Diocesis to take care for provision of [Diocesi] all things necessary towards the preparing of the said Copies. Let it therefore be the employment of Diocesi of Your Care to see that the foresaid Copies be provided the East, as soon as may be. You are also empower'd by this The old Our Letter to make use of two publick Carriages Romans for their conveyance. For by this means those which are fairest transcribed may be easiest convey'd even number to Our sight, to wit, if one of the Deacons of your Churches be employ'd in the Performances hereof: Who, when he comes to Us, shall experience Our Libera- lity. God preserve You, Dear Brother.

under a Deputy of the Prætorian Prefecture by this name [Diocesi]. For the Prefect of the Prætorium had under his jurisdiction many Diocesi; but the Deputy had each but one Diocesi. This term began to be used in this sense about Constantine's time, as appears from his Letters, and from some Laws in the Col. Theod. See Valesius's Annotations on Eusebius's Life of Constant. B. 4. Chap. 36.

Constant.

Another Letter to Macarini.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS,
MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Macarini Bishop of Jerusalem.

* He means our Blessed Saviour's Sepulchre, not the Earth, because he conceal'd for so many

So great is our Saviour's Love and Favour, that no Rhetoric seems sufficient to set forth a Declaration of the present Miracle. For, that the * Monu- ment of his most holy Passion, long since hid under- neath the Earth, should be conceal'd for so many

(1) Constantine here terms Li- cinius the public Enemy, after whose Destruction, he says, the sacred Sepulchre of our Lord, which had been before concealed, was discover'd. Licinius was slain in the Year of Christ 326, as 'tis record'd in Hist. Lat. and on that very Year, when Helena came to Jerusalem, the Sepulchre of our Lord was found. By the name of the public Enemy, the Devil might here be meant, were not this contradicted by the Expressi- ons here used. For the Devil was not then vanquish'd and overcome, when the Sepulchre of our Lord was cleared from the Rubbish that cover'd it. Besides, the Term [adversus, Slaughter] is more expressive, being meant of Licinius, than of the Devil. See Valerius's Notes on Eusebius's Life of Constantine, Book 3, Chap. 30.

this is always our chief and truest Authority, as the truth doth daily demonstrate it self by new Miracles, so the Minds of us all should with all Modesty and unanimous Alacrity become more careful and diligent about an Observation of the Divine Law. Which in regard we judge to be manifestly apparent to all Men, our Desire is you should most especially be persuaded of this, that it is altogether our chiefest Care, that that sacred Place (which by God's Command we have unburthen'd of that most detestable (u) ac- cession of the Idol, as it were of a ponderous and heavy weight; which [Place] was by God's Determination made holy from the Beginning, but was afterwards demonstrated to be more holy, out of which he hath brought to light the Certainty of our Saviour's Passion) should be beautified and adorn'd with magnificent and stately structures. Wherefore it does well be- come your Prudence so to order the matter, and to make such a Provision of Materials necessary for this Work, that not only the Temple it self may in state- liness excel all others in what place soever, but also that the other parts of it be made such, as that all the beautifullest Structures in every City, may be ac- knowledge'd far inferior to this Fabric. And as concerning the Workmanship and exquisite Beauty of the Walls, we would have you know that we have committed the Care thereof to our Friend & Dra- cilianus, Deputy to the most excellent the Prefects of the Prætorium, and to the President of the Province.

+ There are two Laws made by

Constantine, extant in the Cod. Theod. (the one in Tit. de usuris, the o- ther in Tit. de hereditatibus), written to this Draclianus. The former of these Laws bears this Inscription, Imp. Constantinus Aug. ad Draclia- num agentem vices Prætorianæ præ. that is, Emperor Constantinus Augustus to Draclianus Deputy to the Prefects of the Prætorium. This Law was publish'd at Cæsarea in Palestine on the 15th of the Calends of May, when Paulinus and Julianus were Consuls. The other is said to have been publish'd on the Calends of September, Constantinus Augustus being the seventh time, and Constantinus Cæsar Coss. that is, in the Year of Christ 326. In which Year Constantine wrote this Epistle to Macarini, Bishop of Jerusalem. Further, we must remark, that the Prefects of the Prætorium are here stile'd clarissimi, most excellent. For as yet they had not received the Title of Most Illustrious. Moreover, in other of Constantine's Laws, the Prefects of the Prætorium are stile'd Most Excellent. Now, as the Prefects of the Prætorium were in Con- stantine's times allow'd only the Title of the Most Excellent, so the Deputies of the Prætorian Præfecture had in the said Constantine's time only the Title of Most Perfect given them, as the Epistle to Probianus Procurator of Africa, shews, which we meet with in Athanasius's Apo- logy to Constantinus, p. 794. See Valerius's Notes on Book 3, Chap. 31, of Eusebius's Life of Constantine.

For our Piety has taken order, that Artificers and Consti- tution, and whatever else they may be inform'd from your Prudence to be necessary for the Structure, shall by their Care be forthwith sent. But concerning the Pillars or Marbles, & whatever you your self on sight of the

shall judge to be more rich and useful, ) make it your Business to inform us by writing: that when we shall under- stand from your Letter, how many, and what manner of Materials you stand in need of, they may be convey'd to you from all Parts. For it is but reasonable that that most admirable place of the whole World should be beautified ac- cording to its Dignity and Worth. We desire to know of you, whether you think good to have the inner Roof of the Church, (y) arched, or made of any other sort of Work. For if it be arched, it may also be gild'd with Gold. It remains therefore, that your Holiness inform as soon as may be the foremention'd Judges, how many Work- men, and Artificers, and what Money for Expences you shall want. And as you care- fully to return Us a speedy Ac- count, not only concerning the Marbles, and Pillars, but also concerning the arched Roof (if you shall judge that to be the more beautiful Work.) Dearest Brother, God preserve you. The Emperor wrote several other E- pistles in a more florid Style like Orations, against Arius, and those that embraced his Opinion, and caus'd them to be (z) publish'd in every City; in (3) Inferi- or [inferius]

He added] the Reading must necessarily be [inferius], as published. For the Roman Emperors did usually propose to publish view those Rescripts they wrote to the Cities. Therefore, at the Close of the Rescript they added this Note [Proposuit, ut ille publicetur]: as we have observ'd in our Notes on Eusebius. So Constantine, when he had wrote many Letters against Arius and his Follow- ers, commanded they should be propos'd to publish view in the fir- st. Of this sort was Constantine's Epistle to Arius and the Ariens, Synod Nicene; which Epistle Epiphanius mentions in Hæres. Ariens. It was written by Constantine after the Nicene Synod, and it contains the Punishment of those that would not recede from Arius's wicked Te- nets. For at the Close of that Epistle, the Emperor commands, that if Heads, besides their own I-oll-Money, they shall pay tribute for the Curiales, (or Noble Men) they shall be deliver'd to the Court, and made liable to bear the publick Offices of the Decurians. This Letter therefore was like an Ed-ict, and so ought to be publickly read and promulg'd. Valer.

(x) At this place the Term [εὐρύτης] signifies the Model or Delimitation of the Fabric that was to be erected. It is taken in the same Sense, in the Epistle of Himerius Rhetorist of Alexandria to the Prefect of Maroneis; which Athanasius has recorded in his ap- plog. p. 303. For after he had said, that Augustus and the Cæ- sars had permitted Augustus to build a Church in his Town, he orders the Governor of that Town, that he should forthwith draw a Model of the future Build- ing, and transmit it to his office; [εὐρύτης] (says he) ταύτης τῆς ἐκκλησίας κατασκευῆς, οὗ τὴν οὐρανὸν ἀνεύθυνεν. See Valerius's Notes, at the Book and Chapter before cited.

(y) The inner Roofs of Church- es were commonly fram'd two ways. For they were either beau- ty'd with arched or embow'd Roofs, or else painted with dis- tinct Work. Concerning the arched (or embow'd) Roofs, this place (of Constantine's Letter is an Evi- dence. Procopius evidences the Use of the Mosaic-work, in his first Book De Fabricis Justinian, where he describes the Temple of Sancta Sophia. Now the arched Roofs were usually adorn'd two ways. For they were either gild- ed with Gold, or painted; which latter way was first invented by Pausanias, as Pline attests, Book 35, Chap. 11. Hist. Natural. See Valerius's Notes, at the Book and Chapter before cited.

Constant. which Epistles he represents [Arius] to be an infamous Person, and rebukes him sharply in an Ironical manner. Moreover, he wrote to the (a) Nicomedian, against Eusebius and Theognis: wherein he severely reprehends Eusebius's wickedness, not only for his Arianism, but also because, having formerly been a Favourer of the Tyrants, Parcy, he had been a Traitor against [him and] his Affairs. He therefore advises them to elect another Bishop in his stead. But I thought it superfluous to insert his Letters concerning these Matters here, because they are long. They that are desirous [to inspect them] may easily find them out, and read them over. Thus much concerning these things.

Year of Christ 329; as Justinian the Emperor sent it to Pope Vigilius. Valef.

CHAP. X.

That the Emperour summoned to the Synod Acecius also, a Bishop of the Novatian Heresy.

(a) Sozomen relates the same story in his first Book, chap. 22. but in such a manner, that 'tis sufficiently apparent, he had it out of Socrates's History. For Socrates tells the whole Story more fully and elegantly. And after he has told it, says he had it from a credible Person, who lived in the times of the Nicene Council. But Sozomen begins this Relation thus, ἀνέγραψε δὲ ἡ βασιλεῖα, &c. It's reported that the Emperour, &c. Nor does he confirm it by any Persons Authority. Besides, Sozomen has in a manner stole the very words of Socrates, making some little alterations and interpolations, as Plagiaries usually do. But this Story seems to me very improbable upon many accounts. First, because it is founded on the Authority of no ancient Writer. Secondly, neither Socrates nor Sozomen, do say, of what City Acecius was Bishop, which was very necessary to confirm the Story. Thirdly, it is not at all likely, that an heretical Bishop should be summoned by Constantine to an Ecclesiastick Synod. For if Constantine had sent for Acecius in order to the restoring of Peace and Agreement to the Church, upon the same account he ought to have summoned the Bishops of other Heresies also to the Nicene Council. Lastly, what Socrates says, to wit, that he had this story from a very old man who was at the Synod, seems to me altogether incredible. This person's name was Auxano, a Novatian Presbyter, who was at the Synod with Acecius, and lived until the Reign of Theodosius Junior, as Socrates says, Chap. 13. of this Book. Now from the Nicene Synod to the beginning of Theodosius's Reign, there are 83 Years. To which if you add 20 (for so old Auxano must needs be when he was present at the Council) Auxano must necessarily be above an hundred years old, when he told Socrates this Story. Let the Reader judge therefore, at what rate the Testimony of a decrepid old Heretick is to be valued.

of Remission from the Priests, but from God, who only is able; and has Power to forgive Sins. When Acecius had spoken thus, the Emperour replied, O Acecius, set a Ladder, and do you alone climb up to Heaven. This Story neither Eusebius Pamphilus, nor any other Author has mention'd. But I had it from a Person that was in no wife a Liar, one who was very aged, and related what he had seen transacted in the Council. Whence I conjecture, that the same Accident befell those who have omitted the Mention hereof, which happens to many other Writers of History. For they usually pass over many things, either because they are ill affected towards some, or have a Desire to gratifie others. Thus much concerning Acecius.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning Paphnutius the Bishop.

NOW because we have promised before, to make mention of Paphnutius and Spyridon, it will be seasonable to speak of them here. Paphnutius therefore was Bishop of one of the Cities in the upper Thebais; he was a Person so pious, that wonderful Miracles were wrought by him. In the time of the Persecution, one of his Eyes had been cut out: The Emperour had an high Esteem for the Man, and frequently sent for him to the Pallace, and kissed [the place of] that Eye which had been dug out. So great a Piety and Reverence was there in the Emperour Constantine. Let this therefore be one thing said by us concerning Paphnutius. This other (which was done by his Advice for the Utility and Advantage of the Church, and the Grace and Ornament of the Clergy,) I will now relate. The Bishops had a Design to introduce a new Law into the Church, to wit, That those who were in holy Orders, I mean the Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons, (a) should abstain from lying with those Wives which they had married during the time they were Laicks. And when a Proposition was made to consult hereof, Paphnutius (b) rose up in the midst of the Assembly of Bishops, and cried out with a great deal of Earnestness, that such an heavy Yoke ought not to be imposed upon those Persons that were in sacred Orders, saying, That Marriage was honourable; and the Bed undefiled; [so that they ought to be careful] lest they should rather incommode the Church, by their over-much Severity. For all Men [said he] cannot bear the Practice of so strict and severe a Continence, nor is it likely that the Chastity of every one of their Wives should be preserved. (The Husband's keeping Company with his lawful Wife he termed Chastity.) It was sufficient [said he:] that they who had entered themselves into the Function of the Clergy before they were married, should afterwards (according to the ancient Tradition of the Church) abstain from entering into a State of Matrimony: But that no Person ought to be separated from his Wife,

Constant :

whom he had heretofore married, [to wit:] whilst he was a Laick. Thus he spake, though he was a Man, who had not experienced what marriage was, and (as I may truly aver) never knew a Woman, for from his childhood he had been educated in a * place where the strictest exercises of Virtue and Abstinence were constantly practised, and was eminently famous above all Men for his singular continency. All the whole Assembly of the Clergy were persuaded to yield their assent, to what Euphrasius said; wherefore they silenced all further Debate concerning this Point, and left it to every Man's arbitrement whether he would [or would not] abstain from keeping company with his Wife. And thus much concerning Euphrasius.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Spyridon Bishop of the Cyprians.

NOW [we come to speak] of Spyridon: So great a sanctity was in this Person whilst yet a Shepherd, that he was thought worthy to be made a Pastor of Men. He had obtained the Bishoprick of a City in Cyprus call'd Trimithuntis: But by reason of his singular humility he fed sheep during his being a Bishop. There are many things related of this Man: But I will only record one or two, that I may not seem to wander from my Subject. One time about midnight, thieves entering his sheepfold privately, and attempted to take away the sheep. But God who protected the shepherd, preserv'd his sheep also: For the thieves, were by an invisible Power fast bound to the folds. The Morning being now come, he went to his sheep, where finding the Men bound with their hands behind them, he perceiv'd what had hapned. And after he had prayed, he loosed the thieves, admonishing and exhorting them earnestly, to endeavour the procuring of a livelyhood by honest Labours, and not by such unjust Rapine: He also gave them a Ram, and dismiss'd them with this facetious saying, least, says he, you might seem to have watched all all night in vain. This is one of Spyridon's Miracles. Another was of this sort. He had a Daughter, a Virgin, indued with her Father's piety, her name Irene. A Person well known to her, entrusted her with the keeping of an Ornament, that was of great value. The Maid, that she might with greater safety keep what was deposited with her, hid it in the Earth: And within a short time died. Soon after that, he who had committed this thing to her care, came [to demand it.] Not finding the Virgin, he involves her Father [in that concern,] sometimes accusing, another while entreating him. The old Man looking upon the Persons loss who had entrusted his Daughter, as his own misfortune, went to his Daughters grave, and did there beg of God, that he would shew him the promised Resurrection before the Time. And his hope was not frustrated. For the Virgin immediately revives, and appears to her Father, and having shewed him the place where she had hid the Ornament, immediately departed. Such Persons as these were during the Reign of Constantine the Emperor eminent in the Church. These things I both heard from several Cyprians; and and also read them in a Book of Rufinus a Presbyter, written in Latin, out of which I have not only collected what has here been said, but also some other Things, which shall a little after this be declared.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning Eutychianus the Monk.

I Have also heard of Eutychianus, a pious Man, who flourished at the same Time: Who although he was one of the Novatian Church, yet was admired for Works of the same Nature with those [we have mentioned.] I will sincerely confess who it was that gave me this Account of him: Nor will I conceal it, though I am sensible some will be offended with me for it. One Auxanon a Presbyter of the Novatian Church, was a Person of a very great Age: This Man, when he was very young, went to the Council of Nice with Aetius, from him I received what I have said before concerning Aetius. He lived from those Times to the Reign of Theodosius the younger, and rehearsed to me, though then very young, these [Memoirs] of Eutychianus: He discour'd much to me concerning the Divine Grace infus'd into him: But one thing he told me concerning him, more especially worthy of remembrance, which happened in the Reign of Constantine. One of those belonging to the Guard, whom the Emperor calls his (a) Domesticks, being suspected to have attempted some Tyrannick Designs, made his escape by flight: The Emperor, highly incensed thereat, gave order, that he should be put to death, wherever he could be found: Being apprehended about the mountain Olympus in Bithynia, he was shut up in prison, and loaded with very heavy and painful chains; near these parts of Olympus Eutychianus then resided, leading a solitary Life, where he wrought many cures both upon Men's Bodies and Souls. The long lived Auxanon was with him at that time, being then very young, and was by him instructed in the Precepts of a solitary Life. Many did resort to this Eutychianus, beseeching him to release the Prisoner, by interceding for him with the Emperor. (For the fame of the Miracles wrought by Eutychianus was come to the Emperor's hearing.) He readily promised to make a Journey to the Emperor. But in regard the Prisoner suffered most acute tortures caused by his chains, those that did solicit for him, reported, that his death, hastned by [the tortures of] his fetters, would both prevent the Emperor's punishment, and Eutychianus's intercession for him. Eutychianus therefore sent to the keepers of the Prison, and intreated them to release the Man. But when they answered that it would be a very dangerous thing for them to release a Criminal, he, taking Auxanon only along with him, went to the Prison: And upon the Keepers refusal to open the Prison, the Grace which was in Eutychianus, did there most illustre it self: For the Prison, doors opened of their own accord, whilst the Keepers of the Prison had the keys in their custody: And when Eutychianus, together with Auxanon, had entred the Prison, and a great amazement had seized those that were present,

(a) By domestici he means the Prætoribus Domestici, or Guard of the Body, which waited on the Emperor's Person. They were Soldiers of a superior Order; who also had greater pay than, the others. See Valerius's Note, on Amm. Marcellin, book 14. pag. 33.

Confiant. the Chains fell from the Prisoners [Members] of their own accord. Afterwards [Eutychianus] together with his Companion Azucan travelled to the City heretofore named Byzantium, but afterwards called Constantinople, and being admitted into the Imperial Palace he freed the Prisoner from [the danger of] Death. For the Emperor, having a great respect for Eutychianus, readily granted his request. This was done after [those times which we are now giving an account of.] But then, the Bishops that were present at the Synod, after they had drawn up in writing some things, which they usually term Canons, return'd to their respective Cities. Moreover, I look upon it as a thing advantageous to such as are studious of History, to insert here those Bishop's Names (as many of them as we were able to find,) that were convened at Nice, as also [the name of] the Province and City over which every one of them did preside, and likewise the time wherein they were assembled. (b) Hosius Bishop of Corduba in Spain. I do believe as is before written. (c) Pito and Vincentius Presbyters of Rome. Alexander [Bishop] of Egypt. Eustathius [Bishop] of Antioch the Great. Macedarius [Bishop] of Jerusalem. d) Harporacion [Bishop] of Cyropolis. And the rest who are particularly and fully set forth in the (e) Synodicon of Arbanus Bishop of Alexandria. And the time when this Synod was convened was (as we found it in the (f) Notation of the time prefix'd before the Synwords: ἡμεῖς ἀρχιερεῖς Κεδέβου, Ἰωφὺς Βῆσσοφ Καρδίου followed by ἡμεῖς Ἐπίσκοποι Βρεσέου, Καὶ Βιτο καὶ Βινcentius.) But those incomparable MSS. exhibited this place entire to us, after this manner: ἡμεῖς ἀρχιερεῖς Κεδέβου, Ἰωφὺς Βῆσσοφ Καρδίου, ἡμεῖς ἐπίσκοποι Βρεσέου, Καὶ Βιτο καὶ Βινcentius. Ἐπίσκοποι, &c. i. e. Ἰωφὺς Bishop of Cardia in Spain. I do believe as it is before written. Vito and Vincentius, Presbyters of Rome, &c. This is the Series of the Bishops who subscribed the Nicene Creed, and the names of the same are not to be omitted, but he himself attacheth hereafter. In the Greek Collection of the Canon this Series is wanting, nor is it extant in Dionysius Exiguus's Version. But in the ancient Collection lately published at Paris, (which the Western Church heretofore made use of, before Dionysius's Version) and in Isidorus's Collection, this Series occurs almost in the same words. In that ancient Collection the words are these: ἡμεῖς ὑπογράψαντες. Ἰωφὺς Ἐπίσκοπος ἐκκλησίας Καρδίου, Βιτο καὶ Βινcentius ἐπίσκοποι, ἡμεῖς ἀρχιερεῖς Κεδέβου, Ἰωφὺς Βῆσσοφ Καρδίου, καὶ Βινcentius ὑποψύτοι. *urbis Romæ. Alexander Alexandria ἡγουμεν. Αἱ ἀποκρίσεις, &c. i. e. And they subscribed. Ἰωφὺς Bishop of the City Cardia, in the Province of Spain, said: I believe so, as the above written. Vito and Vincentius, Presbyters of the City of Rome. Alexander of Alexandria the Great, Αἱ ἀποκρίσεις, &c. The words in Isidorus's Collection are almost the same. But in Athanasius's Catalogue, Enfantius Bishop of Cardia, and Isidorus Bishop of Jerusalem, are placed after Alexander Bishop of Alexandria. Vale!*

• Arbanasius makes mention of this Vito the Presbyter, in His Apologetic against the Arians, and attests, that a Roman Synod consisting of fifty Bishops (by whom he was received into Communion) was convened in his Church. Valef.

(c) This Book of Athanasius's is not now (to my knowledge) extant. But 'tis probable, that the names of the Bishops who subscribed the Nicene Council, were translated out of that Book.

Heterogeneous (the term clat occurs here) imports the notion of express Declaration of the time usually prefix before public Acts. In the Greek Collection of the Canons (which contains Tilias first published) the notation of the time is prefixed, thus: Κατοίς τοῖς τινὲς αἰσὶν πατρίσι, καὶ ἐν ὧς οὐκ ἀνεκδοκίμοις ἐστὶν ταῦτα κενεῖται καὶ ἱκανοὶ εἰς τὸ ἀποφασισθῆναι ὑπὸ τοῦ πρὸς ἀρχιεπισκόπου· ἢ ἐν αὐτῇ ἐπισκοπῇ ἀναγινώσκοντες, ἀπὸ τοῦ 318. Soli Sancti, Conventus, Episcoporum. i.e. The Canons of the 318 Holy Fathers, Convent, assembled in Council at Alexandria, A.D. 600. Paschalis, Jubilaeum, on the Fifth day from Alexander on the nineteenth day of the month Dehius, before the thirtieth of the Calends of July. Valef.

ned) in the Consulate of Paulinus and Julianus, on the (g) twentieth day of the Month of May;
that was the (b) six hundredth thirty sixth year from the Reign of Alexander the Macedonian.
Thus the Synod was concluded. We must also take notice, that after [ the dissolution of ] this Synod, the Emperor took his Progress in to the Western Parts [of his Empire].

the foregoing Note.) For 'tis said that the Synod was convened on the nineteenth Day of the Month Dofius (which the Romans call June) on the thirteenth of the Calends of July. Which is confirmed by the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, by the Chalcedon Council, and by the Latin Collection which Evagrius calls Gregoniana, which account I think is the true one, or should we suppose that the Council of Nice was 'emitted on the twentieth of the Month of May, there would be too narrow a space of time left for the transacting of those Affairs which Confantine did after his vanquishing of Licinius. It was therefore sub-
A u d u c e d in the last Engagement at Chalcedon, in the year of Christ 324, and in the Alexandrian Chronicle: On the day following Iovinianus (who made his escape to Nicomedia) yielded himself to Confantine the Conqueror. After this Confantine made his entry into Nicomedia: Whilst he continued there, and halld to make his Progress into the Eastern parts, a Messenger arrived, declaring to him the Diffention of the Alexandrian Church, and of all Egypt, upon account of Arius's Opinion, and the disturbances of the Melchites, as himself attests in his Epistle to Alexander and Arius. And first he sends Hofius with his Letters to Alexandria, that he might compose the Differences by his Authority. But Hofius, after he had said a little while at Alexandria, returns to Confantine without effecting his business. All this could in no wise have been done in a shorter space of Time than three Months. Moreover, Confantine perceiving the Chief to increase daily, resolves upon calling a general Council of Bishops, that he might thereby restore Peace to the Church. Upon this he sends forth Ambassadors, and waits, couriers throughout all the Provinces, to convene the Bishops and wait in Syria. Suppose therefore, that the Couriers delivered the Emperors Letters to every one of the Bishops in the Month of March: It is scarce credible, that the Bishops could come from the remotest Regions, as well of the East as of the West, to Rhynia, before the Month July: Especially since they came by Land, and not by Water, as Eusebius attests, Book 3, Chap. 6. De Vita Constantini. See Valerius's Notes on Euseb. Life of Constantine, Book 2, Chap. 14.

The fix hundred thirty six year from the reign of Alexander the Macedonian worded it was the nineteenth year from the beginning of his reign. Confiantine the Emperors, which is very true. For when Paulinus and Gellianus were Confiantine, (which was on the 325th year of Christ), the Nicene Synod was (according to Beccate's Opinion) assembled in May, it being then the nineteenth year of Confiantine's Reign. His 20th year began the same year, about the end of July following. Valef.

CHAPTER XIV.

That Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia, Theognis Bishop of Nice ( who had been banish'd because they were Abettors of Arius's Opinion,) having afterwards sent a Libel of Repentance, and agreed to the Exposition of the Faith, were readmitted to their Sees.

Moreover, (a) Eusebius and Theognis, (b) ha- (a) Socrates ving felt a Libel of Repentance to the most ha-eminent Bishops, were by an Imperial Order recall'd ved no or-from Exile, and reftored to their own Churches: der here.

Says, that Eusebius and Theognis were recall'd from banishment almost before he had told us they were exiled. Saymen therefore did better, who in this particular corrected Socrates's Relation. For, in the first Book of his E History, Chap. 21. he relates that Eusebius and Theognis were banish'd by the Emperor Constantine a little after the Synod, and that other Bishops were put into their Sees. Then, in his second Book Chap. 16. he declares how they were recalled from their banishment.
From which passage (that I may make this Remark the more plain) may be concluded, that Socrates wrote his History after Socrates is as much as he corrects and amends Socrates's Narration in many places.
Further, Eusebius and Theognis were banish'd three Months after the Nicene Synod, as Philoforgius attests: and returned from their Exile (as the said Philoforgius relates) in the third year after that Synod, that is, in the year of Christ 328. which account agrees exactly with the History of Affairs transacted in that time. For all Hisstoryans agree that Eusebius, upon his return from banishment, entertained thoughts of confirming Arius's Opinion, and of thrusting forth that doctrine that altered the Nicene Faith. And, that his first attack was made against Eusebius

Eusebius Bishop of Antioch, whom he caused to be expell'd [from his See] by feigned Calumnies, in the year of Christ 329, or 330. Baronius therefore did ill, to place Eusebius Nicomedensis's return from exile on the year of Christ 320. Valef.

1000. Baronius (at the year 325 of Christ 325,) reproves Socrates and Sozomen, for saying, that Eusebius and Theognis were banish'd a little of the Nicene Synod; and that some few years after (having sent a Libel of satisfaction to the most eminent Bishops) they were recalled from their Exile. Baronius endeavors to prove, that this Libel was presented by Eusebius to the Bishops in the Nicene Synod. For he asserts, that the Rule of Faith was first writ down by Eusebius Nicomediensis (with four other Bishops) and so he would subscribe it. But, the said Eusebius, and the other Bishops, would not subscribe it. But, the said Eusebius, and the other Bishops, afterwards presented a Libel of Satisfaction to the said Synod, in which he had been determined [in the Synod.] But, after this, when the Synod had Anathematiz'd Arius, Eusebius and Theognis (says he) would not subscribe this Anathematism; and for that reason they were condemned and depol'd, by the Synod, and Amphion and Cerebus were put into their Sees. But the Emperor Constantine (continues he) interceded that the sentence might not be put in execution, and perfwaded the Synod that they might be admitted to Repentance. This is Baronius's Opinion, and he is followed by Beza, Stephanus, and Ussher. Eusebius and Theognis were presented by Eusebius: For of the former Libel no Body has ever made mention. Secondly, he cites no Author for what he says concerning Eusebius's and Theognis's Deprivation and Condemnation done in the Nicene Council. Constantine (in his Epistle to the Nicomediens, the latter part of which Epistle in Greek the Reader may meet in Theodorit. Eccl. Hist. Book 1. Chap. 20; it occurs entire at the close of Gelasius Cyrenensis's 3d Book, pag. 217.) says, that it was then done, but only says, the Eusebius was afraid it would be done. Lastly, his saying, that Eusebius and Theognis were recalled from the Libel is tell'd. For this Libel was, is manifestly retited from the Libel it self. For the Libel was presented by Eusebius, when he was in banishment, as is attest'd by their words of it, ὅτι διὰ τὴν περὶ γεγραμμένης ἀναθεματικῆς τῆς συνόδου, καὶ τῆς ἐκείνου βαλόντος ἡμῶν, ἀλλὰ τῶν, Sc. i. e. and by this Libel do fully declare and confirm our consent; [which we are induced to do not because we look upon our Exile to be tedious, &c. Besides, this Libel was presented when Eusebius was recalled from banishment; which is apparent from these words, ἵνα ὅτι διὰ τὴν γεγραμμένης ἀναθεματικῆς τῆς συνόδου, καὶ τῆς ἐκείνου βαλόντος ἡμῶν, ἀλλὰ τῶν, Sc. i. e. and by this Libel do fully declare and confirm our consent; which we are induced to do not because we look upon our Exile to be tedious, &c. Moreover, Arius was recalled from banishment by Constantine long ere this, after the Nicene Synod. Sc. Vult.

Conflant. those who had been Ordain'd in their places being removed by them; Enfibus [put out] Amphion, and Tucognus [removed] Chrestus. This is the Copy of their Libel.

(c) In as much as clared or defended, ought quietly to bear what has been determined by Your Holy Discretion.

his do
the beginning of this Epistle, that they were condemned by the Bishops; it is worth our making an enquiry, when and where they were condemned. Baronius says they were condemned, and deposed in the Nicene Synod. But this is contradicted by St. Jerome's Authority; who, in his Dialogue against the Luciferians, does in express words assert, that Eusebius and Theognis (with other Bishops of the Antiochian faction) were admitted of by the Nicene Synod. And he proves both from the testimony of St. Jerome himself, and from the Synod, and also from the Acts of the Nicene Synod, in which, amongst the names of those Bishops who subscribed the Synod, Eusebius and the others I have mentioned are reckoned. The same is attested by Philoforgius, who says that Eusebius was banished about three months after the Nicene Synod. Since therefore Fabius and Theognis do confess themselves to have been condemned by the Bishops, and since 'tis manifest that was not done in the Nicene Synod; it must necessarily have been done in some other Antiochian Bishops. The reason of their being exiled, Constantine does declare in his Epistle to St. Athanasius, (the latter part whereof see in Theo-doret, Book I, Chap. 1, Book 1, Chap. 2c.) For he says, that he banished them, because they entertained certain Heretics, (whom he had commanded to be sent to his Court from the City Alexandria), and held communion with them. (Baronius, at the year of Christ 329, thinks these Heretics were Melchites. But I do rather believe they were Arians.) And this is expressly affirmed by the Egyptian Bishops, in their Synodal Epistle, which Athanasius has recorded in his second Apology against the Arians. And the reason thereof, St. Athanasius omits not to mention, saying, that some Bishops were convened, from Eusebius and Theognis were condemned and deposed, after whom the Emperor banished them. This is expressly affirmed by Athanasius (in his Book De Synodis), and by Theodoret (Book 1, Chap. 19, Excell. Hist.) Yale.

(d) Christophorson and Mufculus omitted these words [ἡμεῖς καὶ οὐκ αὐτοί, without having our cause declared or defended] in their Version. They occur in Sozomen (Book 2. Chap. 16.) and Epiphani. Scholasticus has rendered them thus : Dulium quidem ante iudicium condemnati à Reverentiâ vestrâ, patienter ferre quæ decreta sunt à sancto vestro con-

gilio dehuimus; c. Having been sometime since, condemned by your Reverence before judgment, we ought patiently to bear what is decreed by your Holy Council. By these words Eusebius seems to intimate, that he was condemned without being heard, and by a rash judgment, or prejudice: To wit, because the Emperor had condemned him before, who was angry with Eusebius for several reasons, which you may meet with in Constantine's Epistle to the Nicomedians; see Theodoret, Eccles. Hist. Book 1. Chap. 20. Valsef.

But because 'tis absurd, by silence to give an occasion of Calumny against our selves, for this reason we declare to You, that We have both unanimously agreed to the [Determination about the] Faith, and also (after We had made Researches into the Notion of Homoiouios,) with Our utmost earnestness laboured for Peace, having never been Followers of any Heresie. And when We had suggested whatever came into our Minds upon account of the Churches security, and had fully satisfied those that ought to be persuaded by us, We subscribed the Faith, but have not subscribed the Anathematism; not that we had any thing to object against the Faith, but because We did not believe the Person accused to be such a one [as he was represented to be,] having been fully satisfied that he was no such Person, partly from the private Letters written to Us by Him, and partly from the Discourses he made in Our Presence. (e) But if Your Holy Council was [then] satisfied, We [now] make no resistance, but agree to what You have determined, and by this Libel do fully declare and confirm our Consent; which We are induced to do] not because We look upon Our Exile to be tedious and burthensome, but that We might avoid the suspicion of Heresie. For if You shall now vouchsafe to let Us return to Your Presence, You shall find Us to be of the same Opinion with You in all Points, and quently to adhere to what Your Father determineth: Since it hath seemed good to Your Piety gently to treat even * Him, who is accused for these * Arius, that we things, and to (f) recall Him from had just Banishment. But it would be absurd (since He that caused seemed to be guilty is recalled, and his made his unwilling Defence in reference to those things laid to his charge,) to that He should be silent, and muster up an Argument against Our selves. Do You therefore vouchsafe (as it befits Your Piety that loves Christ) to remind Our Emperor most dear to God, to offer up Our Supplications to Him, and speedily to determine concerning Us as shall be most agreeable to Your [ Prudence. ] them

This is the Libel of Eusebius and Theognis' now we Recantation. From the words whereof I conclude conjecture, that they subscribed the Faith which had been published [ in the Council ; ] but would not give their consent to the deposing of Arius : And it appears hence, that Arius was recalled from Banishment, before them : But although this seems to be so, yet he was for-bidden to enter Alexandria. Which is evident from this, [ro wit,] that he afterwards invented a way for his own return into the Church and the City Alexandria, by having made use of a counterfeited Repentance, as we shall relate in its due place.

CHAP. XV.

How the Emperor dying after the [Nicene] Synod, Athanasius was consecrated Bishop of the City Alexandria.

(a) Socrates (as all the) Mistakes here in placing Alexander's death, and Athanasius's Ordination after Eusebius's and Theognis's return from exile. For Alexander Bishop of Alexandria dyed within few months after the Council of Nice, as Athanasius testifies in his second apology against the Arians, where he speaks of Melitius. The same says Theodoret, in the first book of his History, in chap. 26. Alexander therefore died in the year of Christ 325, and Athanasius was consecrated either at the latter end of the time Year, or in the beginning or the next. Valef.

passing by at that time, saw all their Play. And, having afterwards sent for the Children, he enquired of them what place had been allotted to ever one of them in the Plays, supposing that from what had been done, some thing might be portended [concerning each of them.] And he gave order, that the Children should be educated in the Church, and instructed in Learning; but most specially Athanasius. Afterwards when he was come a maturity of Age, he ordained him Deacon, and took him along with him to Nice, that he might assist him in the Disputations there, at such time as that Synod was convened. These things Rufinus has related concerning Athanasius, in his (b) Books [of Ecclesiastick History:] nor is it at all unlikely that these things hapned: For many such like Acts are frequently found to have been done.

Thus much we have hitherto said concerning Athanasius.

(b) See Rufinus's Ecclesiastick History, Book 1. chap. 14. where Rufinus adds this circumstance to this story; that the Boys (upon Alexander's enquiry) would have some Catechumens had been baptiz'd by Athanasius, whom they had chosen Bishop in their sports. Then Alexander, having demanded of those said to be baptiz'd, what Questions they had been asked, and what Answers they made, and also having examined him who had asked them the Questions; found that all things had been done according to the Rites of our Religion: And, after a consult with his Clergy, 'tis said, he ordered, that those Boys (on whom water had been poured, after they were perfectly question'd, and had return'd compleat answers) should not be rebaptiz'd. See Rufinus at the Book and Chapter now cited.

How the Emperor Constantine, having enlarged the City heretofore call'd Byzantium, named it Constantinople.

THE Emperor, after the [Dissolution of the] Council spent his time in delight and pleasure. As soon therefore as he had finish'd the Publick Festivals of his (a) Vicennalia, he forthwith employ'd himself very diligently about redifying and erecting of Churches. This he did as well in other Cities, as in that that bore his own Name. Which City being formerly called Byzantium, he very much enlarged; he encompassed it with magnificent Walls, and beautified with several Edifices; and having made it equal to the Imperial City Rome, (b) he named it Constantinople, and did by a Law establish that it should be call'd New Rome. Which Law was engraven on a Pillar of stone, and (c) exposed to the publick view, being erected in the (d) Strategium, near to the Emperor's Statue on horseback. He also founded two Churches in the same City, the one of which he named Irene, and the other he called the Apostles: Nor did he only improve and enlarge the Affairs of the Christians, as I have said, but did also subvert [the Superstition] of the Gentiles. For [he took their] Images [out of their Temple:] and set them up in the most Publick Places, that they might serve to beautifie the City Constantinople: He also expos'd the Delphick Tripods openly in the Hippodrome. But it will perhaps seem superfluous to mention these things now. For they are sooner beheld with the Eyes, than the relation of them can be heard. But at that time the Christian Religion was mightily propagated and increased. For the Divine Providence did (amongst other things) reserve that more especially for the times of Constantine: And thus has Eusebius Pamphilus in a magnifick stile recorded the praises of this Emperor. But yet we judge it not unseasonable for us to speak briefly of them according to our ability.

(a) In stead of [καθ' ἑκαστον, was set, or placed] it should be [καθ' ἑκαστον, was exposed, or erected] This emendation is confirm'd by Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Romanesque firmavit. Valef.

(b) The Strategium was a publick edifice wherein the Strategus, (i. e. the Duumviri, the two principal Magistrates that heretofore governed the City Byzantium) were wont to sit. It is mentioned in the old description of the City Constantinople, which is preface before the Notitia Imperii Romani. Valef.

CHAP. XVII.

How Helena, the Emperor's Mother, came to Jerusalem, and having there found Christ's Cross, which she had sought for a long time, built a Church.

HELENA the Emperor's Mother, (from whose name Drepanum, which was formerly only a Village, but made a City by the Emperor, was call'd Helenopolis) being admonished by God in her Dreams, travell'd to Jerusalem. And when she found that place which was formerly Jerusalem, desolate (as the Prophet predicteth)

* like a lodge [set up] to preserve Apples, she searched diligently for Christ's Sepulchre wherein he was buried, and whence he arose, and though with great difficulty, yet by God's assistance she found it out. What was the reason of this Difficulty, I will in few words explain. Those that embraced Christ's Doctrine, did after the time of his Passion pay an high respect to that Monument. But the Heathens, who abhorred the Christian Religion, having covered the Place with an heap of Earth, erected thereon a Temple to Venus, and set up her image there, designing wholly to suppress the memory of that place. And this plot of theirs had for a long time succeeded. But the Emperor's Mother had notice hereof. Wherefore, having thrown down the image, remov'd the Earth, and wholly cleared the place, she finds three Crosses in the monument: One of them was that blessed Cross on which our Saviour

* See Esai. 1. 8. where the Septuagint Version is, ὡς ὅτι ἐπεσκέψατο, which, in our English translation is thus worded, as a lodge in a Garden of Gucum. Rensden does expressly agree with the original had Hebrew.

(a) That is the Festival for his having arrived the twentieth year of his Empire.

Constant. had hung: The other two were those, on which the two Thieves, that were crucified with him, had died. There was also found with the Crosses Pilate's Title; whereon he had written in divers Languages, and proclaim'd that that Christ who was crucified, was the King of the Jews. But in regard 'twas dubious which of these was the Cross that was search'd for, the Emperor's Mother was not a little troubled hereat. This trouble the Bishop of Jerusalem, by name Macarius, soon eased her of; and by [the power of] his Faith clear'd the doubt: For he requested a Sign of God and obtain'd it; the Sign was this: A certain Woman of that Vicinage, having been oppress'd with a tedious and lasting Dis temper, was now just at the point of death. The Bishop therefore commanded every one of the Crosses to be applied to her now expiring, being per swaded in himself that if the Woman were touch'd by the precious Crosses [of the Lord] she should recover: Nor was his Hope frustrated: For the two Crosses which were not our Lord's being applied, the Woman nevertheless continued in her dying condition; but when the third, the true and genuine Cross was applied, the dying Woman immediately recover'd and was made whole. After this manner was the Cross found out: But the Emperor's Mother erected over the place where the Sepulchre was, a most magnificent Church, and call'd it (a) New Jerusalem, building it opposite to that old deserted Jerusalem. She left there one half of the Cross, inclosed in a Silver Case, as a Relique to be seen by those that shou'd desire it; the other half she sent to the Emperor, which when he had receiv'd, being fully perswaded that that City would be perfectly secure wherein such a Relique [as this was preserv'd], he hid it within his own Statue, (b) which is erected upon a vast Pillar of Porphyr in Constantinople, in the Forum, call'd from him Constantine's Forum. This

Sto ry I have recorded as it has been related to me; but almost all the Inhabitants of Constantinople do affirm it to be true. Constantine having also receiv'd the Nails with which Christ's Hands were fastned to the Cross; (for his Mother, having found them also in the Sepulchre, sent them to him: ) He order'd Bridges, [he erected another Church] upon the Mount, from whence he was taken up into Heaven. And she was so religiously and piously affected towards these things, that she would pray in the Women's company together with the others: She also invited those Virgins that were enrol led in the Catalogue of the Churches to an En tainment: Where she herself waited, and brought the Meat to the Tables. Besides, she was very liberal both to the Churches; and also to the Indigent. [In fine,] having spent her life very piously, she died about the eightieth year of her age: And her Body was convey'd to the Imperial City New Rome, and deposited amongst the Imperial Monuments.

AFTER this, the Emperor, becoming more solicitous about [the Propagation of] Christianity, abhor'd the Superstitions of the Gentiles: And first he abolish'd the Combats of the Gladiators: Afterwards he placed his own Statues in the Temples. The Heathens affirming that it was Serapis that caused the Inundations of Nile, whereby the Fields of Egypt were water'd, because there was a Cubit usually carried into his Temple, the Emperor (a) order'd Alexander to remove the Cubit into the Church [of the Alexandrians,] hereupon 'twas generally reported, that, because Serapis was disgusted, the Nile would not overflow; neverthe less, there hapned an Inundation on the ensuing Year, and afterwards, which also does continue to this day: And thus it was really demonstrated, that the Inundation of the Nile hapned not by the means of their Superstition, but by the decree of Providence. About the same time, those barbarous Nations, the Sarmatæ and the Goths made Inroads into the Roman Territories, and yet the Emperor's forwardness in building of Churches was not in the least interrupted thereby, but he made a commodious provision for both those Affairs. For, having put his confidence in the * Christian Banner, he totally subdued those his Enemies; in so much that he took off the Tribute of Gold which had been customarily paid to the Barbarians by those Emperors who were his Predecessors; and that was the first time that they (being astonish'd at their prodigious Overthrow) were perswaded to embrace the Christian Religion, by which Constantine had like to the other Churches: One he built at that place called the Oak of Mambre, under which the sacred Scriptures tell us that the Angels were entertain'd by Abraham. For the Emperor being inform'd that Altars were erected under that Oak, and that Pagan Sacrifices were there perform'd, by his Letter he severely reprov'd Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea: And gave command that the Altar should be demolish'd, and an House of Prayer erected near that Oak. He also gave order for the building of another Church, in Heliopolis, a City of Phœnicia, for this

(a) Socrates borrow'd this Story out of Eusebius's third Book of Constantine's Life, Chap. 33. But mistakes in saying that the Church which was built over our Saviour's Sepulchre by Helena, or rather by Constantine, was call'd New Jerusalem. For Eusebius says no such thing: But he only alludes to the New Jerusalem, which is mentioned in St. John's Revelations. See our notes on Euseb. Life of Constant. Book 3. Chap. 33. Valef.

(b) Philostorgius does report that the People us'd to come to this Pillar with their Tapers, and worship it; which is very strange and almost incredible: But Theodoret does by his authority confirm it, in the first Book of his Ecclesiastical History, and the last Chapter. Valef.

(a) Christopherson and Musubus thought that these Words were transposed; they read them (as appears from their Version) thus, οὗ τοῦ κυβανταίου Ἀλεξάνδριον ἡ τοῦ κυβανταίου ἐκκλησία [the Emperor] order'd that the Cubit should be removed into the Church of the Alexandrians. But, because the word [κυβανταίου] cannot be taken in a passive sense, the place must be otherwise understood: Which from the Sforzin MS. we have thus restored: οὗ τοῦ τοῦ κυβανταίου ἡ τοῦ κυβανταίου ἐκκλησία [the Emperor] order'd Alexander to remove the Cubit into his Church [of the Alexandrians,] which emendation needs no confirmation. See Ruffin. Eccles. Hist. Book 2. Chap. 23. This order of Constantine's lasted not long. For Julian commanded that the same Cubit should be carried back again into Serapis's Temple, where it seems to have continued till Theodosius's Reign, and the demolition of Serapis's Temple. Valef.

* He means that Standard, or Banner, which the Emperor order'd to be made, in figure like to the Cross that appear'd to him in the face of the Heavens. See Chap. 2. of this Book.

Constantine. this reason. What manner of Law-maker the Citizens of Heliopolis originally had, or what Person he was as to his Morals, I cannot certainly tell. But his Disposition is sufficiently demonstrated from that City : For the Law of their Country has commanded that the Women should be common amongst them, upon which Account the Children amongst them could not be known whose they were. For there was no distinction betwixt the Parents and the Children. Their Virgins they delivered to strangers that arrived amongst them, that they might deflower them. The Emperor made it his business to abolish this custom, which had so long prevailed amongst them. For having abrogated the flagitiousness of those unclean usages, by a discreet and chaste Law, he brought them to know and distinguish betwixt Families : And when he had built Churches, he took care that a Bishop should be ordain'd over them, and a sacred Clergy. Thus he reformed the impious usages of the Heliopolites, and made them more modest and civil. After the like manner also he demolish'd the Temple of Venus at Aphaca near [the mount] Libanus, and abrogated those impudent and obscene Mysteries there celebrated. What need I relate how he expell'd that Devil who pretended to utter Prophecies, out of Cilicia, commanding the house in which he lurk'd, to be demolished even to its very Foundations. Moreover, so ardent was the Emperors love for the Christian Religion, that being about to engage in a War with the Persians, he provided a Tabernacle made of Linen painted with divers colours, much resembling a Church (even as Moses did in the Wilderness) and this he would have carried about with him, that so in the most desert Regions he might have an Oratory ready. But this War went no further at that time: For it hapned to be immediately extinguish'd through the fear which the Persians had conceiv'd of the Emperor. But I think it unreasonable to relate here how diligent the Emperor Constantine was in repairing Cities, and how he turned many Villages into Cities ; as for instance, Drepana, which bore his Mother's name, and Constantia in Palestine, so called from his Sister's Name Constantia. For our Design is not to recount all the Emperor's Actions, but them only which belong to the Christian Religion, and those more particularly which were done about the Churches. Wherefore, the Emperor's famous exploits, in regard they are of a subject different [from mine,] and require a peculiar Treatise, I leave to others, that are able to commit to writing such Matters. Indeed, I my self, had the Church continued undisturbed by Factions and Discord, had been wholly silent. For where the Subject affords not matter proper for a Narrative, the Relator's Words are superfluous and useless. But in regard a subtle, vain, and insignificant craftiness in disputing, hath disturbed, and at the same time also dissipated and distracted the Apostolick Faith of Christianity, I supposed it requisite to commit these things to writing ; that so those Affairs which have been transacted in the Churches, might not be buried in silence. For the knowledge of these things does both procure great praise and commendation amongst most Men, and also renders him that is well versed therein much more solid and cautious ; teaching him not to fluctuate or stagger [in his sentiments,] when any * vain babblings about words and

After what manner the Innermost Indian Nations were in the times of Constantine converted to Christianity.

NOW therefore we must record, how the Christian Religion was propagated in the times of this Emperor. For the innermost Indians, and the Iberians did then first embrace the Christian Faith. But we will briefly explain, what we mean by the addition of this Term, the Innermost. When the Apostles, about to take their Journey to the Heathens, in order to their preaching to them, had by lot divided them amongst themselves,

(a) Thomas received the Apostolate of the Parthians. To Matthew was allotted Æthiopia. Bartholomew had that India assign'd to him which lyes upon the confines of Æthiopia. But this innermost India, which is inhabited by several barbarous Nations, who make use of different Languages, was not enlightened with the Doctrine of Christianity, before the Times of Constantine. What was the cause of their embracing the Christian Religion, I come now to relate. One Meropius, a Philosopher, by birth a Tyrian, made it his business to see the Country of the Indians, emulating herein (b) Metrodorus the Philosopher, who a little before him had travelled over that same Country. Meropius therefore taking along with Philosophy, whom Jerome has mention'd in his Chronicon ; who, returning from his Travails in India, presented Constantine with many gemms and pearls, and feigned that many more of greater value were taken from him by Sapor King of the Persians : which lie of his was the occasion of the Persian War, as Amm. Marcellinus attests, book 25. pag. 295. Edit. Valef. See Valefius's Notes on Amm. Marcell. pag. 304. that a little before [his arrival there] the League betwixt the Romans and Indians had been broken. The Indians therefore took the Philosopher, and those that were in the Ship with him, and put them all to death, except his two young Kinsmen. Having saved the Lives of the two Youths, out of a compassion to their Age, they presented them to the King of the Indians. He, much pleas'd with the young Men's looks, made the one of them, whose name was Adsius, the Cup-bearer of his Table : To the other, whose name was Frumentius, he * committed the custody of his Accounts and Evidences-Royal. Not long after this, the King dying (having left behind him a Son to be his Successor, who was a minor, and his Wife,) gave these two Young Men their liberty. But the Queen, seeing her Son left in his minority, spok to these two Persons to take care of him, till such time as he should come to maturity of Age. The young Men, in Obedience to the Queen, undertake the management of the King's Business. But Frumentius was the chief Person in managing the Affairs of State. And he was very earnest in * Rationes suas scripsisse commisit ; so Rufinus (from whom Socrates translated this story almost word for word) describes this young Man's Office ; book 1. chap. 9. Hist. Ecclesiast.

(b) This is whom Jerome has mention'd in his Chronicon ; who, returning from his Travails in India, presented Constantine with many gemms and pearls, and feigned that many more of greater value were taken from him by Sapor King of the Persians : which lie of his was the occasion of the Persian War, as Amm. Marcellinus attests, book 25. pag. 295. Edit. Valef. See Valefius's Notes on Amm. Marcell. pag. 304.

Constant. enquiring of the Roman Merchants who then came to trade in that country, whether there were any that embrac'd Christianity to be found among 'em. Having found some, and inform'd them who he was, he exhorted them to make choice of (c) some private meeting places for the performance of prayers therein, after the manner of Christians. Afterwards, within some short interval of time he built an oratory: and they, having instructed some Indians in the principles of Christianity, brought them to prayers with them. But afterwards, when the young King came to a maturity of age, Frumentius resigning to him the administration of the affairs of the Kingdom, which he had well manag'd, petitioned for leave to return into his own Country.

And tho' the King and his mother entreated him to stay, yet they could not persuade him, but being desirous to see his own Country, he, together with Adesius return'd home. Adesius hasten'd to Tyre to see his Parents and kindred: but Frumentius arriving at Alexandria, related the whole story to Athanasius, (d) who was then newly dignified with that Bishoprick; informing him of the circumstances of his travels, and that there was good grounds to hope that the Indians would embrace Christianity: [He also desir'd him] that he would send a Bishop and a Clergy thither, and that he ought in no wise to neglect those that might be brought unto salvation. Athanasius having taken into consideration what was most expedient to be done, entreated Frumentius himself to take upon him the Bishoprick, telling him that there was no man better qualified for it than he. Which was done. (e) Frumentius therefore dignified with an Episcopate, returns again to those parts of Africa, which Rufinus had termed Conventicula. Now Conventicula are properly private Places wherein Catholics, or short Prayers are made; and from these places Churches are distinguished, which belong to the right of the Publick, and are not in the Power of any private Person. Valef.

(d) Rufinus says the same: Tum vero Athanasius (nam is super sacerdotibus supererat,) i.e. But then Athanasius (for he had a little before undertaken the Episcopate, &c.) But if we consider the matter more attractively, these things cannot be. For Mercopius the Philosopher is said to have travell'd into India, in imitation of the Philosopher Metrodorus, who had taken a view of that Country before him. But Metrodorus, return'd not from his Indian Journey before the Year of Christ 326. For at his return from India he presented the Emperor Constantine with gifts which he had receiv'd from the King of the Indians, as we remarked before in note (b.) in this chapter. Which must necessarily happen after the conquest of Licinius. For then Constantine first receiv'd the Empire of the East. Now, Licinius was vanquish'd at the latter end of the Year of Christ 324. Mercopius therefore, in regard, following Metrodorus's Example, he attempted to travel over India, must have undertaken this journey some Years after him. Let us then suppose, that Mercopius went into India in the year of our Lord 327. On the year following, when he should have returned into his own Country, he was slain by the Barbarians. And Adesius and Frumentius, being as yet youths, were presented to the Indian King; and one of them was made his Cup-bearer; the other was set over his Ads and Evidences Royal. In which Offices both continued to the Kings death. Now, suppose they served the King three years. After this the Indian King dies, leaving his Son very young. But the Queen his mother entreated Adesius and Frumentius to undertake the Government of the Kingdom, till her Son were of Age. Let us also allow that the King's Son was about eight years old when his father died. In as much as Frumentius return'd not to Alexandria till the young King was grown a Man, it is wholly requisite that he should have manag'd the Affairs of the Kingdom at least ten Years. So Frumentius return'd to Alexandria about the Year of our Lord 341; in which year Athanasius was not newly made Bishop, but had held that Bishoprick above fifteen Years. From what we have said 'tis apparent, that this conversion of the Indians by Frumentius happen'd in the Reign of Constantine, not of Constantine, as Rufinus, and others that follow him, have related. Valef.

(e) Athanasius speaks of this Frumentius, in his Apologetic to the Emperor Constantine. And a little after mentions Constantine's Epistle to Arianus and Saxanas the Kings of Auxumia, wherein he commands them to send Frumentius (whom Athanasius had ordained Bishop of Auxumia) to Alexandria, to George Bishop of that City, that he might receive from him the Doctrine of the true Faith. Whence it appears, that Frumentius was at that time but newly ordain'd by Athanasius. Now this Epistle was written in the Year of Christ 356. Baronius, (in his Annotations on the Roman Martyrology), says that this Frumentius Bishop of Auxumia must be distinguished from the other Frumentius Bishop of the Indians. But I do assert, that he that was Bishop of Auxumia, and he that is styled the Bishop of the Indians, is one and the same Frumentius. For Auxumia is the Metropolis of Æthiopia. Now the Æthiops are by the ancients usually confounded with the Indians. So Philostorgius calls the Æthiops (who were the Auxumites neighbours) Indians. Also, the Æthiops who are now call'd Abyssines, call themselves Indians, and do acknowledge Frumentius to have been the Apostle of their Nation; as Lucas Floddeus attests in his Notes on Baronius's Martyrology, which were lately publish'd at Rome. Valef.

the Indians Country, and there became a preacher of the Christian Religion; he founded many Oratories, and being vouchsafed [the assistance of] Divine Grace, he wrought many Miracles, and cured many Men's Bodies together with their Souls. These things Rufinus says he heard from Adesius's own mouth, who was afterwards dignified with a Presbytership in the Church of Tyre.

C H A P. XX.

After what manner the Iberians were converted to the Christian Religion.

IT is now a fit opportunity to relate after what manner the Iberians were at the same time converted to Christianity. A Woman who led a religious and chaste life, was, by the disposal of Divine Providence, taken captive by the Iberians. These Iberians dwell near the Euxine Sea; they are a colony of the Iberians in Spain. This captive woman therefore, living amongst the Barbarians, devoted herself to a Philosophick course of life. For together with the strictest and severest exercises of Chastity, she us'd herself to most tedious and lasting fasts, and to continued prayer. The Barbarians seeing this, were amaz'd at the strangeness and novelty of her actions. It happen'd, that * the King's Son, being a very young child fell sick. The Queen, according to the custom of that Country, sent the child about to other women to be cured: if perchance by long experience they might know of any cure for the distemper. When the young child had been carried about by his nurse, and could find no cure from any of the women, he was at last brought to this captive Woman. She in the presence of many women, apply'd not any material remedy, for she had no knowledge of any such Medicines. But, having taken the child, she laid him upon her own womb, which was made of hair-cloth, and only spake these words: Christ (said she) who healed many, shall also cure this Child. Having added a prayer to these words, and invoked God's assistance, the child immediately recover'd, and from that time was very well. The report hereof was nois'd abroad among the Barbarian women, it came also to the Queen's ear; and the captive woman became more eminent. Not long after the Queen, being fallen into a distemper, sent for the captive woman. She having refus'd to go by reason of her modesty and bashful disposition, the Queen her self was convey'd to her. The captive woman does the same that she before had done to the child. And forthwith the sick Queen recover'd, and return'd her thanks to the woman. But she made her this answer, it is not I that do this, but Christ, who is the Son of that God, who made the world. She therefore exhorted the Queen to call upon

Constant. upon him, and to acknowledge the true God. The King of the Iberians, amazed at the suddenness of her recovery from the Disease, having enquired who it was that did these cures, preferred the captive Woman with Gifts. She answered, that she stood not in need of wealth, for piety was her riches. But that she should accept it as the greatest present, if he would acknowledge that God who was set forth and declared by her. With this answer she return'd his presents. The King treasured up her words in his breast. The next day this accident befel the King going out a hunting: There fell a mist and a thick darkness upon the tops of the mountains and forests where he was hunting, so that their sport was grown troublesome, and the way impassable. The King being in a very great strait, earnestly implored [the assistance of] those Gods whom he worshipped: But finding he was never the better, at last he bethought himself of the captive-womans God, and calls upon him to be his assistant. He had no sooner prayed, but the darkness caused by the mist was dispers'd. Admiring what was done, he return'd home with joy, and having told his Queen what had befallen him, he forthwith sent for the captive woman, and enquired of her who that God was, whom she worshipped. When the woman was come into his presence, she made the King of the Iberians to become a Preacher of Christ. For, having been perwaded by this devout woman to believe in Christ, he conveyed all the Iberians that were his Subjects; and when he had related to them all things concerning the cure of his wife and his child, and also what had befallen him in his hunting, he exhorted them to worship the God of the captive-woman. Thus therefore they both became Preachers of Christ, the King preach'd to the men, and the Queen to the women. Moreover, the King, informed by the captive woman of the fashion of those Churches amongst the Romans, commanded an Oratory to be built, and order'd a provision of all materials towards the building to be forthwith made. Therefore a Church was erected, and when they went about raising of the Pillars, Divine Providence attempts somewhat that might persuade the inhabitants of that Country [to embrace] the Christian Faith. For one of the Pillars continued immovable. No engine could be invented, that was able to stir it. But the ropes were broken, and the engines torn in pieces. The work-men therefore, desponding and quite out of heart, went away. Then was the captive womans Faith openly manifested. For she goes by night to the place without any bodies knowledge, and there stayed all night, spending the time in fervent prayer: and by God's Providence the Pillar was rais'd and stood fix'd in the air, higher than its basis, in such a manner that it did not in the least touch its basis. As soon as it was and celebrated the praises of the captive-womans God. After this they believed [in Christ,] and raised up the rest of the Pillars with great alacrity of mind: and the whole building was in a short time perfectly finish'd. Afterwards an Embassy was sent from them to Constantine the Emperor, whereby they requested, that they might both in future be admitted to a confederacy with the Romans, and also have a Bishop and an holy Clergy sent to them. For they protested that they did sincerely believe in Christ.

(b) The This relation Rufinus says he had from (b) Bacensius Florinus, who had formerly been a Prince of Iberia: rem. and but afterwards coming over to the Romans, he Asst. M. was (c) made a Captain within the limits of Palestine. At length he was advanced to the Office of a General, and did the Emperor Theodosius extraordinary good service, in the (d) War against Maximus the Tyrant. After this manner were the Iberians converted to the Christian Religion in the times of Constantine. more truly, Bacurius, Zosimus says, he was born in that Armenia which borders on Iberia, and that he was a man without all malice, or deceit, very expert in Military Affairs. But Rufinus (Book 1. Chap. 10. and Book 2. Chap. 33. Eccles. Hist.) affirms he was a Prince of the Iberi; that he was a Person of great fidelity, very studious of Religion and Truth: First made a Captain within the limits of Palestine; afterwards Comes of the Domesticks; and lastly that he did Theodosius the Emperor great service in his War with Eugenius. Valef. See Valefius's notes on Anm. Murcell. pag. 320, &c.

(c) At this place Socrates mistook Rufinus's meaning. For Rufinus says, that Bacurius was a Captain, Palestini limits, of the Palestine limits; when he told him these things. But Socrates seems to have read in Rufinus, Palestini militis duces, that Bacurius was a Captain of the Palestine Militie. Valef.

(d) Here also Socrates is out. For Bacurius served not Theodosius in the War against Maximus, but in that against Eugenius: as Rufinus attests, Book 2. Chap. 33. Eccles. Hist. and Zosimus, Book 4. Valef.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning Antonius the Monk.

IT would be superfluous for us to say any thing concerning Antonius the Monk, who at the same time lived in the Deserts of Egypt, [or to relate] what a man he was, how he openly strove with Devils, and detected all their stratagems and attempts; and how he wrought many miracles. For Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria has prevented us, having written a particular Book concerning his Life: Such a plenty of eminent Men was there, who lived at one and the same time, in the Reign of Constantine.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning Manes the Author of the Heresie of the Manichees, and whence he had his Original.

BUT it is usual for cockle to grow up amongst the good corn, for the envy [of the Devil] loves to lay snares for the righteous. Not long before Constantine's reign, there sprung up a kind of heathenish Christianity, together with the true Christian Religion, as heretofore false Prophets arose up together with the Prophets, and Pseudo-Apostles amongst the Apostles. For in those days one Manicheus attempted clandestinely to introduce the Opinion of Empedocles the Heathen Philosopher, into Christianity. This Man See Ea. Eusebius Pamphilus indeed has mention'd in the 7th Book of his Ecclesiastick History, but has not accurately chap. 31.

(1) Instead of [ἡμετέροις τῶν ἀνδρῶν, well skilled in Architecture] I had rather read [ἀποστολῶν ἀνδρῶν, being very anxious.] I doubt not but Socrates wrote it thus. For in Rufinus (Book 1. Chap. 10. from whom Socrates borrowed this Relation) the Words are these, cum esse martirum & animum cum suis omnibus ingredientibus, &c. when behold the King, perplex'd in his mind, coming in the morning with all his attendants, &c. Valef.

ted, cried out that the King's Faith was true,

curately explained all things concerning him. Wherefore I judge it requisite to supply what he has omitted. For thereby it will be manifested, who this Manicheus was, whence he came, and how he arrived at so high a degree of audaciousness. One Scythianus a Saracen, married a captive Woman, a Native of the Upper Thebais. Upon her account he lived in Aegypt, and having been instructed in the Literature of the Aegyptians, he introduced the Opinion of Empedocles and Pythagoras into the Christian Religion: Asserting that there were two Natures, the one Good, the other Evil, (as Empedocles also did); the evil Nature he termed Discord; the good he called Friendship. One Buddus, heretofore named Terebinthus, was this Scythianus's Scholar. This Man travelling into the Country of Babylonia, which is inhabited by the Persians, told many strange and prodigious things of himself, saying, that he was born of a Virgin, and educated in the Mountains. Afterwards he wrote four Books, one he entitled [the Book] of Mysteries; another, the Gospel; the third he called the Thebais, and the fourth Heads. But as he was counterfeiting the Performance of some mysterious sacred Rites, he was thrown down headlong by the Devil, and so died. The Woman, at whose House he sojourned, buried him. She having possessed her self of his Money, bought a Boy, about seven years old, by name Cubrius: This Boy she made free; and when he had bred him a Scholar, she died soon after, and left him all Terebinthus's Estate, and the Books also which he had written, being instructed by Scythianus. Cubrius, now a Free-man, takes these Goods along with him, and travelling into Persia, changes his Name, calling himself Manes. Where he distributed Buddus's, or Terebinthus's Books, as his own genuine Works, amongst his seduced Followers. Upon these are the Subjects of those Books; in the Words they seemingly assert the Christian Religion, but [if] the Opinions [contained in them be attentively considered] they are [near a kin to] Gentilism. For Manicheus, being an impious Person, does incite [his Disciples] to worship a Plurality of Gods. He also teaches, that the (a) Sun is to be adored. Besides, he introduces Fate, and destroy man's Free-will. He apparently asserts a Transmutation of Bodies, following herein the Opinions of Empedocles, Pythagoras, and the Aegyptians: He denies that Christ existed in the flesh, saying, that he was a meer * Phantasm. He does also reject the Law and the Prophets: And calls himself the Paraclete. All which Tenets, 'tis manifest, are wholly disagreeable to the Orthodox [Doctrine of the] Church. Moreover, in his Letters he has been so audacious as to stile himself an Apostle. But he met with a condign punishment for this impudent lie of his, [which befel him] upon this occasion. The Son of the King of Persia happened to fall sick; his stone untuned, as the common saying is. Having heard of Manicheus, and supposing the wonders he did to the real and true, he sends for him, as if he had been an Apostle, hoping that he might preserve his Son's life. When he was come, in a fictitious and pretended manner he takes in hand to cure the King's Son. But the King, seeing that his Son died under his hands, clapt him in Prison, with a design forthwith to put him to death. He made his escape [out of Prison] into Mesopotamia, and saved himself: But when the King of Persia had intelligence of his abode in those Parts, he [caused him] to be brought from thence by force, and flead him alive: And having stuffed his skin with chaff, he hanged it up before the City Gates. These things, which we relate, are no forgeries of our own, (b) but (c) The we collected them out of a Book we read over, reading [intituled] The Disputation of Archelaus, Bishop of Mesopotamia, one of the Cities of Mesopotamia. For this Archelaus says, that he disputed with Manicheus face to face, and what we have written above concerning Manicheus's Life, Archelaus himself does relate. Thus therefore does the envy [of the Devil.] as we said before, delight to entrap good Affairs when in their most flourishing aspect. But, for what reason the goodness of God should permit this to be done, (whether it be that he is desirous to have the true Opinion of the Church brought to the test and examined, and wholly to extirpate arrogancy, which usually grows up together with Faith, or for what other reason) is a question that cannot be solved without great difficulty and tediousness: Nor can it now be opportunely discussed by us. For, it is not our design to examine [the truth] of Opinions, or to make researches into the abstruse Accounts of Providence and the Judgment of God; but, according to our ability, to compose a narrative of the Affairs that have been transacted in the Churches. After what manner therefore the superstition of the Manicheans (c) sprang up a little before the times of Constantine, it has been sufficiently declared. Let us now return to the Series of those times, that are the proper subject of the History we design.

(a) It is manifest apparent that the Manicheans adored the Sun. Libanius relates the same concerning them, in Book 4. Epist. 140. wherein he commends the Manicheans that were in Palestine (but suppresses their name) to Priscianus the President of Palestine: οι τον ηλιον τον δεσποτον της, &c. i. e. Those men that worship the Sun without blood, and honour God with the second appellation, who chastize their belly, and account the day of their death to be gain; are found to be in many places, but are every where few in number. They injure no Man, but are mocked by some. I doubt not but by these Words Libanius means the Manicheans; for they cannot be agreeably attributed to any other Persons besides them. But he designedly omitted the mention of their name, because the name of the Manicheans was odious. Concerning the feigned facts of the Manicheans, see Cyrill, in his sixth Cateches. Valef.

* That is, he had only the form and figure of a man; was imaginarily, not really such.

tests, in his Book de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. Cyrill of Jerusalem has mentioned this dispute, in his sixth Catechism. A fragment of this Work is in my hands, wherein is contained the History of the impious and perfidious Manicheus. But his disputation with Archelaus the Bishop, which was annexed to the close of this History, is wanting. In the room whereof is added Archelaus's Epistle to Diodorus the Presbyter. I am beholden to the eminent Emeritus Sigotius for this monument, as also for many others. Valef. Valefius has published this Disputation of Archelaus's in Latine, at the close of his Annotations upon Socranus, page 197, &c.

(c) In the Abat. M. S. the reading is Crassus, sprang up which is better than Crassus, sprang up before. After the same manner Socrates expresses himself in the beginning of this chapter. * A metaphor taken from Cockle, which is wont to grow up with the Corn. Valef.

CHAP. XXIII.

How Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia, and Theognis Bishop of Nice, taking courage again, endeavoured to subvert the Nicene Creed, by plotting against Athanasius.

EUSEBIUS and Theognis, being returned from exile, recovered their own Churches, having (as we said before) extruded those that had been ordained [Bishops] in their Places: Moreover, they acquired great Interest and favour with the Emperor, who had an high esteem for

Constant. But how can it be, that Cyrus should accuse Eusebius, for being a Sabellian, who was himself a favourer of that Heresy? It is probable therefore that Eusebius was Deposed for some other Reasons. Moreover, at such time as Eusebius was Deposed, there was a very great Sedition raised in Antioch. And afterwards, [at the Conferences] about the Election of a Bishop, there was frequently kindled so great a flame [of Dissention,] that it wanted but little of destroying the whole City, the Populace being divided into two Factions: One Party of them contended vigorously for the Translation of Eusebius Pamphilus from Cæsarea in Palestine to [the See of] Antioch; the other Faction was very earnest to have Eusebius restored. The whole City in general favoured the one or the other Party [of the Christians.] The Military Forces also were drawn up in Battle array [on both sides] as it were against Enemies, in so much that they were just about making use of their Swords, had not God, and the fear of the Emperor repressed the Violence of the Multitude. For the Emperor by his Letters, (c) and Eusebius by his refusal of the Bishoprick, appeased the Tumult and Sedition. Upon which Account the Emperor admired him greatly, and writ a Letter to him, in which he commends his prudent resolution, calling him happy, because he was judged worthy to be Bishop not of one City, but almost of the whole World. It is recorded therefore that after this the See of Antioch was (d) vacant eight Years. But at length, by the diligence of those that plotted the subversion of the Nicene Faith, (e) Euphronius is ordained Bishop. Let thus much be related concerning the Synod convened at Antioch upon Eusebius's Account. Soon after these things, Eusebius (who had long before left Berytus, and was now possessor of the Church of Nicomedia), made it his business, together with his confederates, to bring Eusebius again into Alexandria. But how they proceeded to effect this their Design, and after what manner the Emperor was persuaded to admit Arius and Euzoïus into his presence, we are now to relate.

(c) The meaning of this place is this. The Emperor, by his Letters written to Antioch, and Eusebius, by his refusing the Bishoprick of Antioch, appeased that tumult. Therefore these words [appeased the tumult and sedition] must in common belong to both the preceding clauses. Valf.

For the Emperor by his Letters, (c) and Eusebius by his refusal of the Bishoprick, appeased the Tumult and Sedition. Upon which Account the Emperor admired him greatly, and writ a Letter to him, in which he commends his prudent resolution, calling him happy, because he was judged worthy to be Bishop not of one City, but almost of the whole World. It is recorded therefore that after this the See of Antioch was (d) vacant eight Years. But at length, by the diligence of those that plotted the subversion of the Nicene Faith, (e) Euphronius is ordained Bishop. Let thus much be related concerning the Synod convened at Antioch upon Eusebius's Account. Soon after these things, Eusebius (who had long before left Berytus, and was now possessor of the Church of Nicomedia), made it his business, together with his confederates, to bring Eusebius again into Alexandria. But how they proceeded to effect this their Design, and after what manner the Emperor was persuaded to admit Arius and Euzoïus into his presence, we are now to relate.

(a) What tioch was (d) vacant eight Years. But at length, by the diligence of those that plotted the subversion of the Nicene Faith, (e) Euphronius is ordained Bishop. Let thus much be related concerning the Synod convened at Antioch upon Eusebius's Account. Soon after these things, Eusebius (who had long before left Berytus, and was now possessor of the Church of Nicomedia), made it his business, together with his confederates, to bring Eusebius again into Alexandria. But how they proceeded to effect this their Design, and after what manner the Emperor was persuaded to admit Arius and Euzoïus into his presence, we are now to relate.

when Eusebius of Cæsarea had refused that See; Paulinus Bishop of Tyre was translated to that See, in the Year of Christ 329: As I before noted in the Tenth Book of Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, chap. 1. note (a.) Afterwards Euphronius succeeded Paulinus; or, as some will have it, Eulalius. After whom Flavianus was advanced to the See of Antioch, who (as Arkanasius attests in his second Apology against the Arians) was at the Synod of Tyre. Valf.

(c) Socratus says the same; and Theodorus Mopsuestenus (apud Nicæam in Theodoro Oribodox. fidei). Which is also confirm'd by Georgius of Laodicea, in his Encomium of Eusebius Emisenus, Socratus quotes his Words, in Book 2. Chap. 9. (Eccles. Hist.) But Theodorus (Book 1. Chap. 22. Eccles. Hist.) puts Eulalius between Eusebius and Euphronius, and says that he presided but a very short time. Philostorgius agrees with Theodorus. Valf.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning the Presbyter, who made it his business to get Arius recalled.

THE Emperor Constantine had a sister whose name was Constantia. She had been married to Licinius who was heretofore colleague in the Empire with Constantine, but afterwards he became a Tyrant and was therefore put to death. She had a confidant, a Presbyter, one that was a favourer of Arianism, who was reckoned amongst her Domesticks. This Man, prompted thereto by Eusebius and those of his Faction, did in his familiar Discourse with Constantia let fall some Words concerning Arius, saying, that the Synod had done him wrong, and that his sentiments were not such as Report represented them to be. Constantia having heard this was easily induced to give credit to the Presbyter. But she had not confidence to declare it to the Emperor. It happened that Constantia fell dangerously sick. The Emperor came daily to visit her in her sickness. But when she was brought into so dangerous a condition by her Dis temper, that she expected to die immediately, she recommends the Presbyter to the Emperor, declaring to him his industry, piety; and how well affected he was towards his Government: And immediately after she died. The Presbyter was [after this] made one of the Emperor's greatest Confidants. And having by degrees got a greater liberty of speaking, he relates to the Emperor the same things concerning Arius, that he before told his Sister; affirming that Arius had no other sentiments than what were agreeable to the Synod's determination: And that if [the Emperor] would admit him to his presence, he would give his consent to what the Synod had decreed: (a) Moreover, that he was falsely accused without the least of Reason. These Words of the Presbyter seemed strange to the Emperor. Thus therefore he answered [the Presbyter,] if Arius does consent to the Synod's determination, and has the same sentiments with that, I will both admit him to my presence, and also send him back to Alexandria with Reputation and Honor. Thus he answered, and immediately wrote to Arius after this manner.

Charisius read [the Emperor's Letter,] Moreover thus he was falsely accused without the least of reason. This story concerning the Arian Presbyter (whom Constantia Augusta recommended to her brother Constantine) Socratus borrowed out of Rufinus, book 1. chap. 11. Eccles. Hist. But I suspect the truth of it, for these reasons. First, because Athenasius (who does usually detect all the frauds of the Arians) has no where made mention of it. Secondly, in regard the name of this Presbyter is suppressed: For, if this Presbyter were in so great favour and authority with Constantine, (as Rufinus relates in the book and chapter now cited,) when the Emperor died, he should leave his Will, which he had written, in the hands of this Presbyter; doublets, he was worthy to have had his name mentioned. But, in my judgment, Rufinus's authority is but small; for he wrote his History very carefully, not from the Records of Affairs transacted, but from fabulous stories, and relations ground barely on report.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Arius.

It has been sometime since made known to your Gravity, that you should repair to Our Court, in order to your being admitted to the enjoyment of Our presence. But we much admire, that you have not immediately performed this. Wherefore ascend forthwith a publick Chariot, and come with speed to Our Court: That having experienced Our benevolence and care, you may return to your own Country. God preserve you, beloved Brother. Dated before the fifth of the Kalends of December. This was the Emperor's Letter to Arius. Here I cannot but admire the Emperors care and zeal for Religion. For 'tis evident by this Letter, that he had before frequently exhorted Arius to a * Recantation, in regard he reproves him, that after his frequent writing to him, Arius had not forthwith returned to the Truth. Arius therefore having received the Emperor's Letters, came soon after to Constantinople. There came along metus was the Son of Constantine's Brother, he that some years after was made Cæsar by Constantine. But that is a great mistake. For Dalmatius the Censor was Constantine's Brother, and the Father of Dalmatius the Cæsar. The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle confirms this, who writes thus concerning Constantine. Καὶ βασιλεύοντος τοῦ αὐτοῦ ἀδελφοῦ Δαμασκίου τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ βασιλέως Constantine's Brother, and created Dalmatius (the Son of his Brother Dalmatius the Censor) Cæsar. Certainly, Dalmatius the Son of Dalmatius was (when these things were done) which are related by Athanasius) very young, and could not be as judge in so weighty an Affair. Besides, he lived at that time at Narbonne, and (together with Hanniballianus his brother) was an Hearer of Eusepius the Rhetorician. For from that City he was sent for by Constantine, and created Cæsar when very young (as Assegius affirms in his Book de Professor. Burdigal.) in the year of Christ 324. But that trial concerning the murder of Arsenius was before Dalmatius the Censor at Antioch, (as Athanasius attests,) in the year of Christ 332, according to Baronius's Opinion. Valef.

CHAP. XXVIII.

That the Emperor ordered a Synod of Bishops should be convened at Tyre, upon account of the accusations brought against Athanasius.

THE Emperor had ordered a Synod of Bishops to meet, that they might be present at the Consecration of the Church which he had erected at Jerusalem. He therefore issued out an Order, that those Bishops [before they met there] should first be convened at Tyre, and by the by make researches into Athanasius's case: That so [all occasions of] contention being by this means wholly taken away, they might more peaceably perform the Solemnities of the Churches Dedication, and consecrate it unto God. (a) This was the thirtieth Year of Constantine's Empire. Moreover there were assembled at Tyre Bishops out of divers places, to the number of sixty, upon the summons of the monks of Diospolis, a Person that had born the Consecrated fullship Macarius the Presbyter was brought from Alexandria, bound in iron chains, under the custody of a guard of Soldiers. But Athanasius would not have come thither (not that he so much dreaded the accusations brought against him: For he was not conscious to himself that he was guilty of those things he was accused for: But he was afraid lest they should make any innovations there in opposition to what had by common consent been approved of at the Synod of Nice.) But yet he dreaded the Emperor's menacing Letters. For he had written to him, that if he would not come voluntarily and Al-riely, he should be brought by force. Therefore Athanasius also was present there, being necessitated to it. (b) This was the 28th year of Constantine's Empire. His 28th Year began (during the same Men's Consulates) on the 8th of the Calends of August, on which day Constantine celebrated his Tricennalia (i. e. the Festivals for his having arrived to the 30th Year of his Empire) as Marcus attests, (in East.) anticipating that Solemnity one whole Year. This anticipation of his Tricennalia has induced not only Socrates, but several others also, into a mistake. Valef.

CHAP. XXIX.

Concerning Arsenius, and his Hand which was reported to have been cut off.

MOREOVER, Divine Providence forced Arsenius to go to Tyre. For having neglected the commands which the Sycophants, whole hiring he was, had given him, he came in a disguise, to see what would be done there. It accidentally happened, that the Servants of (a) Archelaus (who was the Consulatus) heard some Persons in his Ecclesiastick History, says that this Archelaus was not the Consulatus (or President) of Phœnicia, but the Comes of the East. Valef.

an Inn say, that Arsenius (the Person reported to have been murdered) was there kept concealed in some [Citizens] house. When they had heard this, and had taken good notice of them that spoke these Words, they gave their Master an Account of what they had heard. He, without the least delay, immediately searched for the Man, and found him: And when he had found him, ordered he should be secured. And gives notice to Athanasius not to be in the least disturbed: For Arsenius was alive and present there. Arsenius being apprehended, denied that he was [Arsenius.] But Paul Bishop of Tyre, who had formerly known him, made it appear that he was the Person. Divine Providence having before hand disposed of these things after this manner, soon after Athanasius was summoned by the Synod. And when he had made his appearance, the Sycophants produced the hand, and enforced their Accusation [against him.] But he meant himself prudently. For he enquired of those that were present, and of his Accusers, whether any of them knew Arsenius. When a great many answered that they knew him very well, he caused Arsenius to be brought in before them, is the in- having his hands hid under his upper long Garment: Then he asked them again; is this the Man that hath lost his hand? Hereupon, they (ex- rendered- cepting those that knew whence the hand had been cut off) were astonished at the strangeness of the thing. For all the rest thought that Arsenius had really wanted a hand, and they expected that Athanasius would make his own Defence some other way. But he took Arsenius's Garment and turning it on one side, shews the Man's hand. Again, when some supposed that his other hand was wanting, he made a short stay, permitting them to continue dubious. Immediately after, without any further delay, he turned aside the other part [of his garment] and shewed Arsenius's other hand: After which he thus addressed himself to the company; Arsenius, as you see, is found to have two hands: As for the third, let my Accusers shew the place whence it was cut off.

CHAP. XXX.

That Athanasius being found innocent, after his first Accusation, his Accusers made their escape by flight.

THESE Affairs concerning Arsenius having been thus transacted, they who had contrived this fraud, were reduced to a straight. But (a) In Archab, (who was also called John) Athanasius's Accuser, slipped away out of the Court of Judicature, and so made his escape in the tumult. Thus Athanasius cleared himself from this accusation, without making use of any exception. For he was confident, that the bare sight of Arsenius being alive would abash the Sycophants.

who is also called John. In the the Epistle of Alexander Bishop of Theſsalonica to Athanasius, he is also called Archab. Therefore, this Man had two Names, he was called Archab, by the Egyptians, which was his Country name: John was his Constantinick Name. He was a Bishop of the Meſſitan ſiſition at Memphis. Athanasius relates, that he was commanded by Constantine to agree with his Arch-Bishop. Athanasius means Constantine's Letter to John, which he gives an Account of, at Pag. 787. of his second Apology. Edit. Paris. Valef.

CHAP. XXXI.

That Athanasius fled to the Emperor, upon the Bishops not admitting of his Defence at his second Accusation.

BUT in his disproof of the false accusations brought against Macarius, he made use of legal exceptions. And first he excepted against Eusebius and his companions, as being enemies, alleging that no man ought to be judged by his adversaries. Afterwards he said, that it must be demonstrated, that Severus the Accuser had really procured the dignity of a Presbyter. For so it was written in the Libel of Accusation. But when the Judges would not allow of any of these exceptions, Macarius's cause was brought in. After that the Accusers were almost wearied out and quite faint, the further hearing of the cause was deferred till such time as some Persons should make a journey into Marcote, that they might make inquisition upon the place concerning all matters that were doubtful. But when Athanasius perceiv'd that those very persons were ordered to go, whom he had excepted against; (for Theognis, Maris, Tecodrus, Macedonius, Valens, and Ursacius were sent;) he cried out that their proceedings were treacherous and fraudulent. For it is unjust [said he] that Macarius the Presbyter should be kept in bonds, and that his Accuser, together with his Adversaries the Judges should go; and [that this was done] for this reason, [to wit] that the memorials of the Acts might be made up [in favour] of one side only. After Athanasius had spoke these words aloud, and made protestation before the whole Synod, and Dionysius the president, when he saw that no body took notice of him, he privately withdrew. Those therefore that were sent to Marcote, having registered the Acts in favour of one side only, as if those things had been most certainly true, (a) which the Accuser had deposed;

(a) This place is imperfect, as any one may perceive. It may be made perfect, if instead of [23. 10] we make this addition [Eusebius his coram], made their return to Tyre:] which we have followed in our Version. Valef.

CHAP. XXXII.

That after Athanasius's departure, he was deposed by the Vote of the Synod.

A Thanasius being gone away, fled immediately to the Emperor. The Synod in the first place condemn'd him in his absence for deserting his cause. But when the Acts, which had been made up in Marcote arrived, they passed the sentence of deposition against him; loading him with reproaches in the (a) Libel of his deposition but mention'd not a word how shamefully the Sycophants had been vanquish'd in the accusation of the murder. Arsenius also, who was reported to have been murdered, was receiv'd by them.

(a) Musen and Christophorus render these words [ἐν τῇ καὶ ἀπὸ τούτου] thus, depositionis causa, the causes of his deposition. But I suppose, that by these words is meant the Libel of his deposition, or the Synodical Epistle concerning the condemnation and deposition of Athanasius. Socrates uses the same term, in his second Book Chap. 1. If any one be desirous to peruse a copy of these Epistles, there is extant a Synodical Epistle of the Council of Antioch, concerning the deposition of Paul of Samosata; also, the Synodical Epistle of the Council of Sardis, concerning the deposition of Gregorius, Alexandrinus, Valens, Ursacius, and other Arian Prelates. Valef.

He had at first been a Bishop of the Melitan Confession. Herefore: But he subscrib'd Athanasius's deposition, as being at that time Bishop of the (b) Hypellites. And thus (which was very strange) he <sup>(b) In d. Athanasius</sup> that was reported to have been murdered by the reading is true, that Athanasius, being alive, deposed Athanasius. [de-laudis]

ἡ πόλις, of the City of the Hypellites,] as we noted before. Stephanus (de Urbibus) says Hypellis is a Town in Egypt; and that the inhabitants thereof are called Hypellites. Valef.

CHAP. XXXIII.

How the Synod, having left Tyre, came to Jerusalem, and after the Celebration of the Feast of Dedication of the New Jerusalem, readmitted Arius to Communion.

IN the interim the Emperors Letters arrived, commanding the Synod to give their speedy attendance at New Jerusalem. And immediately with all possible expedition they hastened from Tyre to Jerusalem. Where after they had finished the solemnities of the consecration of the places, they (a) readmitted Arius and his associates into the Church, saying, that they did it in obedience to the Emperors Letters, by which he had signified to them that he was fully satisfied as touching Arius and Euzoius's slaunder. Moreover, they wrote Letters to the Church of Alexandria, that all envy and hatred was now banish'd, and that the affairs of the Church were in a peaceable and sedate posture: and that Arius, in regard by his repentance he had acknowledged'd the truth, was in future to be receiv'd by them, and that deserlem Council is recorded; in which Epistle the Bishops who had been convened there for the Dedication of Constantine's Church, do testify, that they had received into Communion the said Arius, and his followers: Which they had done according to the Emperors command, who by his Letters had signified to them, that he himself knew that these Mens Faith was true and Orthodox, both from their own attestation by word of mouth, and also from the Libel of Faith which they presented to him. Which Libel Constantine had annex'd to his Letters. Now, he means that Libel of Faith, which Arianus Euzoius had presented to Constantine, mentioned by Socrates before, at the 26th chapter of this first Book; and by Sophronius, Book 2. Chap. 27. For when Arianus had presented a Libel of his Faith to Constantine, Constantine, believing his Doctrine to be agreeable to the Nicene Faith, would not himself give his judgment concerning this matter; but remitted him to the examination of the Jerusalem Council, as Rufinus and Sophronius do relate. Athanasius also (in his Book de Synodo) shews expressly, that Arius and his associates were received into communion by the Jerusalem Synod: his words are ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ τῇ Ἱερουσαλὴμ τὸν ἀρειανιστὴν καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφεοὺς αὐτοῦ ἐδέξατο, and after the banishment of Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria, writing that they should admit to communion Arius and his followers, &c. But I suppose that Arius, his name sake, who had been condemn'd by Alexander Bishop of Alexandria, together with Arius his Ringleader. For Arius the Arch-Heretic died long before the Jerusalem Synod, as I have evidently prov'd in my second Book of Ecclesiastical Observations, chap. 1. [The Learned Reader will find three Books of Ecclesiastical Observations written by Valefius, and publish'd at the latter end of the second Vol. of his Greek Ecclesiastical Histories.] Therefore, that Arius, who together with Euzoius, presented a Libel of his Faith to Constantine, is a different Person from Arius the Arch-Heretic. Which may be demonstrated by another Argument. This Arius who presented a Libel to Constantine together with Euzoius, was not restored before the Jerusalem Synod, that is, before the year of Christ 335; nor joynd to the Catholic Church. For he requests of the Emperor in the foregoing Libel, that all alterations being taken away by his piety, he may be united to the Catholic Church. But Arius the Arch-Heretic was recalled from exile long before, and readmitted to communion, as the penitentiary Libel of Eusebius and Theognus do attest. For Eusebius and Theognus do say there expressly, that the Author of the whole controversy (to wit, Arius) having given satisfaction, was entirely restored. Further, Eusebius and Theognus sent that Libel to the Bishops in the year of Christ 328. as I shew'd before. Therefore Arius the Arch-Heretic must necessarily have been recalled at the beginning of the same Year. Valef.

That, when the Synod came not to the Emperor, the Eusebians accused Athanasius, as if he had threatened, that he would prohibit the carriage of that Corn, with which Alexandria furnish'd Constantinople. Whereupon the Emperor, being incens'd, banish'd Athanasius, confining him to the Gallia's.

THIS Letter put those present at the Synod into a great perplexity of mind. Wherefore most of them returned to their own Cities. But Eusebius, Theognis, Maris, Patrophilus, Ursacius and Valens, going to Constantinople, would not suffer any further enquiry to be made concerning breaking the Cup, overturning the [Communion] Table, and the murdering of Arsenius: but they proceeded to another calumny, having informed the Emperor, that Arbanasius had threatened to prohibit the sending of the Corn, which was usually convey'd from Alexandria to Constantinople: And that these words were said by Arbanasius in the hearing of Adamantius, Anubion,<sup>(a)</sup> Arbatbion and Peter, all Bishops. For a calumny hath a greater force and prevalency, when the false Accuser is a person of repute and credit. The Emperor thus circled Arbesion. How, after Athanasius was exiled, Arius, being sent for from Alexandria by the Emperor, raised Disturbances againft Alexander Bishop of Constantinople.

WHILE thefe things were tranfacted, the thirtieth Year of Constantine's Reign was completed. (a) Arius and his followers being returned to Alexandria, caufed a general difturbance in that City again. For the populace of Alexandria were very much troubled both at Arius and his Complices's return, and alfo at the exile of their Bifhop Athanasius. But when the Emperor underftood the perverfenefs of Arius's mind, he ordered him to be fent for again to Constantinople, thereto give an Account of the difturbances he had endeavour'd to rekindle. Alexander, who had fome time before that fucceeded Metropolitan, did then prefide over the Church of Constantinople. The conflict this Man had with Arius at that time, was a fufficient Proof of his Piety and Acceptablenefs to God. For upon Arius's arrival there, both the People were divided into two Factions, and there alfo arife an univerfal commotion all the City over: Some of them affirming, that the Niceene Creed ought to continue unshaken and without any alteration; and others pertinaciously afferting that Arius's Opinion was conforant to Reason; Alexander was hereupon reduced to a great ftraight. And more epecially, becaufe Eusebius of Nicomedia had forely threatened him, faying, that he would forthwith caufe him to be depofed, unlefs he would admit Arius and his followers to Communion. But Alexander was not fo follicitous about his own Depofition, as he was fearful of the enervating of the Doctrine of Faith, which they earnestly endeavour'd to fubvert. For looking upon himfelf as the Keeper and Patron of the Determinations made by the [Niceene] Synod, he made it wholly his bufinefs to prevent the wrefling and depravation of thofe Canons. Being therefore reduced to thofe extremities, he entirely bid farewell to [the aliftances of] Logic, and made God his Refuge. He devoted himfelf to continual Fasts, and omitted no form or manner of Praying. Now, he made this refolution within his own mind, and what he had refolved he fecretly perform'd. Having fhut up himfelf alone in the Church which is called Irene, he went to the Altar, laid himfelf prostrate on the Ground under the (b) Holy Table, and poured forth his Prayers [to God] with tears: he continued doing this for many Nights and Days together. Moreover, he asked of God, and received [what he had defired.] His Petition was this; [That if Arius's Opinion] were true, he might not fee the Day appointed for the Difquifition thereof: But, if that Faith which he profefled were true, that Arius (in regard he was the Author of all thefe mifchiefs) fhould miftly fuffer condign punifhment for his impiety.

Wherefore, I had rather follow Philostorgius here, who says, that Constantine delivered his Will to Eusebius of Nicomedia, by whom he had been baptized a little before. Val.

They that were about the Emperor, put his Corps in a Coffin of Gold, convey'd it to Constantinople, and placed it [on a Bed of State] on high in the Palace; and there they paid their honorary respects to it, and set a guard about it, as when he was alive. This course they continued, till one of his Sons came. But when

Constan-

Constant. Constantinus arrived out of the Eastern parts, he was honour'd with an Imperial Sepulture, and deposited in the Church called The Apostles; which he himself had erected for this reason, that the Emperors and Prelates (a) might not be far inferior to the Reliques of the Apostles. The Emperor Constantine liv'd to the age of sixty five years: he reigned one and thirty years: and died in the Consulate of Felicianus and Titianus, upon the twenty second

(a) Museus and Christophorus have rendered this place thus, Licinius and Titianus, upon the twenty second toros & Antistetes reliquiis apostolorum destinarentur, that the Emperors and Prelates might not be deprived of the Apostles' reliques. But I cannot approve of this Version. For Constantine had deposited no reliques of the Apostles in that Church. I would therefore rather translate it thus, that the Emperors and Prelates there to be buried, might not be far inferior to the Apostles' Reliques; but might be affected with the same degree of honour with them. Which interpretation Eusebius confirms, in Book 4. Chap. 40. Concerning the Life of Constantine Valel.

day of May: which was the (b) second year of Constantine. the two hundredth seventy eighth Olympiad. Now, this Book contains in it the space of thirty one years.

(b) Socrates mistakes here. For in the consulate of Felicianus and Titianus (which was the year of Christ 337) on the eleventh of the Calends of June (i. e. on the 22d of May) the fourth year of the 278th Olympiad was current. Which may be demonstrated by most evident reasons. But Socrates seems to have made use of a corrupt Copy of Eusebius's Chronicle, wherein the year of the Olympiad was erroneously set. But, at this place of Socrates, we ought rather to read The third Year. For Socrates says, that this first Book of his History contains the space of One and thirty years. For he begins from the beginning of Constantine's Reign, who, as he says, reigned One and thirty years. The beginning of his Reign he places on the first year of the 271 Olympiad, as we saw before. Now from this year to the second year of the 278th Olympiad there are but thirty years, including therein the two terms. Wherefore, there must necessarily be a mistake in this place of Socrates. Valel.

Rufinus (he that wrote an Eccelesiastick History in the Latin tongue,) has erred concerning [the notation of] the times. For he supposes, that what was done against Arthanasius, hapned after the death of Constantine the Emperor. He was also ignorant of his banishment into the Gallia's, and of several other things. We having at first follow'd Rufinus [as our Author,] wrote the first and second Book of our History according to his authority. But from the third to the seventh Book we have made a collection of some passages, partly out of Rufinus, and partly out of various other Authors, and related others from those which do yet survive; and so have compleated our work. But when we had afterwards procured Arthanasius's Books, wherein he laments his own calamitous sufferings, and how he was banish'd by the calumny of the Eusebian faction; we thought it more expedient to credit him (who had suffer'd these hardships) and those who had been present at the transacting of these matters; rather than such as have followed conjectures [in their relations] thereof, and for that reason have been mistaken. Besides, having gotten [several] Letters of persons at that time very eminent, to our utmost ability we have diligently traced out the truth. Upon which account we have been necessitated *entirely to omit to dictate again the first and second Book [of this Work,] making use [nevertheless] of those passages, in the relation whereof Rufinus hath not forsaken the truth. Moreover, notice is to be taken, that in our former Edition we had not inserted Arius's Libel of Deposition, nor the Emperor's Letters; but had only set forth a bare relation of the affairs transacted, that we might not dull our Readers by a prolix and tedious Narration. But in regard that this also was to be done in favour to you stance, who had a little before been the cause of Arius's being recalled from banishment. But, how this was effected, we must relate. That Presbyter [we have mention'd] presented Constantine's last will and commands, which he had received from the Emperor at his death, to the Emperor's Son Constantius. He having found that written in the Will which he was very desirous of ; (for by the Will the Empire of the East was committed to him) had an honorary respect for the Presbyter, allow'd him a great liberty of speaking, and order'd he should freely and with confidence come into the Palace. This liberty therefore being allowed [the Presbyter,] made him in a short time well known both to the Emperess, and also to her Eunuchs. The principal person of the Emperor's Bed-chamber at that time was an Eunuch, whose name was Eusebius. The Presbyter perswaded this person to embrace Arius's opinion. After which, the rest of the Eunuchs were prevailed with to be of the same opinion. Moreover, the Emperor's Wife also, by the perswasion of the Eunuchs and this Presbyter, became a favourer of Arius's Tenets. Nor long after, this question came to [the hearing of] the Emperor himself. And by degrees it was spread abroad, first a-

CHAPTER. III.

How Athanasius, confiding in the Letter of Constantine the Younger, returned to Alexandria.

CONSTANTINUS CÆSAR, to the People of the Catholick Church of the Alexandrians.

It has not, we suppose, (a) escaped the knowledge of your Sacred Mind, that Athanasius an Interpreter of the venerable Law, was therefore sent into the Gallia's for a time, left (in regard the Barbarity of his blood-devouring Enemies and Adversaries continually menaced his Sacred Head with imminent danger,) he should undergo incurably Mischief through the perverseness of wicked Men. In order therefore to his frustrating of this [Barbarity,] he was snatch'd out of the jaws of those perijans that designed his ruin; and enjoyed to live under our Disfrict, in such a manner that, in that City wherein he was ordered to make his residence, he should abound with all manner of Necessaries; although his most eximious Virtue, having put in confidence in the Divine Assistance, seems as nothing the Troubler of a rougher Fortune. Wherefore, although our Lord and Father Constantinus Augustus of blessed memory, had determined to return this Bishop to his own * See, * Place. and [revert him] to your most Amiable Piety: Yet in regard, being prevented by human chance, he died before the accomplishment of his desire; We being his Successor, thought it agreeable to fulfil the mind of that Emperor of sacred memory. [Moreover,] how great a reverence and respect he has procured from us, you shall know from himself, as soon as he shall come into your presence. Nor is it a wonder that We have done any thing in favour to him: for both the representation of your Love, and also the aspect of so great a Personage moved and excited Our Mind hereto. May the Divine Providence preserve you, dearst Brethren.

in the year of Christ 338, to wit, the year after Constantine's death; y who perceiving the forefaid Prelate to be pressed on every side by the Calumnies of his Adversaries, had for a time banished him into the Gallia's. But I do maintain, that Athanasius was restored in the year of Christ 377, when Felixianus and Titinius were Consul, in that very year wherein Constantine died : which I can make evident, as I suppose, by a most demonstrable argument. For Athanasius (in his second Apology against the Arians, pag. 805.) relates, that he was released from his banishment, and returned to his Country in Constantine the younger, who also wrote a Letter in his behalf to the Populate and Clergy of the Alexandrian Church. This Letter [is Socrates does here,] Athanasius thus recites : the interpretation of it, this; Constantinus Cæsar, in the People of the Catholic Church of Alexandria. The subscription of this Letter thus ended, I have written this Epistle to thee, O my dear Son, in the name of our Father, &c. In the beginning of this Letter, does stand what I say, to wit, that Athanasius was released from his exile soon after the death of Constantine the Great, in the year of Christ 317. For if he had been restored to the year following, then Constantine the younger would not have called himself Cæsar, but Augustus. Nor would Athanasius have been restored by Constantine the younger, but by Constantius, to whom was allotted the Eastern part of the Empire. Wherefore, in regard Constantine Riles himself only Cæsar in that Letter, and since Athanasius conceits, that he was restored by Constantine the younger, 'tis apparent, that that was done, before the Sons of Constantine the elder were to the Soldiers proclaimed Augusti. For, upon Constantine's Death, there was a certain Interregnum ; and the Roman World continued without an Emperor almost three Months, till the Brethren (who under the name of Cæsars Governed divers Provinces) had met together, in order to their making a division of the whole Roman Empire. Constantine died on the eleventh of the Calends of June, and on that very year there were three Augusti proclaimed, to wit, Constantinus, Constansius and Constans, on the fifth of the Ides of September ; (as it is recorded in the Old Fasti, which Jacobus Sivegnandus published under the false name of Iulianus. This is that which Eufræsius writes in his fourth Book of Constantine's Life, chap. 71. to wit, that Constantine retained his Empire after his death, and that all Rescripts and Edicts bore his name, as if he had been veray live. For this reason therefore Constantine the younger Riles himself Cæsar only, in his Letter to the Alexandrians, in regard he was not yet crowned Augustus. For the Letter was dated on the sixth of the Calends of July. But he was crowned Augustus (to wit, with his brethren) on the fifth of the Ides of September. Moreover, at that time (whilst the Brothers were titled Cæsars only) Constantinus Junior was the chief in Authority, because he was the eldest Brother. See Valerius's first Book of Ecclesiastical Monitions on Socrates and Sozomen. Chap. i.

Upon

Constantianus Upon the confidence of this Letter Athenasius comes to Alexandria, and the people of Alexandria most willingly received him. But as many as were followers of Arius's Opinion, entered into a combination and conspired against him. Hereupon continual Seditions arose, which gave an occasion to the Eusebian faction of accusing him before the Emperor, because upon his own inclination and award (without the determination of a general Council of Bishops) he had return'd and taken possession of the [Alexandrian] Church. And they made for great a proficiency in their calumnies, that the Emperor, being incensed, expelled him out of Alexandria. But, how that was effected, I will a little after this relate.

How Alexander Bishop of Constantinople, at his Death, proposed Paulus and Macedonius to be elected into his Bishoprick.

AT the very same time, the City Constantinople was involv'd in another tumult (which follow'd on the neck of those [disturbances] we have before related,) raised upon this account. (a) Alexander, who presided over the Churches in that City, [a Prelate] that here, (and all those that follow him,) in placing the death of Alexander Bishop of Constantinople on the Consulate of Acindynus and Proculus, in the year of Christ 340. In the second Book of my Ecclesiastick Observations upon Socrates and Sozomen [the Learned Reader will meet with Valesius's Ecclesiastick Observations upon Socrates and Sozomen, at the close of Valesius's second Volume of the Greek Ecclesiastick Histories; he may find the matter discussed at the first Chapter of the second Book of those Observations.] I have by most evident arguments demonstrated, that Alexander Bishop of Constantinople died in the Reign of Constantine the Great, and that Paul succeeded him, during the Reign of the said Constantine. Baronius, who places Alexander's death on the year of Christ 340, does manifestly contradict himself. For he says, that the Synod of the Bishops of Egypt (which was summoned to confute the Calumnies brought against Athenasius by the Eusebian Faction,) was convened in the year of Christ 339. But those Bishops do expressly assert, in their Synodick Epistle, that at that very time Eusebius had left Nicomedia, and had leapt into the Constantinopolitan See. This needeth to quote the words of that Epistle here, in regard they are produced by Baronius himself, at the year of Christ 340. Now, if Eusebius had gotten the See of Constantinople in the year of Christ 339, Alexander must necessarily be supposed to have been dead before this year. Valef.

had courageously opposed Arius, departed out of this life, after he had spent twenty three years in that Bishoprick, and had lived ninety eight years compleat, having ordained no body [to succeed] in his place. But he commanded those to whom the power of electing belong'd, to make choice of one of those two whom he should name. And if they were desirous of having one that should be both skilful in teaching, and also of an approved piety and uprightness of life, [he advised them] to make choice of Paulus, one that he had ordained Presbyter; a person that was a young man indeed in respect of his age, but old in understanding and prudence. But if they would rather have one commendable for an external shew of piety only, they might elect (b) Macedonius, who had long since been made a Deacon of that Church, and was now grown aged. Hereupon there hapned a great contest concerning the Ordination of a Bishop, which very much disturbed that Church. For the people were divided into two * Factions; the one side adhered to the Arian Opinion; the other embraced the determinations made at the Nicene Synod. And as long as Alexander continued alive, the † Homosousian party prevailed; † That is, the Arians disagreeing and contending daily at those that amongst themselves concerning their own Opinion. But after Alexander's death, the success of Christ to be of the of the peoples contest was dubious. Therefore, the Homosousian party proposed Paulus to be ordained Bishop. But those that embraced Arianism, were very earnest to have Macedonius elected. And in the Church called (c) Irene (c) There (which is near that Church now named The were two Great Church, and the Church of Sophia,) Paulus is ordained Bishop; in which [Election] the Suffrage of Alexander, then dead, seem'd to have prevailed.

(b) This Person was afterwards promoted to the degree of Presbyter under Paul Bishop of Constantinople, and accused his own Bishop, as Athenasius relates, in his Epistle ad Solitar. Valef.

the Old, the other the New Irene; as it is recorded in the Life of Paul the Constantinopolitan Bishop, which Plinius relates in his Bibliotheca. Moreover, the Old Church called Irene was contiguous to the Great Church, which was afterwards named Sophia; nor had it separate Clergy-men; but the Clergy of the Great Church by turns ministered in that Church. The Emperor Justinian informs us of this, in the third Novel. In the old description of Constantinople, which is prefixt before the Notitia Imperii Romani, this is called the Old Church, and 'tis plac'd in the second Ward of the City, together with the Great Church. The Church Irene (so wit, The New Irene;) is recounted in the seventh Ward of that City. Socrates hath made mention of The Old Irene, in his first Book, Chap. 37. It is termed the Church of Saint Irene, after the same manner that the Church Sophia is called Saint Sophia; not that there was a Virgin, or Martyr, called by that name. Valef.

How the Emperor Constantius ejected Paulus, who had been ordained Bishop: and, having sent for Eusebius from Nicomedia, entrusted him with the Bishoprick of Constantinople.

BUT the Emperor, arriving not long after at Constantinople, was highly incensed at this Ordination [of Paulus]. And having convened a Council of Bishops that embraced Arius's Opinion, he vacated Paulus's [Bishoprick]. And he translated Eusebius (a) from Nicomedia, and constituted him Bishop of Constantinople. (a) The

When the Emperor had performed these things, he went to Antioch. here, after this manner: 'Εὐσεβίου δὲ ἐν τῇ νικομηδείᾳ καὶ περιεργάζοντος αὐτοῦ περὶ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς ἀρχιεπισκοπῆς ἀφ' ἧς αὐτὸς ἀνέβη; ἰ. e. and having through Eusebius's own ambition removed him from Nicomedia, he constituted him Bishop of the Great City [Constantinople]. Valef.

CHAP. VIII.

How Eusebius assembled another Synod at Antioch of Syria, and caused another Form of Faith to be published.

BUT Eusebius could by no means be at quiet: but (as the common saying is) moved every stone, that he might effect what he had designed. Therefore, he procures a Synod to be assembled at Antioch in Syria, under a pretence of dedicating a Church, which [Constantine] the Father of the * Augusti had begun to build: (after whose death, Constantinus his son finish'd it, in the tenth year after its foundation was laid:) but in reality, that he might subvert and destroy the Homoiousian

Faith. At this Synod there met ninety Bishops, [who came] out of divers Cities. But Macarius Bishop of Jerusalem, who had succeeded Macarius, was not present at that Synod, (a) having consider'd with himself that he had been before induced by fraud to subscribe Athanasius's Deposition. Neither was Julius Bishop of Rome the Great present there: Nor did he send any body to supply his place. Altho' the Ecclesiastick Canon doth order, that the Churches ought not to make Sanctions contrary to the Bishop of Rome's opinion. This Synod therefore is convened at Antioch (the Emperor Constantinus himself being there present,) in the (b) Consulate of Marcellinus and Probinus. This was the (c) fifth year from the death of Constantine the Father of the Augusti. At that time (d) Placitus, Successor to Euphronius presided over the Churches in Antioch. The Eusebians therefore made it their principal business to calumniate Athanasius, [saying,] in the first place, that he had done contrary to that Canon, which they had then constituted, because he had recover'd his Episcopal Dignity without the consent of a general Synod of Bishops. For, returning from his Exile, he had upon his own arbitrement and award rush'd into the Church: [Secondly,] that a tumult being raised at its entrance, (e) many had lost their lives in that sedition; and that some persons had been scourged by Athanasius, and others brought before the seats of Judicature. Moreover, they produced what had been done against Athanasius in the City of Tyre.

In regard of his sorrow for doing this, he refused afterwards to be present at the Council of Antioch; as Sozomen relates, in his third Book, Chap. 6. near the end. Valef.
